JEUNE, P., in giving judgment, said: I think I can yield to the arguments addressed to me, and I am anxious to do so if I can. The principle is as clear as possible. When the law speaks of condonation and revival, it means that the offence is condoned on the condition that there shall be in the future a proper compliance with the matrimonial decencies and duties, and a person who goes back to live with his or her guilty spouse goes back on that implied condition alone. Desertion is as serious a matrimonial offence as can be imagined, because it probably results in breaking up the matrimonial home. My doubt when this case first came before me, and I do not say that it has even now been altogether dispelled, arose upon the terms of the Act of 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), which made desertion for the first time a matrimonial offence. The Act made desertion a matrimonial offence for certain specified purposes, and amongst these is not the revival of previous misconduct. In holding, as I am about to hold, I feel that I am doing something which is not mentioned in the Act itself. But condonation, not only in previous cases under the old ecclesiastical law, which, of course, would apply in suits for judicial separation, but not in suits for dissolution of marriage, is to be, in the terms of the Act, an answer to the suit; and in the old sense of the term—namely, conditional on future good conduct. So far, then, the Act of 1857 proceeded by bringing in the old technical meaning of the law with the condition attached to it that there should be future good conduct. Under these circumstances one is entitled to look, not only at such acts of matrimonial misconduct as were recognized before the Act, but to look also at the law as it stands. As it stands desertion is a matrimonial offence of a serious kind, and one would be ignoring the effect of condonation—namely, its conditional forgiveness, by holding that cruelty and adultery would revive a former matrimonial offence, but that desertion would not. There is no distinct decision on the point, but the language used by the judge ordinary in Dent v. Dent, 4 Sw. & Tr. 105, appears to me to be wide enough to carry one to that conclusion. He said this: "Now the rule of law is that all condonation is conditional, and the condition is that you shall treat her as a husband ought to treat his wife, and if you hereafter break your matrimonial obligation and are guilty of adultery or of cruelty the condoned offence is revived." That would seem to bring in the case of desertion equally with cruelty and adultery. Dent v. Dent was decided in 1865; that is, some years after the passing of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. The decision in Cooke v. Cooke, 3 Sw. & Tr. 246, I look upon very much in the same way. It was decided in 1863, and the judgment of the full court contains this passage: "The wife appears to have been willing to condone provided she was treated by her husband in the manner she had the right to expect if she returned to live and cohabit with him. She was on her return to him not treated by him in the manner she ought to have been, and on non-compliance with that which was a condition of condonation the offences said to have been condoned were revived." I do not see why that also should not apply to a case of desertion equally with adultery and cruelty. It rests on the meaning to be attached to condonation; and taking it to mean that it is a conditional forgiveness, I think I am justified in holding that the Act of 1857 is as efficacious to revive by subsequent desertion as it is to revive by subsequent cruelty or adultery. I am prepared to take this step on principle—a principle which may be said to be to some extent supported by judicial authority, or, at any rate, not to be contradicted by it. I therefore pronounce a decree nisi with costs, and I order that the petitioner may have the custody of the children of the marriage. I do not like to date back the decree to the day on which the case was first before the court, as I am now asked to do, but I will say that the petitioner may apply to have the decree made absolute from six months from to-day.

Solicitors, Spencer, Chapman, & Co.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Nov. 5, 6; Dec. 21.

In re RAYNER.
RAYNER v. RAYNER. (a.)

Will—Construction—Investment—"Securities"—Evidence.

A testator gave all his property, real and personal, to trustees upon trust for conversion, and continued: "I declare that all moneys liable to be invested under this my will may be invested in such securities as my trustees in their absolute discretion shall think fit. And I authorize my trustees to continue or leave any moneys invested at my death in or upon the same securities."

Held, that the testator had not used the word "securities" in its strict and primary sense of "money secured on property," but in its popular sense, so as to include railway stocks and shares.

Per Vaughan Williams, L.J.—The meaning of a word is relative to the circumstances and occasion and date on which the word is used, and it is the duty of a judge to inform his mind, not only by reference to dictionaries, but also by evidence, of the meaning ordinarily given to such a word.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J.

By his will, dated the 11th of December, 1895, Edward William Rayner, after giving his property to his trustees upon trust for conversion, continued: "And I declare that my trustees may in their absolute discretion postpone the sale and conversion of my real and personal estate or any part thereof so long as they shall think fit. And that the rents, profits, and income to accrue from and after my decease of and from such part of my said estates as shall for the time remain unsold and unconverted shall after payment thereout of all incidental expenses and outgoings be paid and applied to the person or persons and in the manner to whom and in which the income of the proceeds of such sale and conversion would for the time being be payable or applicable under this my will if such sale and conversion had been actually made. And I declare that all moneys liable to be invested under this my will may be invested in such securities as my trustees in their absolute discretion shall think fit. And I authorize my trustees to continue or leave any moneys invested at my death in or upon the same securities."

At the time of his death the testator had a large part of his property invested in stocks and shares which would not come within the strict meaning of the word "securities."

A summons was taken out by the trustees of the will asking (inter alia) upon the construction of the will (1) whether the trustees were authorized to appropriate out of investments belonging to the testator at his death in part satisfaction of the trust legacy, ordinary stock of the Midland Railway Co.; (2) whether the trustees were authorized to purchase with moneys belonging to the trust legacy ordinary shares of the London and North-Western Railway Co.

Farwell, J., held that the word "securities" must be interpreted in its strict and primary sense of "money secured upon property," and he answered both questions in the negative.

The persons beneficially interested in the property appealed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upjohn, K.C., and MacConkey, for the appellants.—The strict legal meaning of "securities" rests upon the authority of Huddleston v. Gouldsberg, 10 Beav. 547. Harris v. Harris, 9 W. R. 444, 29 Beav. 107, and also Ogle v. Knipe, 17 W. R. 1090, 8 Eq. 434, are to the same effect. But these cases all really applied to a different state of things, and to a period when the modern facilities for dealing with stocks and shares did not exist. In modern times the word "securities" invariably includes stocks and shares. It is used in this sense in the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the Trustee Act, 1893, and also in the Rules of the Supreme Court, see ord. 22, r. 17. In Cavanagh's Law of Securities for Money, the Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. 32, p. 864, Chambers' Encyclopædia (1895 ed.), and Murray's Oxford Dictionary, sub. tit. Investments, the word "securities" is used to include stocks and shares, and it is used in this sense daily in the money article in the Times.

They also cited Cocks v. Chapman, 45 W. R. 67, [1896] 2 Ch. 763; Little v. London Joint Stock Bank, 39 W. R. 449, [1891] 2 Ch. 270; Tucker v. Wilson, 1 Peere Williams 260; Murphy v. Doyle, 27 L. R. Ir. 495, 29 L. R. Ir. 333; Dicks v. Lambert, 4 Ves. 725.

Bramwell Davis, K.C., and Rotch, for the trustees.

Butcher, K.C., and E. Ford, contra.—"Securities" has been used in its strict sense of money secured on property in a long succession of cases, some of which are more recent than Ogle v. Knipe: see Trafford v. Boehm, 3 Atk. 440; Turner v. Turner, 21. L. J. Ch. 843; M'Donell v. Morrow, 23 L. R. Ir. 591; Murphy v. Doyle. The whole current of the authorities show that "security" has a definite legal meaning attached to it; and the courts will give it this primary legal meaning in the absence of context: see Wigram on Wills (3rd ed.), proposition 2, p. 17. The argument drawn from the Acts of Parliament is really in our favour, as the Acts always contain a definition clause to show that "securities" does include stocks and shares.

They also cited Dawson v. Higgins, 48 W. R. 673, [1900] 2 Ch. 756; Higgins v. Dawson, 50 W. R. 337, [1902] A. C. 1.

Upjohn, K.C., in reply, cited Wigram on Wills, proposition 5, p. 51.

Cur. adv. vult.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question the court has to decide in this case is, what is the meaning of the word "security" in this will?

In my judgment, in this will the meaning of that word, or rather the word "securities," is determined, for reasons which I will presently discuss, by the context of the will, and it is unnecessary, therefore, to discuss generally what is the meaning of the word "security," either its common and ordinary meaning at the date of the will or what is the meaning of the words "strict and primary sense" in proposition 2, in the treatise of Wigram, V.C., on Extrinsic Evidence, for in my judgment it is apparent from the context of this will that the testator has not used the word "securities" in what Farwell, J., holds to be the strict and primary sense, but in what may be called its popular sense; which I may observe is a sense in which I am of opinion, without the assistance of either dictionary or the evidence of the commercial or other witnesses, it is applied habitually by those who have to deal with property transferable by the assignment of indicia of property, be they commercial men or non-commercial men, lawyers or laymen, and a sense in which it has been used daily in the Times since the year 1886, and in divers Acts of Parliament.

Now, the reasons why I have formed this conclusion as to the meaning of the word "securities" in this will are these.

Take the passage in the will "and I authorize my trustees to continue or leave any moneys invested at my death in or upon the same securities." This obviously means "the same investments," and I think that the effect of using the words "moneys invested" and the word "securities" to cover the same subject-matter is not to narrow down or limit the natural sense of the words "moneys invested," but to extend what Farwell, J., considers to be the strict and primary meaning of the word "securities," so as to cover anything which, according to the strict and primary meaning of the words "moneys invested," would be covered or connoted by those words, and in my judgment property in the shape of railway shares falls within the meaning both of the words "moneys invested" and of the word "securities."

The moneys invested are authorized to be left and continued quâ investment in statu quo.

I wish to add, although it is not necessary to do so for the decision of this case, having regard to the ground upon which the court has decided it, that in my judgment the meaning of a word is relative to the circumstances and occasion and date on which the word is used, and that if a judge is entitled to take into consideration at all the fact that at the date of the will "securities" is largely used in a sense other than a pledge for an advance of money, or in the particular sense of investments in property transferable by the assignment of indicia, such as certificates, it is the duty of the judge to inform his mind not only by reference to the dictionaries of good reputation, but also to inform himself by evidence of the meaning ordinarily given to such a word amongst those who deal in such property. A rule prohibiting a judge from so doing would be, in my judgment, a most serious limitation of the rule that evidence is admissible for the purpose of explaining the meaning of the words used by the testator, as distinguished from evidence of the testator's intention; and would be also a serious limitation of the rule that for the purpose of explaining the meaning of the words used by the testator, evidence is admissible of the circumstances surrounding the testator at the time of making his will. I think that evidence is admissible to show that expressions used in the will had acquired an appropriate meaning either generally or by local usage or amongst particular classes, and that "where any doubt arises upon the true sense and meaning of the words themselves or any difficulty as to their application under the surrounding circumstances the sense and meaning of the language may be investigated and ascertained by evidence dehors the instrument itself; for both reason and common sense agree that by no other means can the language of the instrument be made to speak the real mind of the party." See the opinions of Parke, B., and Tindal, C.J., in Shore v. Wilson, 9 Cl. & Fin. 355, 566, and the judgment of Parke, B., in Richardson v. Watson, 4 B. & Ad. 787, 799. I quite recognize that a word used in a technical sense in a legal instrument must be construed in its strict legal sense, which in relation to such a document is its primary sense, although not necessarily its archaic sense, or its popular sense at the date of the instrument; but I do not think that a decision like that in Ogle v. Knipe controls the meaning of the word securities in a description of property disposed of by the testator.

That case merely decides that in that will, at that date, the words "money and securities for money of every description" (very different words from the present) did not carry Bank of England stock and canal shares. The decision certainly did not impress a "technical meaning" on the word "securities" or limit for ever the meaning of the word "securities" to its narrow archaic meaning.

ROMER, L.J.—In the absence of any context or admissible evidence from which it can be gathered that the word "securities" has another meaning, I agree with Farwell, J., that it must be taken in a will to have the meaning stated by him. And that the expressions "securities for money" and "investment of money in securities" would accordingly in the absence of anything sufficient to negative that view, be held to apply only to securities in the sense above stated. But the meaning of the word is a flexible one, and I recognize that it is largely used in a wider or different sense, and in particular is widely used as a synonym for "investments." Now, in the present case, after much hesitation and with the doubt I generally feel on the rare occasions when I come to a different conclusion from that arrived at by Farwell, J., I think there is sufficient in the will in question to show that the testator has used the word "securities" in the sense of "investments." I arrive at this conclusion chiefly from the clause in the will "and I authorize my trustees to continue or leave any moneys invested at my death in or upon the same securities." On the whole I think that the testator in the first part of this clause intended by the words "any moneys invested at my death" to refer to all investments of his moneys existing at the date of his death, and that by the words "the same securities" he meant "the same investments." This being so, I agree in thinking that the appeal should be allowed, for the word "investment" would cover investments by the testator in shares.

STIRLING, L.J.—The question on this appeal is whether the word "securities" as used in the will dated the 11th of December, 1895, of Edward William Rayner (who describes himself as of the City of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, general broker) includes stocks and shares of railway and other companies.

Farwell, J., has held that it does not, and his decision is in accordance with that of James, V.C., in 1869 in Ogle v. Knipe, on a will dated the 16th of March, 1841. Although there is not to be found in the English reports any subsequent decision on the point, I believe that this case has been repeatedly followed by judges of the Chancery Division. It is said, however, that the meaning of the word has changed since 1869, and that as ordinarily understood by mercantile men both in 1895 and at the present time it includes stocks and shares as well as mortgages on land and other property. As at present advised I am not prepared to say that this contention is well founded, but I think it is unnecessary to decide the question, which is one of importance, on this occasion. Even assuming that in the primary meaning of the word it is limited to "money secured on property," still, as is laid down by Lord Cranworth in Hicks v. Sallitt, 2 W. R. 173, 3 D. M. & G. 782, 794, another meaning may be given to it if there be pointed out "either some inconsistency in different parts of the will or a positive statement of such being the sense intended, or a reductio ad absurdum by not taking the word in a qualified sense." In Abbott v. Middleton, 7 H. L. C. 68, 89, the same learned judge says: "Where by acting on one interpretation of the words used we are driven to the conclusion that the person using them is acting capriciously, without any intelligible motive, contrary to the ordinary mode in which men in general act in similar cases, then if the language admits of two constructions we may reasonably and properly adopt that which avoids these anomalies, even though the construction adopted is not the most obvious or the most grammatically accurate." This passage was quoted with approval by Lord Cairns in Gordon v. Gordon, L. R. 5 H. L. 254, 284.

Now the passage to be construed is this, "I declare that all moneys liable to be invested under this my will may be invested in such securities as my trustees in their absolute discretion shall think fit. And I authorize my trustees to continue or leave any moneys invested at my death in or upon the same securities." If in the second of these sentences the word "securities" is limited to money secured on property, the result would be that if the testator at the time of his death had standing in his own name two parcels of shares, one being an investment of his own while the other was only security for an advance of money, the trustees would be at liberty to retain the latter but not the former. I think that such a course would be capricious and without any intelligible motive on the part of the testator, who, it is to be remembered, was a business man. In my opinion, therefore, the word "securities" in both sentences ought to be held to mean "investments."

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, W. Wynne & Sons, for Evans, Lockett, & Co., Liverpool; Van Sandau & Co., for Wright, Beckett, & Co., Liverpool; H. Forshaw & Hawkins, Liverpool.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Dec. 16.

WEBSTER v. SHARP & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Partial incapacity—Weekly payment—Earnings before accident—Earnings after accident—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule I., clause 2.

Where a workman claiming compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, is at the time of the arbitration only partially incapacitated, and has resumed work and is earning wages, but those wages are less than half the wages he was earning before the accident, there is no general rule by which the arbitrator ought, in assessing compensation, to award the maximum weekly payment allowed by the Act—viz., a payment of half the amount of the average weekly earnings before the accident; but he must exercise his discretion in each particular case.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Bradford County Court, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The workman in this case met with an accident in the course of his employment which resulted in his being incapacitated for work. His average weekly earnings before the accident were 24s. 9d. The workman and the employers came to an agreement whereby the employers were to pay him during the incapacity the weekly sum of half the amount of his average weekly earnings before the accident—viz., 12s. 4½d. The employers made this weekly payment for two years, and at the end of that time the workman resumed work under them. His average weekly earnings were then 11s. The employers having discontinued the weekly payment, the workman filed a request for arbitration as to the amount of compensation payable to him under the Act. The county court judge made an award for a weekly payment of 12s. 4½d., and recorded the grounds of his decision in the following note: "In my opinion the meaning of the Act is that the workman is to receive compensation for his loss of wages whether this is total or partial, but that for the protection of the employer there is the proviso that no more than half his wages is to be paid him. In the case of partial disablement I think the court should first ascertain what is the loss of wages the person has sustained—in this case 13s. 9d. I think that, if this is less than the maximum allowed—viz., half the original wages, the whole of such amount ought to be awarded, unless there is some reason to the contrary, but the court is not bound to award the whole of that amount, but may award a less amount, say, half the difference, if it sees fit. In this case 13s. 9d. exceeds the half wages, which are agreed at 12s. 4½d.; so I cannot give more than that amount; but I see no reason why I should not give the full amount allowed by the Act and award 12s. 4½d. This is the rule I always follow in these cases unless some grounds are given for varying it."

The employers appealed.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and Minton-Senhouse, for the employers.—The learned county court judge has laid down for himself a rule, which he follows in nearly every case, of bringing up the amount of compensation as nearly as possible to the original wages. His practice is to award the injured workman the maximum compensation allowed by the Act—viz., half the amount of his original weekly earnings, unless he is since the accident earning a larger sum a week than half his original weekly earnings. This involves a noncompliance with clause 2 of the first schedule to the Act, which provides that "in fixing the amount of the weekly payment regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident." The effect of the county court judge's rule of practice is that a man who is partially disabled gets more than a man who is totally disabled, and all inducement is taken away from employers to take on an injured workman at reduced wages.

J. J. Wright, for the applicant.—In Illingworth v. Walmsley, [1900] 2 Q. B. 142, 48 W. R. Dig. 117, it was held that clause 2 of the first schedule to the Act does not operate so as necessarily to cut down the maximum rate of compensation allowed by clause 1 (b) of the schedule. The county court judge in this case did not disregard clause 2. He conformed to the schedule. He did not consider himself bound to award the maximum, but he thought that he had power to do so.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed, and that the case must go back to the learned county court judge. He seems to have applied a hard-and-fast rule for determining the amount of the weekly payment where the workman is only partially disabled and is earning wages since the accident, which he thought ought to be followed in all cases. I am of opinion that it is impossible for a county court judge to lay down any hard-and-fast rule, and that it is his duty to exercise his discretion in each particular case. The statute limits the maximum weekly sum which may be awarded—viz., half the wages which the workman was earning at the time of the accident. That is the maximum weekly payment which the county court judge has to deal with, and it is to be noticed that the maximum is the same whether the compensation be for total or for partial disablement. It clearly does not follow that the maximum is to be given in every case. In my opinion it may well be that in some cases the judge would be well-advised not to give the maximum. The statute imposes on the county court judge the duty of exercising his discretion in the matter. Clause 2 of the first schedule says that "in fixing the amount of the weekly payment regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident." The difference which is here suggested as a topic for consideration seems only to be relevant for the purpose of reducing the payment below the maximum allowed by the Act. Although the county court judge is not bound to reduce the amount, he is contemplated as being in the position of a person who is invited to readjust a weekly payment which is already at the maximum with the view of reducing it. And this is so whether he is, as in this case, hearing an original application by the workman, or whether he is hearing an application under clause 12 of the schedule. I think the county court judge made a mistake in feeling himself bound to follow the rule of practice which he has adopted, and the case must therefore go back in order that he may apply his judicial discretion to the matter.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the applicant, W. H. Scott, Bradford.

Solicitors for the employers, Wynne-Baxter & Keeble.

From County Palatine of Lancaster. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Dec. 3, 4.

BRIGG v. THORNTON AND GRANT. (a.)

Landlord and tenant — Lease — Covenant — Restrictive covenant — Trade — Covenant not to let adjoining property for purposes of a particular trade—Meaning of term "artistic and heraldic stationer"—"Picture post-cards."

In 1901 the defendant T. demised to the plaintiff for twenty-one years premises in an arcade by an agreement containing a stipulation on the part of the plaintiff "not to carry on upon the premises any other trade or business than that of a dealer in pictures, prints, engravings, photographs, and articles of vertu, artistic and heraldic stationer, frame maker and dealer in photographic frames, artists' colours, and the accessories to said trade or business," and a stipulation on the part of the lessor (the defendant T.) "not to let any other portion of the said arcade for the trade or business hereinbefore mentioned to be carried on by" the plaintiff. In 1902 the defendant T. demised to the defendant G. for one year other premises in the arcade, adjoining the premises demised to the plaintiff, and this agreement contained a stipulation on the part of G. not to carry on, upon the premises demised to him, any other business than that of a "librarian, newsagent, bookseller, or stationer." The defendant G., in the course of the business carried on by him in the arcade, sold and dealt in (inter alia) picture post-cards, Christmas and New Year cards.

The plaintiff claimed an injunction and damages both against T. for letting and permitting the use of, and against G. for using, premises in the arcade for the purpose of carrying on a business similar to that carried on by the plaintiff.

Held, that, having regard to the terms of the plaintiff's agreement, the business contemplated to be carried on by him was of an aggregate description, and included as a substantial portion thereof that of "artistic and heraldic stationer"; that the subsequent letting of other premises in the arcade to the defendant G. for the purpose of carrying on (inter alia) the business of a "stationer" generally, without any limitation, was a breach on the part of the lessor T. of his stipulation in the agreement with the plaintiff "not to let" any other part of the arcade for the purpose of the trade or business carried on by the plaintiff, and that the defendant T. was liable in damages to the plaintiff in respect of such breach.

Held, further, that the plaintiff's claim against G. failed altogether, inasmuch as the express terms of the restrictive covenant only extended to "not letting," and did not restrict "the using of" the premises for the purpose above mentioned.

Kemp v. Bird, 25 W. R. 838, 5 Ch. D. 549, discussed.

Appeal from the decision of Hall, V.C., in the Palatine Court of Lancaster.

The facts were as follows: The plaintiff C. A. Brigg carried on business at Nos. 6 and 7, The Arcade, Lord-street, Liverpool, as a fine art dealer. The defendants, Robert and James Thornton, builders and contractors, were the landlords of the arcade in which the plaintiff's shop was situate. By the action as originally brought the plaintiff sought for an injunction to restrain Messrs. Thornton as such landlords from letting and allowing to remain let certain other premises, Nos. 8 and 9 in the arcade, immediately opposite those occupied by the plaintiff, or any part thereof, or any other portion of the arcade, for the purpose or any of the purposes of the business carried on by the plaintiff, in alleged violation of a covenant contained in the plaintiff's agreement for lease.

The action first came on for trial on the 25th of February, 1903, but upon being partially opened the Vice-Chancellor intimated that the tenant of the premises Nos. 8 and 9 ought to be joined as a defendant in the action, so as to have the case properly dealt with. Accordingly the defendant C. J. Grant, the tenant of Nos. 8 and 9, was added as a party, and the case came on for trial on the 29th of April.

The agreement for lease between the plaintiff and the Messrs. Thornton was dated the 30th of October, 1901, and contained, on the part of the plaintiff, the lessee, the following clause: "Not to carry on upon the premises any other trade or business than that of a dealer in pictures, oil and water colours, prints, engravings, photographs, etchings, and articles of vertu, artistic and heraldic stationer, frame-maker and dealer in photographic frames, artists' colours, and the accessories to the said trade or business." The agreement contained the following stipulation on the part of the landords: "Not to let any other portion of the said arcade for the trade or business hereinbefore mentioned to be carried on by the tenant" (i.e. the plaintiff). The plaintiff's agreement for lease was for twenty-one years at a rent of £150 per annum, and the plaintiff went into possession of the premises, which had only recently been completed, but no lease had as yet actually been granted. After the plaintiff had gone into occupation he found that all the shops in the arcade were not let, as he had been led to understand, and some remained unlet for a considerable time, one of them, the cause of the action, remaining unlet for twelve months after the plaintiff had gone into occupation of his shop. During the temporary absence of the plaintiff, he was told that the premises, Nos. 8 and 9, were let to a Mr. Latarche, and on his return the plaintiff found that it was to be opened as a "Libraire Francaise," and that stationery and picture postcards would be sold there. Directly these were exhibited the plaintiff wrote to the defendants Thornton calling their attention to the fact, and suggesting that they should inform the tenant that he must not sell or advertise these goods in the arcade, as such articles came within those specified in the clause in the plaintiff's agreement. Some correspondence took place, but nothing resulted, and various articles, such as Christmas cards and New Year cards, were from time to time exhibited, also views similar to those the plaintiff sold.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By an agreement dated the 25th of September, 1902, and made between the defendants Thornton and Grant, the Thorntons leased to Grant, for a term of one year, to begin on the 1st of October, 1902, a stall occupying the whole front portion of the shop Nos. 8 and 9 in the arcade. This agreement contained a stipulation that the tenant (Grant) should not carry on any other business than that of "a librarian, newsagent, bookseller, or stationer" without the previous consent in writing of the Thorntons. Grant commenced to carry on therein a business which included, as the plaintiff alleged, that of an artistic and heraldic stationer, and also dealt in pictures, prints, engravings, photographs, &c. (including picture postcards, Christmas and New Year cards). Grant, it appeared, was the manager for Mr. Latarche, who carried on practically the same business in Liverpool as the plaintiff carried on. A great deal of correspondence ensued, and a large number of letters passed between the solicitors of the various parties. Eventually after some delay a meeting took place on the 31st of October, 1902, between the defendants Thornton and Grant, the result of which was that Grant said he would give an undertaking not to sell photographs, but would not agree not to sell picture postcards or Christmas cards. Accordingly the writ in the action was issued on the 10th of November. The plaintiff alleged that by reason of the word "stationer" being included in the business which Grant was authorized to carry on, he was entitled to sell all things which other stationers sold all over the country; and the plaintiff objected to the sale by Grant of picture postcards, which constituted, as he alleged, "artistic stationery," a portion of the business carried on by the plaintiff. The plaintiff accordingly, by his amended claim, claimed an injunction to restrain Grant from selling such articles or carrying on a business which included that of an "artistic and heraldic stationer" and dealer in pictures, prints, engravings, etchings, &c.; he also claimed damages against Grant. The defendant Grant denied that the stall in Nos. 8 and 9 was let to him for the purpose of carrying on a business similar to that of Mr. Latarche or for any other business than that of a librarian, newsagent, bookseller, or stationer, and contended that the sale of picture postcards, Christmas cards, and New Year cards was a part of the business of a librarian, newsagent, bookseller, or stationer.

The Vice-Chancellor granted the injunction against the defendants Thornton during the continuance of the plaintiff's tenancy under the agreement of the 30th of October, 1901, from letting any portion of the arcade for trades or businesses which included those specified in the agreement with the plaintiff, and he also granted a similar injunction against the defendant Grant from taking or continuing to hold a lease or tenancy of, or using, the premises Nos. 8 and 9 in the said arcade for any trades or businesses similar to those specified in the plaintiff's agreement for lease; but the injunction was directed to be suspended for three months, and also in case of appeal.

From this decision the defendants Thornton and Grant appealed.

Neville, K.C., F. M. Preston, and H. Mather, for the appellants.—They cited the following cases: Kemp v. Bird, 25 W. R. 838, 5 Ch. D. 549, 974; Fitz v. Iles, [1893] 1 Ch. 77, 41 W. R. Dig. 208; De Mattos v. Gibson, 7 W. R. 100, 4 De G. & J. 276, 7 W. R. Ch. Dig. 27.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and R. B. Lawrence, for the respondent.—If you have the word "stationery" it would include all kinds of stationery, including "artistic and heraldic stationery": Stuart v. Diplock, 38 W. R. 223, 43 Ch. D. 343, 38 W. R. Dig. 60. In every separate trade it is a question of substance. All the evidence shows that there is no substantial trade distinction between "stationery" and "artistic stationery." "Artistic and heraldic stationery" may well be defined as "high class-stationery." When we prove that our client is a high-class stationer, then it is clearly proved that there has been a direct interference with his business. The only defence to the action would be that of a purchaser for valuable consideration, having the legal estate, without notice of the restrictive covenant. The defendant Grant has not shown he has the legal estate. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to Leech v. Schweder, 22 W. R. 292, 633, 9 Ch. App. 463, 22 W. R. Dig. 102.] Rogers v. Hosegood, 48 W. R. 202, 659, [1900] 2 Ch. 388, 48 W. R. Dig. 197, shows that the only conclusive answer to an action on a covenant such as this, is by the person possessing the legal estate without notice. The defendants had constructive notice of the covenant; they admitted in their defence that they were bound by the covenant.

They referred also to the following cases: Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774; London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 321, 620, 20 Ch. D. 562, 30 W. R. Dig. 179; Osborne v. Bradley, [1903] 2 Ch. 446; The Attorney-General v. Biphosphated Guano Co., 27 W. R. 621, 11 Ch. D. 327; Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 34 W. R. 405, 16 Q. B. D. 778, 34 W. R. Dig. 211; Mander v. Falcke, [1891] 2 Ch. 554, 39 W. R. Dig. 103, 158; Holloway Bros. v. Hill, [1902] 2 Ch. 612, 51 W. R. Dig. 81, in which Bryant v. Hancock, [1898] 1 Q. B. D. 716, 46 W. R. 386, was distinguished.

Neville, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an action which in substance is brought for the remedy of an alleged breach of a clause in an agreement for a lease. Now, the clause in the agreement which it is alleged is broken runs thus: "Not to let any other portion of the said arcade for the trade or business hereinbefore mentioned to be carried on by the tenant." It is said that there has been a breach of that clause. That clause, it will be observed, is a clause against letting, it is not a clause against using. Then one has to see whether there has been a breach of it, and in order to do that one must ascertain the meaning of the words "for the trade or business hereinbefore mentioned to be carried on by the tenant." One looks above to see what is the business hereinbefore mentioned and one finds out in an antecedent clause which runs thus: "Not to carry on upon the premises any other trade or business than that of a dealer in pictures, oil and water colours, prints, engravings, photographs, etchings, and articles of vertu, artistic and heraldic stationer, frame-maker and dealer in photographic frames, artists' colours and accessories to the said trade or business." I agree with the learned Vice-Chancellor that if one looks at the evidence and considers substantially what business it is which is mentioned in the earlier clause, the evidence shows that there has been a substantial breach of the covenant not to let any portion of the arcade for the trade or business hereinbefore mentioned. In order, however to arrive at this conclusion one is bound also to look at the letting from year to year to the defendant Grant, but it will be observed that that letting from year to year is a letting which is determinable by the lessor, I think upon a six months' notice. The words of that letting are in the third clause: "The tenant shall keep the said stall in good repair during the tenancy and in such repair shall deliver the same to the landlords on the determination of such term. The tenant shall not make any alteration in or addition to the said stall in order to carry on any business other than that of a librarian, newsagent, bookseller, or stationer, without the previous consent in writing of the landlords."

Now, if you look at the description of the business in the plaintiff Briggs's agreement and ask yourself the question whether the letting of the premises to the defendant Grant for the purpose of carrying on the business of a stationer would be a breach of the agreement not to let the arcade for the purpose of carrying on the business mentioned in Briggs's agreement, it seems to me that if there is no qualification of the word "stationer" or no limitation of what may be done under that business, the letting to Grant would be a substantial breach of the covenant in the agreement with Briggs. When once that conclusion has been arrived at it seems to me that one has got over the principal difficulty which exists in this case. But, assuming that the letting by the lessors to Grant is a breach of the lessors' covenant in the Briggs agreement, it still is necessary to consider what are the remedies of the plaintiff, and moreover against whom has he got those remedies? Now I think that if information had come to the plaintiff while this letting to Grant was threatened or in negotiation, the plaintiff could then probably have applied to the court for an injunction, not only to restrain the lessors from letting to Grant, but also to restrain Grant from taking these premises in breach of the covenant of the lessors with the plaintiff. And after the letting to Grant by the lessors had become an accomplished fact, in my judgment the plaintiff could have applied to the court for a declaration that that letting was a bad letting, and that declaration would have bound both lessors and Grant. But that is not what happened in this case. The plaintiff has not got any such declaration, nor has he got any such injunction as I have suggested. The truth of the matter is, that in this case the plaintiff has been content to allow the letting to Grant to stand as an existing fact, and not to impeach it. Such an injunction as he has obtained in the court below applies merely to future dealings with this property, and not to that dealing with the property which consisted in the letting of it to Grant. It seems to me that under those circumstances the remedy of the plaintiff against Grant (the tenant) is gone altogether and does not any longer exist. In my judgment the plaintiff cannot get either damages or an injunction against Grant in respect merely of the user by Grant of these premises. The plaintiff's right of action against Grant is for the breach of a covenant, not as to user, but the breach of a covenant as to letting; and inasmuch as he does not now impeach the letting, it seems to me that his remedy is merely a remedy against the lessors; and the remedy against the lessors, so far as letting to Grant is concerned, is merely a remedy in damages. No doubt if there was a reason to suppose that there was likely to be a further dealing with this property in the same way in which the lessors dealt with the premises when they let to Grant, there might then be a remedy by way of an injunction with regard to such future dealing with the property, and indeed the Vice-Chancellor has granted such an injunction; but I shall have to say a word in a moment about the necessity for that.

But the primary remedy in respect of this particular transaction is, in my judgment, that the plaintiff should have damages against the lessors for the breach of the covenant not to let; and it seems to me, the letting standing, that no damages in respect of that can be recovered by the plaintiff as against Grant.

So much for the damages. With a slight modification of wording, the direction of the Vice-Chancellor as to damages can stand. It cannot quite stand, because it will be seen that there is a reference in that direction to a common law injunction or something of the sort, and in my judgment there is no need of an injunction here at all. There is nothing in the facts of this case to lead one to suppose that there will be a repetition of a letting of this sort. In all probability the form which the letting took was a mere slip, and if the parties had been well advised in the transaction the letting might very well have been made in such words as would have limited the stationer's business to be carried on by Grant in such a way that it would not—even if there had been an express letting—have amounted to a breach of the covenant not to let any part of the arcade for the business mentioned in the agreement with the plaintiff.

In these circumstances no injunction will be necessary. There need only be liberty to apply, in the event—which is very improbable—of any attempt being made by and by to grant further lettings. There will be a declaration simply that the letting to Grant was a breach of the clause in the agreement with the plaintiff by the lessors not to let for the business before mentioned in that agreement; and an inquiry as to what damages have been sustained by such breach.

ROMER, L.J.—The parties here certainly raise, to my mind, a very puzzling question, but the conclusion I have come to is that, at any rate, the defendants Thornton must be held to have committed a breach of their agreement with the plaintiff. The trade or business referred to in the agreement with the plaintiff appears, as I gather from the document itself and the evidence, to be one of what I may call an aggregate kind; that is to say, it consists of several heads, and those heads appear to be detailed in the agreement itself, and amongst those heads I find "artistic and heraldic stationer," and also "dealer in photographs." Now, the conclusion I come to from the document and the evidence is, that those references to the heads of the trade or business are all references to substantial portions of the trade or business regarded as a whole, and that a substantial part of the business was that which is referred to in the words "artistic and heraldic stationer," and also by the part which refers to the photographs. I am here confining myself to the artistic and heraldic stationer. I cannot come to the conclusion that that was simply a mere accessory to another business—the business of a dealer in pictures, or pictures and water-colours. To my mind it was an essential part, or at any rate a substantial portion of the business regarded as a whole. That being so, when the defendants Thornton entered into their agreement with Grant they expressly authorized him by the terms of their letting to him to carry on the business of a stationer generally. Now, on the evidence it is reasonably clear that a stationer's business comprises more than the business which may be described under the head of "artistic and heraldic stationer." From the evidence I gather that stationers would carry on a business which would include, to a practical extent, the business (if regarded as a separate business) of artistic and heraldic stationers; and I come to the conclusion on the whole, therefore, that the letting by Thorntons to Grant was a letting to enable Grant to carry on a substantial portion of the trade or business referred to in the agreement with the plaintiff. Now that being so, it of necessity follows that there was a breach by the landlord of his covenant with the plaintiff, and there is no doubt that some damage at any rate has followed from that letting to Grant. That being so, the plaintiff is entitled, I think, to a declaration that the letting to Grant was a breach of the covenant with the plaintiff, and to an inquiry as to damages. For the reason given by Vaughan Williams, L.J., it is clearly not a case in which there was any necessity for an injunction with regard to future letting. But that I think shows the extent of the plaintiff's right. I cannot see that the plaintiff has established any right to hold the defendant Grant liable in this action. The covenant by Messrs. Thornton in their agreement with the plaintiff was only "not to let any of the other portions of the arcade for any trade or business referred to in that agreement." Nothing is said purporting to bind the lessors' property in the arcade generally in respect of user. Nothing is said as to prohibiting Messrs. Thornton from permitting a new tenant to use the property in any particular way, or purporting to bind the property. On the face of it the covenant is restricted in its form to "not to let." I suppose, having regard to the somewhat similar case of Kemp v. Bird, that such a covenant would not prevent the landlords themselves carrying on in the arcade any kind of business they chose; and it would not prevent them selling the arcade, or prevent the purchaser carrying on a similar business to that of the plaintiff. It is clear from the case of Kemp v. Bird that in cases like this the court ought not to presume any intention to extend a covenant such as this beyond what, on the face of it, it purports to be. As was said by James, L.J., in Kemp v. Bird, "Persons who are men of business, as they were here, are able to get protection and advice, and they must make their covenants express, so as to state what they really mean, and they cannot get a court of law or equity to supply something which they have not stipulated for in order to get a benefit which is supposed to have been intended." That being so, finding here simply a covenant to restrain letting, what are the plaintiff's remedies if a letting is about to be made, or has been made? If it is threatened, and if it is an improper letting, he can apply for an injunction. It is possible, though we need not go into detail in considering it, that even after a letting has been effected, if the tenant has notice express or implied (though probably he always would have implied notice), it may be that the plaintiff would be entitled to have the letting declared invalid possibly as against him. That may be. I need not consider it; but beyond that his rights do not extend. I find nothing which enables him to say "There is a letting; I do not apply to set aside that letting, I do not apply to prevent it; it is effective and it is there; but assuming the letting is a good letting and stands, I now ask the court to hold that the tenant cannot use the property under his tenancy except subject to a particular construction." I can find nothing in the covenant contained in the agreement with the plaintiff which enables the court to hold that; and in that respect I think we are bound by the principle of the decision in Kemp v. Bird.

The plaintiff does not seek any relief in the way of preventing the letting or the repetition of the letting as against him. On the contrary, he comes here and he asks for damages against Thorntons on the footing that there has been a letting, and no doubt he will seek to establish substantial damages possibly as against Thorntons on the very ground that that letting has allowed the tenant Grant to carry on the business he is carrying on, and which he cannot be stopped carrying on. That being so, it appears to me that the plaintiff here has no remedy against Grant. He cannot attack Grant, as being bound by any restrictive covenant affecting the user of the property during his tenancy; and Grant, not being a person, who has contracted with the plaintiff, cannot, of course, be sued for a breach of covenant. Under those circumstances there can be no damages, it appears to me, as against Grant, and the action against him ought to have been dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the Vice-Chancellor as to the construction which he has put upon the covenant in the agreement entered into between Messrs. Thorntons and the plaintiff, and for the reasons which he has given and which my brothers have given; to these I cannot usefully add anything. But I should like to say one word upon the case as regards the defendant Grant, who has taken the subsequent lease. As regards him the case is based upon the stipulation in the agreement with the plaintiff, that the lessors would not let any other portion of the arcade for the trade or business mentioned to be carried on by the tenant, that is, the plaintiff. We are really asked to read that as if it mere a stipulation that the lessor would not let or use any other portion of the arcade for the trade or business mentioned to be carried on by the plaintiff. In my opinion that is not the fair construction of the covenant. I say so for the same reasons as were given by Fry, J., in the case of Kemp v. Bird—namely, that the covenant as it stands is perfectly intelligible and reasonable. In the second place, the construction contended for by the plaintiff creates a much wider obligation than is imported by the strict words of the covenant. The lessors, Messrs. Thornton, might, upon my reading of the covenant, either themselves carry on the same business as the plaintiff upon another part of the arcade, or they might have sold part of the arcade for that purpose. The covenant being as it stands intelligible and rational, it does not appear to me that there is any reason for reading it as extending to include not merely the letting, but the user, of the other portions of the arcade. I may point out that if as I think is the true construction of the agreement in this case, the assigns of Messrs. Thornton are bound (and those include lessees), still the same objection arises, because the only obligation upon such an assign is not to let a portion of the premises, and he is not prohibited from using them. It seems to me, therefore, that the relief which the Vice-Chancellor has granted as against Messrs. Thornton, is not that to which the plaintiff is entitled. It may be that the plaintiff in this case has failed to protect himself to the extent which he desired, but that does not appear to be sufficient reason for altering what is, in my judgment, the plain construction of the covenant.

Solicitors for the appellants, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Bremner, Sons, & Corlett, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondent, Sharpe, Parker, & Co., for Charles Garnett, Liverpool.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } July 1, 2, 1903.

WHITE v. METCALF. (a.)

Mortgage—Foreclosure—Account—Receiver—Repairs—Mortgagee not in possession—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 24, sub-section 8 (i.) (ii.) (iii.).

A receiver, not in possession of mortgaged premises, has no power to make repairs without the written authority of the mortgagee, and then only to the extent of the rents and profits. In taking an account, therefore, in foreclosure proceedings, the mortgagee is not entitled to the cost of such repairs made without such written authority.

Summons by the plaintiffs, who were the first mortgagees of certain leasehold premises, to determine whether they were entitled to be allowed the cost of repairs done to the mortgaged premises.

The defendants, Metcalf and Greig, were the lessees of a block of flats for a term of years under a lease wherein they covenanted, among other things, to repair and keep the premises in repair.

On the 14th of November, 1892, they mortgaged this property to one Godfree, to secure £2,500.

On the 24th of March, 1893, they mortgaged their equity of redemption to the defendant Rawlinson to secure £1,000. On the 30th of June, 1893, Godfree transferred his security to Rawlinson. On the 5th of September, 1894, Rawlinson made a further advance of £500, making the total sum advanced £4,000.

On the 22nd of September, 1899, this mortgage was absolutely assigned to the plaintiffs, the defendant Rawlinson joining in the transfer as mortgagee, and at the request of the mortgagors, but subject to the mortgagors' equity of redemption under the indenture of the 30th of June, 1893, and their interest under another indenture which comprised other property.

By the mortgage deed under which the plaintiffs were entitled, the defendants Metcalf and Greig covenanted to observe and perform the covenants of the lease during the continuance of the mortgage. On the 22nd of September, 1899, the plaintiffs effected a policy of assurance with the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, guaranteeing the plaintiffs against loss in respect of this mortgage.

On the 5th of March, 1902, the plaintiffs under the powers conferred on them by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, appointed Mr. T. R. Ronald, the general manager of the Law Guarantee and Trust Society receiver of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises, who entered into the receipts of the rents and profits accordingly.

The plaintiffs alleged that the covenants in the lease as to repairs were not fulfilled by the mortgagors, and the rents and profits not being sufficient for the purpose, the receiver expended a sum of £217 7s. 6d. in repairs, the money being supplied by the Law Guarantee and Trust Society.

On the 18th of July, 1902, the plaintiffs commenced an action by originating summons for foreclosure against the mortgagors and Rawlinson, the second mortgagee.

On the 10th of August they obtained an order nisi for foreclosure on the footing that they were not in possession of the mortgaged premises, and an account was directed to ascertain what was due to the plaintiffs under their security.

The plaintiffs claimed to be allowed the cost of the repairs, and took out this summons to have this question determined.

E. Beaumont, for the plaintiffs.—The mortgagee, who has expended money in necessary repairs, is entitled to be allowed that expenditure in taking an account.

Warrington, K.C., and E. P. Hewitt, for the second mortgagee.—The cost of repairs cannot be allowed. Under section 23 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, the receiver is only agent for the mortgagor for the purpose of receiving rents. He cannot expend money unless expressly authorized to do so by the mortgagee. The first mortgagees are not in possession and cannot themselves repair, and the receiver can only do so on their written direction out of the rents. If the repairs are urgent the mortgagee must go into possession to do them.

They cited In re Leslie, Leslie v. French, 31 W. R. 561, 23 Ch. D. 552; and Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., 35 W. R. 143, 34 Ch. D. 234.

Beaumont, in reply.—The claim for this money is on behalf of the first mortgagees, not of the receiver, and has been expended on necessary repairs, and they are entitled to be allowed the costs of these repairs in taking the account. It is immaterial who found the money. In In re Leslie Fry, J., mentions four cases in which a lien might be created on money secured by a policy by payment of premiums—the fourth one being "by reason of the right vested in mortgagees, or other persons having a charge upon the policy, to add to their charge any moneys which have been paid by them to preserve the property." That applies not only to the case of policies, but is of general application, as here, to expenses incurred in making the property more valuable. For this purpose it makes no difference whether the mortgagee is in or out of possession.

KEKEWICH, J.—This summons really covers a point of considerable difficulty, which appears to be one of entire novelty. It is a summons issued in a foreclosure action, the plaintiffs being the first mortgagees, and the defendant a second mortgagee and the mortgagors. It seems that some questions of account as to the sum of interest and the date when it was payable have arisen in chambers, and it is desired to have these questions settled by the court before the certificate goes. But in truth the only question which has been argued is not at all what one would have expected, but is the question whether in taking the account to ascertain the sum due to the plaintiffs the cost of certain repairs is to be allowed. What has happened is that there is a receiver who is not in possession, but is in receipt of the rents and profits of the mortgaged property, which, although the same thing for many purposes, is, of course, really entirely different. It is necessary to consider who that receiver is, and what is his office and character. Long before the Legislature intervened to simplify the rights and remedies of a mortgagee, it was very common to provide in a mortgage deed that the mortgagee might appoint a receiver, and he often appointed at once. But it was always provided that the receiver was to be the agent of the mortgagor. He was, of course, appointed to protect the mortgagee, but as a third person, in whose hands the money was stopped; he was to pay rates and taxes and other outgoings, and then was directed to pay the net balance of the moneys he received to the mortgagor, after paying what was due for interest to the mortgagee. Now there can be no question that a receiver appointed in that way could not possibly execute repairs and charge them against the mortgagee. The mortgagee would be entitled to say, on taking the receiver's account, "You have received so much for rent, and out of that you must pay outgoings, but beyond that you can pay nothing without my direction. Subject to the payment of outgoings, the rent and profits form a net sum applicable in the first instance to keeping down the interest, and the balance will then go to the mortgagor. But not a single penny can be spent otherwise before my interest is discharged unless it was so expressly provided in the terms of the deed, or you have my express authority." That was the object and the result of the appointment of a receiver before 1881. Now, the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, in this particular, as in many others, merely adopted the practice of conveyancers, and section 24 only sets out in a concise form what has been embodied before in mortgage after mortgage. By sub-section 1 it empowers a mortgagee, who has become entitled to exercise the power of sale conferred by the Act to "appoint such person as he thinks fit to be receiver." Sub-section 2 says that such a receiver "shall be deemed to be the agent of the mortgagor," in other words, if the receiver takes the rents and profits, leaving the mortgagee in the lurch, the mortgagor still remains liable on his covenant. There follow certain directions as to what the receiver may receive, his remuneration, and his duty to insure if so directed in writing by the mortgagee. Then sub-section 8 provides for the application of all money received by him (1) "in discharge of all rents, taxes, rates, and outgoings"; (2) "in keeping down all annual sums or other payments and the interest" on prior charges; then by sub-clause (3) "in payment of . . . the cost of executing necessary or proper repairs directed in writing by the mortgagee." So that as regards repairs, the receiver's only authority is that of the mortgagee. The mortgagor cannot give him that authority. It would be a monstrous thing if he could, and entirely contrary to practice and the law attaching to that practice. What he has in his hands is applicable to keeping down the mortgage interest, and the balance then belongs to the mortgagor; but until the interest is kept down that balance belongs to the mortgagee. In fact, the only discharge the receiver can get is from the mortgagee. It is from the mortgagee that he gets his authority, and it is to him that he is accountable, and the mortgagor is responsible for him. In the present case the receiver has thought fit, without any direction from the mortgagee, to execute certain repairs. Let us assume, then, they were highly desirable, that the premises would not let otherwise, and that the money was well spent with judgment and good faith in order to secure a good tenant. That may have been a very wise thing for a landowner to do, but the landowner is not the mortgagor for this purpose, but the mortgagee, who is entitled to say that he will have his interest paid, and that the repairs shall not be done until that is paid. Then it is said that because the receiver in this case is the manager of a society which has guaranteed the mortgagee against loss, that therefore he is entitled to do something which any other receiver could not do. I see nothing in the old practice, or in the Act itself, to bear out that suggestion. The society which has guaranteed this mortgage is in the position of any other guarantors, and is no doubt entitled to enforce its rights by being subrogated to the rights of the principal whom it protects, but for the moment it is a mere stranger. It is not a party to this action at all, and in no way bound by the account. I am asked to regard this receiver in two capacities—as a receiver appointed by the plaintiffs', the agent of the mortgagor, with the limited powers which the Act points out, and also as agent of this society. But the only person I can regard is Mr. Ronald, the agent of the mortgagor appointed receiver under this Act. In that character it seems to me that he cannot justify any expenditure on repairs unless authorized in writing by the mortgagee, and then only to the extent of the rents and profits.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I therefore hold that the first mortgagees having expended money on repairs, have no right to charge it against the second mortgagee. There will be a direction to the master that in taking the account, he is not to allow to the first mortgagees any moneys expended on repairs or otherwise, except necessary or proper repairs within section 24 of the Act, and paid for out of rents and profits on the direction in writing of the mortgagees.

Solicitors, Merriman, White, & Thompson; Needham, Tyer, & Barrow.

Chan. Div. } Feb. 10-13, 15, 17.
Farwell, J. }

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MAYOR, &c., OF NOTTINGHAM. (a.)

Nuisance—Smallpox hospital—Action quia timet—Weight and sufficiency of evidence.

Where the site of a smallpox hospital is carefully chosen, is in a proper situation, and constitutes no appreciable danger to the public health and no nuisance to private property, and the hospital itself is properly managed and all precautions taken to prevent infection that scientific skill and knowledge require, the facts, that the hospital is within fifty-one feet of a high road and that there is some risk of infection even when the utmost care is taken, do not outweigh the benefits accruing to the public in general from the maintenance of a smallpox hospital that reduces the risk for every inhabitant of the district wherein it is situate. To warrant an injunction restraining the use of such a hospital there must be a strong probability, almost amounting to moral certainty, that the hospital will be an actionable nuisance.

Action quia timet.

The plaintiffs were the Attorney-General ex relatione and the owners and occupiers of premises in the parish of Bestwood, Nottinghamshire, and the defendants were the mayor and corporation of Nottingham. The plaintiffs sought to restrain the defendants from maintaining a smallpox hospital that had been erected by them within fifty-one feet of a high road, and within half a mile of the residence of one of the plaintiffs, within 200 yards of the premises occupied by another plaintiff, and within various distances, not exceeding half a mile in any case, from the residence of others; and it was alleged that the use of the hospital caused great danger of the spread of infection among the inhabitants of the neighbourhood and people using the highway. Other material facts are stated in the judgment.

Upjohn, K.C., and Llewellyn Davies.—Plaintiffs must establish a strong probability of apprehended mischief.

(a.) Reported by H. STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They called a number of expert witnesses to prove the danger to be apprehended by reason of the hospital's proximity to a high road and to dwellings, and they cited Hill v. Metropolitan Asylums Board, 6 App. Cas. 193, 207, 42 L. T. N. S. 212, 47 L. T. N. S. 29; R. v. Vantandello, 4 M. & S. 73; R. v. Burnett, 4 M. & S 272; R. v. Lister, 3 Jur. N. S. 570; Attorney-General v. Shrewsbury Bridge Co., 21 Ch. D. 752.

Asquith, K.C., Macmorran, K.C., and R. J. Parker.—If the views expressed by the plaintiff's expert witnesses are acted on, the provision of smallpox hospitals will become impossible in many parts of the country, and the only alternative will be treatment at the patients' homes. Although not bound by the rules of the Local Government Board, since no loan was required, the hospital had been erected in a place reasonably near the neighbourhood to be served by it, and as isolated as possible; the hospital had not within a quarter of a mile radius a population of 200, although within a half mile radius there was an employed population of 600.

They differentiated Hill v. Metropolitan Asylums Board, which was not an action quia timet, and cited Fleet v. Metropolitan Asylums Board, 2 T. L. R. 361; Attorney-General v. Guildford Corporation, 12 T. L. R. 54; Attorney-General v. Manchester Corporation, 41 W. R. 459, [1893] 2 Ch. 87; Harrop v. Ossett Corporation, 14 T. L. R. 308; Benbelow v. Wortley, 57 L. J. Ch. 762; Attorney-General v. Rathmines (Ireland), 1st of February, 1904, not yet reported.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 17.—FARWELL, J.—This is an action to restrain the defendants from using a building lately erected and used as a smallpox hospital from so using it, on the ground that it is a nuisance, necessarily causing serious danger to the public health and causing special damage to the relator plaintiffs. No actual case of injury has arisen; and the action is quia timet. In order to succeed in such an action the plaintiffs must show a strong case of probability that the apprehended mischief will in fact arise—[His lordship here cited Attorney-General v. Manchester Corporation, [1893] 2 Ch. 87]—or in other words the law requires proof by the plaintiffs of a well-founded apprehension of injury—proof of actual and real danger—a strong probability almost amounting to moral certainty that if the hospital be established it will be an actionable nuisance. A sentiment of danger and dislike, however natural and justified, certainty that the hospital will be disagreeable or inconvenient, proof that it will abridge a man's pleasure or make him anxious, the inability of the court to say that no danger will arise, and none of these accompanied by depreciation of property, are not sufficient to remove the burden of proof resting on the plaintiffs or to justify a merely precautionary injunction restraining an owner's use of his own land upon the ground of apprehended nuisance to his neighbours—[citing the language of Fitzgibbon, L.J., in Attorney-General v. Rathmines (unreported)]. Further, the defendants are entitled to ask the court to assume that the hospital will be properly managed and that all the precautions that scientific skill and knowledge usually require will be taken, and they are entitled in the present case to the benefit of the observation that the hospital has been open and has received patients for the last six months, during the last half of which it has been full, and that no mischief has at present arisen therefrom. The hospital stands on a piece of ground 4½ acres in extent, roughly triangular in shape, the base of the triangle being about 350 yards long and abutting on the high road. It is enclosed on all sides except one with a close wooden fence 6ft. 6in. high, with barbed wire on the top, and there is an inside fence of barbed wire 20ft. distant. The hospital building is 51ft. from the high road. On the side where there is no fence there is a stream nearly 20ft. wide with a steep bank 15ft. or 20ft. high sloping abruptly from the hospital grounds down to the river. There are 204 residents within a quarter-mile radius from the building and 510 within the half-mile radius. There are 230 men employed on the Bestwood ironworks, part of which is within the quarter-mile radius, and 1,280 on the colliery, which is without the quarter-mile radius but within the half-mile radius; but the majority of the latter work underground, and some 45 men work at the bleach works outside the quarter-mile radius and within the half-mile radius. The hospital is some miles from the populous parts of Nottingham, and has access to the city by means of a road which has few houses on either side and is not much used for general traffic. The nearest private residence is a cottage, with five inmates, 48 yards distant, and the next nearest are six cottages, with 23 inmates, 157 yards distant.

The plaintiffs' allegation that the hospital is a nuisance rests on the establishment as a general affirmation of the proposition that all smallpox hospitals necessarily constitute a serious danger to the health of persons resident, working, or passing by within a radius of at any rate 51ft. This is obviously a very serious question. Having regard to the impossibility of stamping out smallpox under the existing laws and to the practical impossibility of isolating an outbreak in crowded areas, the court ought not to come to any conclusion that would result in closing the majority of the smallpox hospitals in the kingdom unless the expert testimony is really conclusive. Now it is clear from the evidence that I have heard in this case that the medical profession are divided into two camps on this question, each containing persons of eminence and experience. The first point of difference is on the theory of aerial convection for any considerable distance—say, for more than 50ft. This is a purely scientific question, and I gratefully adopt Lord Bowen's statement in Fleet v. Metropolitan Asylums Board, that "it would be most dangerous to form an independent opinion on a scientific question from the smatterings of science that might be picked up during the hearing of a case." The plaintiffs do not contend that there is a consensus of expert opinion on the point, and therefore it is enough for me to say that it is not proven, and that I am not competent to form an opinion of my own on the question. If the plaintiffs could have established aerial convection for the requisite distance they would have had a strong case in that they would have shown the reason why danger should exist; but, failing this, they are driven to the empirical opinions of experts. This is, of course, a legitimate and usual mode of proof; and the court in the case of a conflict of experts, may either say that the onus is on the plaintiff and has not been discharged, or it may examine the facts and the reasoning given by the experts as the ground of their opinion; and, so far as that reasoning can be tested by ordinary rules independent of special scientific knowledge, I feel bound to test it and not to state simply that the plaintiffs have not discharged the burden cast on them. I will take an example of the reasoning of the plaintiff's witnesses. The opinion of this witness is a conclusion of logic, not of medical science, and he seeks to extend an induction founded on cases observed by or known to him to all other cases; but the induction fails; for the conclusion that all hospitals are sources of danger does not necessarily follow from the premise that some hospitals are such; or, in other words, his cases are not sufficiently exhaustive, and his reasoning is a mere instance of the method of the ancients described by Bacon as inductio per enumerationem simplicem, ubi non reperitur instantia contradictoria. There is the further difficulty that the cases are complicated by so many varying circumstances that the application of the methods of agreement and difference is impracticable. If the case had rested on the plaintiffs' evidence alone, I should have had great difficulty in adopting the conclusions as sufficiently proved; but the court is in possession of a number of other cases in which smallpox hospitals have been full during outbreaks of the disease, and in which no case has occurred within the quarter-mile radius that could not be accounted for by some means other than the hospitals. The plaintiffs' case depends on the inference to be drawn from an unbroken series of facts. In all cases where A has occurred, B has followed, therefore A causes B. But the conclusion depends on the universality of the premise, and a negative instance unexplained spoils the chain. It would serve no useful purpose for me to go through the evidence in detail, but with regard to the plaintiffs' historical instances, if I may so call them, they have already figured in former actions, and very recently in the Irish Court of Appeal in the Rathmines case, and have never been accepted as sufficient. It is important to remember that the Compulsory Notification of Diseases Act came into force only in 1899, and that before that it must obviously have been far more difficult, if not impracticable, to obtain trustworthy and sufficient data from which to generalize; and, indeed, I may well adopt FitzGibbon, L.J.'s, comment in the Rathmines case on them: "Cases such as Fulham, Sheffield, Bradford, and Nottingham may be explained by reason of the character of a neighbourhood and their other circumstances." The defendants' evidence is very strong. It is not for them to prove the negative, but their instances are amply sufficient to break the chain of the plaintiffs' affirmative cases, even if I were satisfied that they had proved them. There is, of course, some risk of infection wherever there is smallpox owing partly to the folly of bystanders and of friends and relations of the patients and partly to the human fallibility of doctors and attendants, however careful. But, in considering the question from the point of view of a public nuisance, one must bear in mind that it is necessary for the public safety that some provision should be made for isolation, that the difficulties in the way of isolating in the case of the poor living in one or two rooms or crowded together in a single cottage are very great, and that it is a choice of evils. This consideration is mentioned by Chitty, J., in Attorney-General v. Manchester Corporation. And the same consideration applies, though perhaps not to the same extent, to the private nuisance alleged by the plaintiffs. If the fact of a public nuisance were established, it would of course be no answer to the private owners to say that the hospital must be placed somewhere—[His lordship cited Lord Blackburn in Hill v. Metropolitan Asylums Board, 6 App. Cas. 207]—but where the question is whether the nuisance in fact exists or not, all the circumstances must be taken into consideration; and, after all, the owners and occupiers of the adjacent lands have a far more effective prophylactic provided for them by medical science than by any injunction of any court. I respectfully agree with the following passage in FitzGibbon, L.J.'s, judgment in the Rathmines case: "It seems probable that the dread of smallpox is to a great extent the result of tradition. That scourge of the eighteenth century retains its terrors for those who do not realize that it has been deprived of most of its dangers. Vaccination is not only a preventive, but it also modifies the disease. . . . In applying the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, the duty of reasonable precaution for one's own protection is not to be ignored. An isolation hospital reduces the risk for every inhabitant of the district. It is, in fact, a necessity, and though the individual must be protected, the public advantage should not be forbidden unless the danger and injury to the individual are clearly proved." In the present case I find as the result of the evidence that the site of the defendants' hospital was carefully chosen, is in a proper situation, and constitutes no appreciable danger to the public health and no nuisance to the relator plaintiff's property. As I understand that this case is likely to go to the House of Lords, I desire to add an observation as to the evidence in the hope of obtaining some direction from a superior tribunal. Both parties concurred in asking me to accept evidence in chief of what had happened with other hospitals, and I acceded to the request in deference to the opinion expressed in Hill v. Metropolitan, &c., and also because the same evidence of the same cases (with the same result) appears to have been admitted in the other reported cases relating to smallpox hospitals. I suggest that the admission of such evidence in chief is wrong in principle, as raising a number of side issues on which it is impossible for the court to adjudicate without injury to absent parties—e.g., how can I rely on the case of the hospital ships (Fleet v. Metropolitan Asylums Board) as a proved fact in the present case without injustice to them? If the assumption in the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in Hill v. Metropolitan Asylums Board, 42 L.T. 212, were correct in fact, the evidence would be valuable, but there are numbers of such hospitals and their conditions are infinitely various and the extent and value of such differences are exceedingly difficult to estimate. As Lord Bowen pointed out in the Fleet case, it is no part of the functions of the court to qualify itself as an expert in science. The court acts on the opinion of experts whose qualifications can be tested by cross-examination, and weighs the evidence so given and tested. The result is that the action fails and is dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, Hind & Robinson, for Wells & Hind, Nottingham; Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, Barham, & Lawford, for Sir Samuel G. Johnson, Town Clerk, Nottingham.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) July 8, 1903.

MILES v. HUTCHINGS. (a.)

Criminal law—Shooting at dog—Malicious intention— Bonâ fide belief that act was necessary—Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), s. 41.

The test of whether a person is liable to conviction, against whom an information under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 41, has been laid, is whether he acted under a bonâ fide belief, right or wrong, that it was necessary for him to do the act complained of in order to protect his own or his master's property.

Daniel v. Janes, (1877) L. R. 2 C. P. 351, 25 W. R. Dig. 91, considered.

Case stated by justices for the county of Southampton.

At the petty sessions held at the Castle of Winchester on the 25th of April, 1903, an information was preferred by Frederick Hutchings, the respondent, against John Miles, the appellant, under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), s. 41, charging that the appellant did unlawfully and maliciously kill a dog, the property of one Sheldon.

At the hearing it was proved, and the justices found as facts, that the appellant was a gamekeeper; that on the day in question he saw a fox terrier dog near an aviary in which pheasants, the property of his master, were confined for breeding purposes; that he fired two shots at the dog; that the dog died from the effects of the shots, and that the dog was then wearing a collar bearing the name and address of the owner engraved on it.

It was stated on behalf of the appellant that the pheasants had been very much troubled and injured by stray dogs; that notice boards had been put up against people letting their dogs stray near the aviary; that various people owning dogs near the aviary had been personally asked to keep their dogs away; that Sheldon, the owner of the dog shot, had not been personally warned, as the appellant did not know that he kept a dog; that the appellant shot at the dog with the intention of driving it away and not with the intention of killing it, and that he thought it necessary to shoot at the dog in order to protect his master's property.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that it was lawful to kill any animal so found straying, and that the shooting of the dog was in law neither unlawful nor malicious so as to bring the act complained of within the provisions of the statute.

The justices, however, were of opinion that the evidence given before them brought the case within the operation of the statute; that the appellant had no right to shoot the dog, and that if any damage had been done by the dog there were other ways of proceeding without shooting the dog.

They therefore convicted the appellant of the offence, and ordered him to pay £2 for damages and 9s. costs.

The questions for the opinion of the court were (1) Whether the case came within the provisions of section 41 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861; (2) whether the appellant was legally convicted of the offence charged against him.

Section 41 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, provides that "Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously kill, maim, or wound a dog, bird, beast, or other animal not being cattle, but being either the subject of larceny at common law or being ordinarily kept in a state of confinement or for any domestic purpose, shall on conviction thereof before a justice of the peace, at the discretion of the justice, be liable to imprisonment or a fine not exceeding £20."

Cancellor, for the appellant.—The conviction was wrong, as in order to bring an act within section 41 of the Act of 1861 it must be shown that the act was done maliciously, and not an act done under the impression, right or wrong, that the party doing it was justified in doing it to save his premises from trespass: Daniel v. Janes, L. R. 2 C. P. 351, 25 W. R. Dig. 91; Smith v. Williams, 9 Times L. R. 9, 56 J. P. 840; Bryan v. Eaton, 40 J. P. 213. In the recent case of Armstrong v. Michell, 88 L. T. Rep. 870, 51 W. R. Dig. 6, it was held that shooting at a dog that was trespassing without intending to kill it, but with the intention of injuring it if necessary to frighten it away, was not of necessity cruelly ill-treating it. The court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., and Channell, J.) there expressly said that each case was question of degree, and was for the justices. Here the question is not whether the appellant might have driven the dog away without shooting at him, but whether the shooting was malicious, or prompted by an honest desire and intention of protecting his master's property.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The question raised by this case is of considerable importance, and it has been raised on more than one occasion for the consideration of the court. I think, however, that the facts at present stated are insufficient to enable us to deal satisfactorily with the case, and that it must be sent back to the justices for further statement. The justices say that it was stated on behalf of the appellant that he shot at the dog, not with the intention of killing it, but with the intention of driving it away. But when they come to express their opinion on the case, they merely say that the appellant had no right to shoot the dog. They therefore have not dealt with the important question whether the appellant bonâ fide believed that the only way of protecting his master's property was to act as he did—a point upon which it is most desirable to have their finding.

In Daniel v. Janes Lord Coleridge, C.J., said: "The forty-first section of the Act upon which the conviction proceeded points to a crime, the unlawful or malicious killing or maiming the animals referred to, simply for the purpose of indulging a cruel disposition, and not to an act done under an impression, right or wrong, that the party is justified in protecting his premises from a trespass by such means, especially after notice given." Here the act was said to be done by the appellant for the protection of the property of his master; and while feeling all respect for the decision of Lord Coleridge I cannot agree with all that is there said. I cannot help expressing my opinion that the real test is whether the appellant was bonâ fide doing an act which he thought was necessary for the protection of his master's property. If he did so believe, the allegation that he was acting unlawfully and with malice would be negatived. If, however, he fired at the dog unneccessarily and without any such bonâ fide belief, I think that the offence of unlawfully and maliciously killing the dog would be made out. It is therefore important that the facts should be clearly stated on this point, and for this reason it is necessary that the case should go back in order to have the fact more clearly ascertained.

a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WILLS, J.—I agree. I think the case of Daniel v. Janes was correctly decided upon the facts before the court, but the test laid down by Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., involves a general proposition which, I think, puts somewhat too broadly the right of a person to do an act of the kind in question. It is not enough that he should be under the impression, right or wrong, that he is justified in protecting his premises from trespass or (as in the present case) his master's property from injury; if he knows that much less violent measures would attain his object he is not justified in resorting to such means as killing or wounding the animal. I think that the test laid down by my lord is a more accurate and a safer guide in practice.

CHANNELL, J.—I also agree that the case must be sent back. While the justices have found that the shooting was unnecessary, they have found nothing as to the appellant's bonâ fide belief. I think that the malicious intention is negatived if the man wrongly, but honestly, thought it was necessary to shoot the dog in order to drive it away.

Case remitted to justices.

Solicitors for the appellant, Prior, Church, & Adams, for Percy W. Snelling, Winchester.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wright, Kennedy, Darling, and Phillimore, JJ.) — Nov. 27.

REX v. WYATT. (a.)

Criminal law—Evidence—Obtaining credit by fraud—Evidence of criminal acts other than those charged—Evidence tending to show system—Admissibility.

Upon the trial of a prisoner who was indicted for unlawfully obtaining credit by false pretences and fraud from a person who let apartments, evidence was admitted showing that the prisoner had shortly before obtained apartments at other houses and had left without payment,

Held, that the evidence was relevant and admissible, as tending to show a system of fraud and negativing accident or mistake or any honest motive on the part of the prisoner.

Case stated by J. Willis Bund, Esq., the chairman of Worcestershire Quarter Sessions.

The prisoner was tried on the 19th of October, 1903, on an indictment charging that he, on the 4th of August, 1903, and on other days, unlawfully, in incurring a certain debt to one Rhoda Williams to the amount of fourteen shillings and sixpence, did obtain credit to the amount of the debt from Rhoda Williams under false pretences. There was a second count charging him with obtaining credit for the same amount from the same person by means of fraud other than false pretences. It was proved that the prisoner came to Mrs. Williams' house and asked if she let apartments. She replied that she did, and he asked if she could take him. She asked for how long, and he replied for the night only. She agreed to take him in, and he asked for tea, and had a chop, bread and butter, and cake. He had a bed and a sitting room. He stayed on three days and then owed fourteen shillings and sixpence. Then in consequence of something the landlady had heard she took him the bill, but made out for four shillings and ninepence only, and asked for payment. Prisoner asked if she wanted it then particularly. She said she did as she had information and had seen newspaper cuttings which led her to believe that he was the man who went about getting apartments and leaving without paying. Prisoner after a time admitted he was the man mentioned, and said he had nothing then but would go and try to get something. He said that his luggage was detained at an hotel. He went away and returned shortly and offered the landlady one shilling and asked her to let him stay. She refused, and he asked for his things and left.

At the conclusion of the evidence for the prosecution the chairman stated that while there was ample evidence of a debt having been incurred and credit obtained, he thought that it was very doubtful if there was sufficient evidence to justify a jury in saying the credit was obtained by fraud. Counsel for the prosecution then proposed to call the hotel-keeper and other witnesses to prove that prisoner had had apartments at their houses and had left owing money. The chairman stated that he was very doubtful if such evidence was admissible, as it involved an inquiry into each of the different cases whether the prisoner had in each been guilty of a criminal offence—namely, obtaining credit by fraud, as obtaining credit was not of itself an offence; and that this fact distinguished the case from those where evidence of different acts, such as passing false coin, can be given in evidence, and that to admit such evidence was, in effect, to try not merely the case in the indictment, but also whether the prisoner had been guilty of fraud in a number of other cases not charged in the indictment at the same time. The chairman, however, admitted the evidence subject to the statement of the present case, and, assuming such evidence to be admissible, it proved the prisoner had gone to several houses and had left without paying, and still owed the money when he went to the house of the prosecutrix.

The chairman directed the jury that to convict the prisoner they must be satisfied that he incurred a debt, that he obtained credit by means of fraud, and that if they were satisfied that the prisoner went to the prosecutrix's house without any intention of paying for his accommodation, they would be legally justified in finding him guilty. The jury convicted the prisoner, and he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment in the third division. The question of law for the determination of the court was whether on the above indictment the evidence of witnesses who proved that the prisoner had taken apartments with them and had left owing money was admissible.

R. W. Coventry, for the prisoner.—This evidence should not have been admitted where the element of accident or mistake is absent; evidence of the nature of that allowed in this case is inadmissible. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In Reg. v. Francis, 22 W. R. 663, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 128, it was held that evidence of this sort is admissible if it goes to establish a system on the part of the prisoner.] In Reg. v. Holt, 9 W. R. 74, 8 Cox 411, it was held that such evidence was not admissible; evidence of this kind, no doubt, is admissible in cases where the indictment is for murder by administering poison for the purpose of showing that death arose from poison, not accidentally taken, but designedly administered by some one, but it is not admissible for the purpose of establishing motives: see Reg v. Flannagan and Higgins, 15 Cox 403. [WRIGHT, J., referred to Reg. v. Rhodes, 47 W. R 121, [1899] 1 Q. B. 77.] That case is distinguishable from the present one.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Counsel also referred to Makin v. Attorney-General for New South Wales, [1894] A. C. 57; Reg. v. Oddy, 5 Cox 210; and Reg. v. Ollis, 49 W. R. 121, [1900] 2 Q. B. 758.

J. R. V. Marchant, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The case has been ably argued by Mr. Coventry, but his argument really goes to the weight of the evidence and not to its admissibility. In Makin v. Attorney-General for New South Wales, Herschell, L.C., says: "The mere fact that evidence adduced tends to show the commission of other crimes does not render it inadmissible if it be relevant to an issue before the jury, and it may be so relevant if it bears upon the question whether the acts alleged to constitute the crime charged in the indictment were designed or accidental, or to rebut a defence which would be otherwise open to the accused." Lord Russell, L.C.J., in Reg. v. Rhodes, where the disputed evidence related to subsequent transactions, says: "It seems to me quite clear that, if the transactions with Elston and Chambers had taken place before that with Bays and at a period not too remote, the evidence of Elston and Chambers would have been admissible against the prisoner." In Reg. v. Ollis, where the conviction was affirmed, Lord Russell, L.C.J., says: "At this trial counsel for the prosecution pressed the recorder to admit evidence of the fraud practised on Ramsey as relevant to the charges then before him, and as negativing any reasonable belief on the part of the accused that there was money at the bank to meet these other cheques or any of them." In the same case Wright, J., says: "The evidence tended to show that the conduct of the prisoner, in tendering drafts on a bank at which he had no living account, was not inadvertent or accidental, but was part of a systematic fraud, extending over a period immediately preceding and following the date of the offence charged." The majority of the court in that case held that the evidence was legally admissible. In this case the acts must be taken to have recently preceded the act charged. On the ground of the above decisions the evidence was clearly admissible as tending to establish a system and negativing accident or mistake or any reasonable honest motive that the prisoner could have had. In my opinion the conviction must be affirmed.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree.

Conviction affirmed.

Solicitors for the prisoner, Blundell, Gordon, & Co., for S. Thornly, Worcester.

Solicitors for the prosecution, Ellis, Munday, & Clarke, for Lambert & Rogers, Malvern.

Privy Council.

(From the Court of Appeal for Ontario.)

Nov. 4.

GRAND HOTEL CO. OF CALEDONIA SPRINGS (LIMITED) v. WILSON AND OTHERS. (a.)

*Trade name—Injunction—Local name—"Caledonia Springs"—Words calculated to deceive—*Onus of showing that goods are distinguished.

The appellants supplied mineral waters taken from their springs, at a local spa called Caledonia Springs, to agents and others in Ontario and Quebec, and these waters had acquired in the market the name of "Caledonia Water." The respondents obtained other waters, but of similar properties, from borings not far from some of the appellants springs, and sold them under the description of "Natural Saline Water from the New" (or) "from New Springs at Caledonia" and as "Beaver Brand," with a picture of a beaver on their labels as a trade-mark.

Held, that the respondents were entitled to indicate the local source of the waters sold by them, and had sufficiently distinguished their goods from those of the appellants.

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeal for Ontario. The whole circumstances under which the case arose are set out at length in the judgment of their lordships.

Frank Arnoldi (of the Canadian Bar), for the appellants.

Scrutton, K.C., and R. C. Smith, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords DAVEY and ROBERTSON and Sir ARTHUR WILSON) was delivered by Lord DAVEY.—The appellants are the proprietors of certain lands in the township of Caledonia, Prescott County, Ontario. There are on this land three natural springs of mineral waters containing chemical properties which render them serviceable as table waters and for medicinal purposes. The springs are in close proximity to each other, but differ widely in their character. One of these springs is known as the Gas Spring from the quantity of carburetted hydrogen gas which it evolves, another is called the Saline Spring, while the third is known as the White Sulphur Spring. Owing to the presence of these springs the site has for many years past acquired a great reputation as a place of summer resort. The appellants own a large hotel called the Caledonia Springs Hotel, and in the course of time other buildings have been erected which the learned Chancellor of Ontario in his judgment describes as "The Caledonia Springs Village attached to the hotel," and there are a Caledonia Springs Post Office and a Caledonia Springs Railway Station. The springs are called the Caledonia Springs, and the locality itself has also acquired the name of Caledonia Springs, very much like Tunbridge Wells, although in this case there is nothing which could properly be described as a town, and no incorporated village.

There is a fourth spring situate about two miles from the other springs, called the "Intermittent" or "Duncan" Spring belonging, not to the appellants, but to a gentleman named King Arnoldi. The appellants on the 27th of December, 1899, acquired from Mr Arnoldi the right to take water from the Duncan Spring and to use his registered trade-marks for a period of two years, and also for ever to use in connection with the water of the Duncan Spring the words "Magi Caledonia Springs," registered by them. The appellants thus include this spring also in the expression "Caledonia Springs."

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellants use the water from their springs for the purpose of supplying the visitors at their hotel, and also supply it in barrels to their agents and others in Ontario and Quebec, who bottle it for the purpose of sale to the public. And they have registered as trade-marks certain labels for use on the bottles. The appellants' waters and (it may be assumed) Mr. Arnoldi's waters have acquired in the market the name of "Caledonia Water."

The respondent McDougall was also, until recently, the proprietor of an hotel at Caledonia Springs known as the Queen's Hotel. The respondent McDonell was the owner of land immediately adjoining the land of the appellants. McDougall, having some difficulty with the appellants as to the supply of their water for the visitors at his hotel, in the year 1898 commenced boring on the land of McDonell, who was his brother-in-law, and at the depth of 85 feet a spring of saline water was tapped, and a further boring made a short distance from the first struck of a subterranean spring of sulphur water at a depth of 165 feet. Both springs have a continuous natural flow which rises up the pipes laid in the borings. These borings are situate about a quarter of a mile from the appellants' three springs, and the analysis of the water obtained from them shows a general resemblance to the waters from the appellants' springs. On the 1st of August, 1898, McDonell entered into a partnership agreement with the respondents Lyall and Trenholme for placing on the market the waters from the borings thus made on his land. Arrangements were then made with the respondents Wilson for sale of the waters as agents for the partners at Toronto, and with the respondents J. Tune & Son for their sale at London (Ontario).

On the 5th of February, 1901, the appellants commenced two actions against the respondents Wilson and against the respondents J. Tune & Son. The other respondents were afterwards added as defendants in each action. The two actions were consolidated, and were heard by the Chancellor of Ontario on the 11th of June, 1901, and judgment was delivered on the 18th of the same month.

The plaintiffs in the action claimed an exclusive right to the use of the word "Caledonia" in the phrases (among others) "Caledonia Water," "Caledonia Seltzer," "Mineral Water from Caledonia Springs," and "From New Springs at Caledonia," and the words "Natural Saline Water" and "Natural Seltzer," and prayed an injunction to restrain the defendants from infringing the plaintiffs' trade-marks and also from selling the water as Caledonia Water, or under any name, trade-mark, or designation, using the word "Caledonia" as descriptive of the same or to indicate the source of the water.

The learned Chancellor held that the respondents J. Tune & Son had infringed the appellants' trade-mark, and the Court of Appeal agreed in that finding, and continued the injunction granted against those respondents. There is no appeal as to this matter, and it seems to their lordships clearly right. It is fair, however, to the principal respondents to say that the obnoxious labels were adopted without any direction from them, and when they were made aware of the use of the labels they expressed their disapproval and said they could not undertake to defend it. As regards the labels used by the respondents Wilson, the Chancellor held that the defendants had not infringed the appellants' trade-marks, but as to the trade names "Caledonia Water" and "Water from Caledonia Springs," the case of the plaintiffs was established, and he granted an injunction accordingly.

The respondents appealed, and their appeal was heard ultimately before Moss, C.J., and Maclennan and Osler, JJ. The Chief Justice agreed with the Chancellor, but thought that the terms of the injunction should be varied in one respect. The two other learned judges dissented (except as to the injunction against J. Tune & Son), and the reasons for their judgment were given by Maclennan, J. The appeal was accordingly allowed, and by an order of the 4th of December, 1902, the actions, save in respect of the injunction against the respondents J. Tune & Son, were dismissed with costs. Hence this appeal.

The learned counsel for the appellants did not lay much stress upon the alleged infringement of the trade-marks except as regards the use of the word "Caledonia," and in their lordships' opinion quite rightly. On this point, which is one of fact, their lordships agree with the concurrent findings of the two courts below. Nor do their lordships think there is anything in the make-up of the respondents' goods to which the appellants can reasonably object. A more difficult question is as to the use of the word "Caledonia" as a trade name or as part of the description of the respondents' waters. It must be conceded that the respondents cannot use the word in such a manner as to pass off their goods for those of the appellants. But if they have not done so, they ought not to be restrained by injunction from the use of the word.

The first fact to be noted is that the goods in question are not a manufactured article, or (in other words) the name which it is sought to protect is not the name for the appellants' make of goods, but, to put it most favourably for the appellants, designates water from particular springs belonging to them. The waters derive their virtues from the strata from which they spring, or through which they pass, before they reach the surface (that is to say) from the inherent properties of the soil itself in that particular locality. Another material fact is that the words "Caledonia Springs" and "Caledonia Water" are said to designate the Duncan Spring and its waters equally with the appellants' three springs, although the former is distant two miles from the latter and has no apparent connection with them, except that of being situate in the same township. It is quite true that the same trade name may designate the goods of more than one person, but it is less easy to infer that a geographical description has acquired a secondary meaning when you find that it is used to designate the goods of two or more persons connected only by identity of geographical origin. And whatever force there is in this observation does not appear to their lordships to be materially weakened by the fact of there being other springs in the township which, like the "Duncan" spring, are called by different names. Lastly, it must be observed that in the present case the name of the locality necessarily enters into and forms part of any real description of the respondents' waters, and that the words "Caledonia Springs" have acquired a secondary or perhaps tertiary meaning as the name and the only name of the locality. Their lordships agree with Maclennan, J., that if the respondents' water is likely to be more sought after and more marketable, and if the business of the selling it is likely to be more profitable by reason of the situation of the springs and their nearness to the famous old springs, the respondents are entitled to the benefit of that circumstance. Indeed, it is impossible to see how the respondents could adequately describe a natural product of the soil which derives its excellence from the inherent properties of the soil in that particular locality without some reference to the place, and using for that purpose in some form the only name by which it is known.

Their lordships are therefore of opinion that the appellants have not a right to the exclusive use which they claim of the word "Caledonia" in connection with their waters. The Stone Ale case, Montgomery v. Thompson, [1891] A. C. 217, 39 W. R. Dig. 235, does not appear to them to have any bearing on the present case. That was a case of a manufactured article, and was decided on the special circumstances of the case, as clearly appears from the judgments of Lord Watson and Lord Macnaghten. The Glenfield Starch case, Wotherspoon v. Currie, L. R. 5 E. & I. A. 508, 21 W. R. Dig. 118, differs materially from the present case in the facts on which it was decided, for the term "Glenfield" was not a necessary part of the description of the manufactured article there in question, and there was evidence that the defendant's works were set up at Glenfield for the purpose of passing off their goods as those of the plaintiff. But have the respondents used the word "Caledonia" in such a manner as to pass off their water as coming from the springs of the appellants? Or have they taken adequate care to distinguish their goods from those of the appellants? In considering this question their lordships do not forget the answer given by the respondent Lyall in his evidence when he accepted the suggestion of the plaintiffs' counsel that his object in taking hold of this water from these wells was to sell it as Caledonia water. They do not, however, attach so much importance to this piece of evidence as the learned Chancellor. From the way in which the suggestion was made and accepted they think that Lyall may not have meant more than that he desired to sell it as water from Caledonia in competition with the plaintiffs. The respondents are not proved to have ever themselves sold their water under the description of "Caledonia Water," or "Water from Caledonia Springs," but what is said is that the use by them of the word "Caledonia" in any form enables the water to be sold by the retailer as "Caledonia Water," and is therefore calculated to deceive the ultimate purchaser. Their lordships agree with what has been frequently said in these cases, that even a description of goods which is literally true may be so framed as to mislead, and they bear in mind the cases of which Johnston v. Orr Ewing (7 App. Cas. 219) is an example, where a trade name or mark which would not mislead the dealer has been held an infringement because it was calculated to mislead the retail purchaser.

The respondents (other than J. Tune & Son) sell their goods under the description of "Natural Saline Water from the New" (or) "from New Springs at Caledonia," and as "Beaver Brand," and they have a picture of a beaver on their labels as a trade-mark. It appears to their lordships that the expressions "the new springs" or "new springs" at once distinguishes their water from the water coming from what the appellants call on one of their labels "the original springs," and no person reading the label could possibly believe he was buying water from the original springs. It is not like the case of manufactured goods where the trade name attaches to the make of a particular manufacturer, and the purchaser might then suppose he was buying a new make of the same manufacturer. In the present case the name is not personal, but local, and attaches only to the particular springs. The learned Chancellor criticizes the use of the word "springs" as descriptive of the source from which the respondents derive their water, but this seems hypercritical. The source is none the less a spring because it finds its way to the surface by an artificial cavity instead of a natural fissure in the soil. The learned Chancellor also criticizes the use of the words "at Caledonia." He says there is no place called Caledonia simply. It is true that "Caledonia Springs" would have been more accurate, but also, probably, in the view of the plaintiffs more objectionable. But whether the words are to be taken as referring to the township or the particular place, their lordships agree with Maclennan, J., that the words "at Caledonia" are not inaccurate, and it was pointed out that the expression is used in the sheet called "Life at the Springs," which is described as published every Saturday "at "Caledonia." It is possible that the common use of the word "Caledonia" in any form may lead to some dishonesty on the part of the retail seller. But their lordships think that, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, the respondents cannot be made responsible for such a consequence. The plaintiffs sold their water as "Caledonia Water" at a time when they had no competitors in the sale of natural mineral waters from the place called Caledonia Springs, but in giving it that name they ran the risk of other persons discovering other springs in the same locality, and being entitled to sell other water as water coming from springs in that locality. Their lordships hold that the respondents are entitled to indicate the local source of the waters sold by them, and so holding, they think that the burden cast upon the respondents of distinguishing their goods from those of the appellants has been discharged. "New Springs" seems at least as distinctive as Crystal Springs, which the respondents originally thought of, or "Beaver Spring," which was suggested by the counsel for the appellants.

They will, therefore, humbly advise his Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed, and the appellants will pay the costs of it.

Solicitors, Gadsden & Treherne; Poole & Robinson.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 8.

STOCKDALE v. ASCHERBERG. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant to pay "all taxes, rates, assessments, and outgoings"—Tenancy for three years—Requirement by local authority to relay drainage.

By an agreement in writing the plaintiff let to the defendant a house at a yearly rent of £55, and the defendant agreed to "pay all taxes, rates, assessments, and outgoings of every description," landlord's property tax only excepted, and to "keep and leave the premises (including the fixtures) in as good condition as they are now in (reasonable wear and tear excepted) . . . and keep in repair all sash-lines and internal pipes and taps." During the term the local authority served notice on the plaintiff, under the Public Health Act, 1875, requiring him to abate a nuisance that existed on the premises, and for that purpose to relay the existing drain. The plaintiff executed the work at a cost of £83 10s., and sued to recover this amount from the defendant under his contract.

Held, that the defendant was liable to repay this sum to the plaintiff.

Judgment of Wright, J. ([1903] 1 K. B. 873, 51 W. R. Dig. 84), affirmed.

Appeal by the defendant and cross-appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of the action (reported in [1903] 1 K. B. 873).

The action was brought to recover £83 10s. under a contract of tenancy. By an agreement in writing, dated the 25th of March, 1902, the plaintiff let to the defendant a house, 68, Brondesbury-villas, Kilburn, for a term of three years from that date at the yearly rent of £55. By the agreement the defendant agreed to "pay all taxes, rates, assessments, and outgoings of every description for the time being payable in respect of the premises as they become due (landlord's property tax only excepted)." The defendant also agreed to "keep and leave the premises (including the fixtures) in as good condition as they are now in (reasonable wear and tear excepted)," and to "keep the gutters, stack-pipes, w.c.'s, and cisterns clean, and to keep in repair all sash-lines and internal pipes and taps."

On the 4th of September, 1902, a notice was served on the plaintiff by the Willesden Urban District Council under the Public Heath Act, 1875, requiring him to abate a nuisance upon the premises, and for that purpose to take up and relay the drain of the house. The work ordered to be done amounted to the reconstruction of the whole drainage system of the house. The plaintiff executed the work at a cost of £83 10s., and brought this action to recover that amount from the defendant under the contract.

Wright, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Edgar Foa, for the defendant.—Under a covenant like this in an ordinary lease for a long term the tenant would be liable to his landlord for these expenses: Foulger v. Arding, 50 W. R. 417, [1902] 1 K. B. 700. That case, however, established that the imposition or outgoing must be one which was reasonably in the contemplation of both parties when the lease was made. To decide that question, the nature of the imposition or outgoing, the nature of the premises, the length of the term, and the amount of the rent, and the amount of the expense, must all be considered. In Valpy v. St. Leonard's Wharf Co., 1 L. G. R. 305, Farwell, J., held that a covenant to pay "outgoings" in a lease of a cottage from year to year at a rent of £20 did not include the expense of paving a yard at a cost of £58 in obedience to an order of the local authority. That case was distinguished by Wright, J., in the present case. In In re Warriner, Brayshaw v. Ninnis, [1903] 2 Ch. 367, 51 W. R. Dig. 83, Swinfen Eady, J., held that the tenant was liable, under a similiar covenant to pay all "impositions" in a lease of a house for three years at a rent of £54, to bear the expense of reconstructing the drains in accordance with a notice from the local authority. Then came Harris v. Hickman [1904] 1 K. B. 13, where a tenant, in an agreement for a three years' tenancy at a rent of £70, covenanted to pay all "outgoings," and after the expiration of the three years he held over, paying rent at the same rate. Wright, J., following Valpy v. St. Leonard's Wharf Co., held that the tenant was not liable to bear the expense of certain sanitary work, amounting to £70, required by the local authority to be done, the notice having been served and the work done during the holding over. The true view is that the tenant is liable on such a covenant as the present in the case of an ordinary lease, say, for twenty-one years. But the law has, ever since the Statute of Frauds at any rate, always drawn a distinction between a lease for three years or less, and a lease for over three years. In a lease for three years the tenant does not usually covenant to repair. In the present lease the covenant to repair is of a very limited kind. It would be absurd to suppose that, in these circumstances, the parties ever contemplated or intended that the defendant, who occupied the house for so short a term, should bear the expense of putting in a new drainage system at a cost amounting to about one and a-half year's rent. The Public Health Act, 1875, threw the expense on the landlord, and he must bear it unless by clear and unambiguous words he has thrown the expense on the tenant. In all the older cases where the tenant was held liable under a covenant to pay outgoings the lease was for a long term of years, except Batchelor v. Bigger, 60 L. T. 416, which was a case of a lease for three years, and where no doubt Kay, J., said that it was difficult to construe the same covenant differently in a lease for three years and in a lease for a longer term.

C. F. Hohler, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—Though everyone must feel considerable sympathy for the defendant who finds himself mulcted in a sum amounting to about one and a-half year's rent of the house for improvements thereto, the expense of which he probably did not anticipate that he would have to bear, still the question is, whether on this agreement of tenancy, the defendant is not bound by his contract to accept that burden. It has been clearly established that the word "outgoings" in a covenant like this covers the particular class of expenditure which is imposed on the owner by the sanitary authority for the purpose of altering the system of drainage and bringing it up to the modern standard of efficiency. No doubt the requirement of the sanitary authority seems at first sight somewhat drastic, but it was clearly a requirement within their powers and one that was rendered necessary by the sanitary condition of the premises. The defendant took the premises in a bad sanitary state, and in these circumstances it is impossible to say that it was outside the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract that the sanitary authority, whose duty it is to see that the sanitary condition of the premises is kept up to the modern standard, might call upon the owner to execute the necessary works, and it is impossible to say that the defendant has not undertaken the responsibility of it. In these matters nowadays the sanitary authority frequently insists upon changes, and in view of that, when the landlord and tenant came to an agreement in perfectly clear terms as to the burden of this expense, it would be straining the words beyond all reason and introducing an element into the contract which it would be very difficult to limit if we are to hold that the defendant was not liable on his covenant for this expense.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appeal therefore fails.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Sharpe, Parker, & Co., for H. Fielding, Canterbury.

Solicitors for the defendant, Potter & Heath.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) Feb. 4.

CHANDLER v. WEBSTER. (a.)

Contract — Impossibility of performance — Coronation procession—Hire of room to view—Abandonment of procession — Money payable before abandonment — Recovery back of money paid.

The plaintiff hired from the defendant a room in a house in Pall Mall to view the Coronation procession on the 26th of June for the sum of £141 15s., payable immediately. The plaintiff paid £100 to the defendant, and subsequently, in consequence of the illness of the King, the procession on the 26th of June was abandoned. The plaintiff sued to recover back the £100 which he had paid to the defendant, on the ground of total failure of consideration, and the defendant counterclaimed for £41 15s., the balance of the £141 15s.

Held, that the further performance of the contract having been rendered impossible by an event which happened without the default of either party, upon the doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 3 B. & S. 826, the contract was not avoided ab initio, but remained good and valid up to the ascertainment of the impossibility of performance, and anything done and any rights acquired under it up to that time remained good, the parties being merely relieved from the further performance of the contract; that therefore the doctrine as to total failure of consideration was not applicable; and that the plaintiff could not recover back the £100, and that, as the whole sum of £141 15s. accrued due before the abandonment, the defendant was entitled to recover the £41 15s., the unpaid balance of that amount.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Wright, J., and a cross-appeal by the plaintiff.

The action was brought to recover the sum of £100 which had been paid by the plaintiff to the defendants on the 20th of June, 1902, for the use of a room to view the Coronation procession on the 26th of June, on the ground of total failure of consideration. The defendants counterclaimed to recover the sum of £41 15s., on the ground that the plaintiff had agreed to pay them £141 15s. for the use of the room.

The plaintiff agreed with the defendants to take from them a room on the first floor of 7, Pall-mall to view the Coronation procession on the 26th of June, and to pay them £141 15s. for the use of it. The contract was made in part verbally, but mainly by correspondence, the last letter being written on the 10th of June, 1902, by the plaintiff to the defendant as follows: "I beg to confirm my purchase of the first floor room of the Electric Lighting Board at 7, Pall-mall to view the procession on Thursday, the 26th of June, for the sum of £141 15s., which amount is now due. I shall be obliged if you will take the room on sale, and I authorize you to sell separate seats in the room, for which I will erect a stand. If the seats thus sold in the ordinary way of business do not realize the above amount by the 26th of June, I agree to pay you the balance to make up such amount of £141 15s."

The money was to be paid, as the Court of Appeal found upon the correspondence, at once, or, at any rate, as soon as possible after the making of the contract, and a cheque for £100 was, in fact, sent by the plaintiff to the defendants on the 19th of June. After that date and before the 26th of June the Coronation procession of the 26th of June was abandoned owing to the illness of the King, and the plaintiff sought to recover the £100 as upon a total failure of consideration, and the defendants counterclaimed to recover the £41 15s., the unpaid balance of the £141 15s.

Wright, J., held, upon the construction of the contract, that the £141 15s. did not become payable until the 26th of June, and that, therefore, the defendant were not entitled to recover the £41 15s., the unpaid balance. He also held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the £100 paid to the defendant.

J. B. Matthews, for the defendant.

Spencer Bower, K.C., and Colam, or the plaintiff.

The following authorities were referred to: Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 3 B. & S 826; Krell v. Henry, ante, p. 246, [1903] 2 K. B. 740; Civil Service Co-operative Society v. General Steam Navigation Co., ante, p. 181, [1903] 2 K. B. 756; Blakeley v. Muller & Co., [1903] 2 K. B. 760, 51, W. R. Dig. 40; Clark v. Lindsay, 88 L. T. 198, 51 W. R. Dig. 39; Knowles v. Bovill, 22 L. T. 71.

COLLINS, M.R.—This case is somewhat complicated by the fact of there being an appeal and a cross-appeal. The substance of the case is this: The plaintiff agreed with the defendant to take from him a room to view the Coronation procession on the 26th of June, and he agreed to pay £141 15s. for the use of the room for that purpose. The plaintiff paid to the defendant £100 before the postponement of the procession, leaving an unpaid balance of £41 15s. The procession did not take place on the 26th of June, and the plaintiff sues to recover the £100 paid to the defendant, and the defendant counterclaims to recover the £41 15s. unpaid balance. Wright, J., held that both parties were wrong in their claims, and that neither could recover. Both parties appealed. The defendant contends that, notwithstanding that the procession did not take place on the 26th of June, he is entitled to be paid the unpaid balance. I will deal with that part of the case first. These kind of contracts have been the subject of express decision, and it has been held that the principle laid down in Taylor v. Caldwell applies to these cases—that is to say, where the parties have made no express provision to have the money repaid if the procession does not take place, or unless from the circumstances a condition is to be necessarily implied that the money shall be repaid if no procession takes place, then, if the procession does not take place, the further performance of the contract is rendered impossible, and the person who has paid money upon the footing of the contract being performed in full and the procession taking place must abide the loss of the amount he has paid, and the party claiming the payment of more money must also abide the loss of it and cannot enforce upon the other party the obligation of paying the balance, as an event has happened which relieves both parties from the further performance of the contract. The question is, how is that principle to be applied to the facts of the present case. The right of the defendant to recover the £41 15s. depends upon whether his right to recover that sum accrued before the abandonment of the procession. The plaintiff can claim to be in no better position by not having paid that sum at the time when he contracted to pay it. Did the contract oblige him to pay the £41 15s. before the time when the procession, on the 26th of June, was abandoned? In my opinion the taking place of the procession was not a condition precedent to the payment of the money. It was part of the contract that the money should be paid immediately, or at any rate as soon as possible, after the contract was made, and that clearly was before the procession was abandoned. It has been established by the authorities that where the obligation to pay is by the contract made so as not to arise until after the taking place of the procession, the liability to pay being based on the procession taking place, the obligation to pay is discharged on the ground that the procession did not take place; but where the liability to pay arises at a date before the abandonment of the procession, the abandonment of the procession leaves the obligation to pay untouched. The defendant is therefore entitled to recover the £41 15s., and his appeal must be allowed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

With regard to the plaintiff's claim to recover the £100 already paid, I have incidentally dealt with that claim when deciding the defendant's counterclaim. Mr. Spencer Bower said that there was a total failure of consideration—that is, that the condition upon which the money was paid was the taking place of the procession on the 26th of June, and that as no procession took place on the 26th of June the money paid can be recovered back. That undoubtedly raises an interesting question. The principle is laid down in Taylor v. Caldwell that where, by an act which happens without the default of either party, that which is the basis of the contract become impossible of performance, from the time when the fact of the impossibility of performance is ascertained the contract need no longer be performed by either party, but it leaves the contract good and valid up to the time of the ascertainment of the impossibility of performance, and anything done and any rights acquired under it up to that time are to be regarded as having been properly done and duly acquired, the parties being discharged from that time from the further performance of the contract. That is important because in cases to which the doctrine of Taylor v. Caldwell applies there can be no claim to recover back money paid as upon a total failure of consideration, the reason being that in such cases the contract is not avoided ab initio, but remains good in so far as it has been already performed. The principle laid down in Taylor v. Caldwell is that the contract is not annulled ab initio, but the parties are merely relieved from the further performance of it, and therefore the doctrine as to total failure of consideration has no application. No doubt the rule laid down in Taylor v. Caldwell is a somewhat arbitrary one, but it has been adopted because of the impossibility of working out and adjusting the rights of the parties as upon the footing of the contract being avoided ab initio. Wills, J., in Blakeley v. Muller & Co., made some very valuable remarks upon the subject. The learned judge there points out why the court must stop at the position of the parties when the procession was abandoned. That decision was adopted by this court in Civil Service Co-operative v. General Steam Navigation Co., where the Lord Chancellor referred to and adopted the judgment of Channell, J., in that case. The passage which the Lord Chancellor read from the judgment of Channell, J., supports the proposition that the rights of the parties under the contract must be left as they were at the time of the abandonment of the procession, and the parties are excused from the further performance of the contract. Upon these grounds, in my opinion, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the £100, and the judgment of Wright, J., upon the plaintiff's appeal was right.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Though it is a somewhat hazardous task, I will venture to state what seems to me to be the result of the authorities in the class of case which we are considering. Where there is an agreement which is based upon the assumption by both parties that a certain future event will take place, and that event forms the foundation of the contract between the parties, then if, through no default of either party and owing to circumstances which are not in the contemplation of the parties at the time when they made the contract, it happens that before the time fixed for the event it is ascertained that the event cannot take place, the parties are thenceforth both free from any subsequent obligation cast upon them by the agreement; but except in cases where the contract can be treated as rescinded ab initio, any payment previously made and any legal rights previously accrued according to the terms of the agreement will not be disturbed. In my opinion, upon the facts here, this case falls within that principle. The contract is one which cannot be treated as rescinded ab initio. That being so, any legal rights accrued to either party previously to the abandonment of the procession remain, and for the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, which I need not repeat, one of those rights is the right of the defendant to obtain payment of the sum of £141 15s. The appeal of the defendant therefore succeeds, and the cross-appeal of the plaintiff must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear upon the correspondence that the £141 15s. was due from the plaintiff at once, and therefore the defendant's appeal must succeed. With regard to the cross-appeal I see no ground for suggesting that the £100 was paid upon the understanding that it was to be repaid in the event of the Coronation procession not taking place on the 26th day of June. There was no express contract to that effect, and it was not the intention of the parties that it should be repaid so as to make it an implied term of the contract.

Appeal of defendant allowed; appeal of plaintiff dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Phillips & Boyle.

Solicitors for defendants, Russell & Arnholz.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Jan. 12.

MANCHESTER v. CARLTON IRON CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Dependants—Payment to or for benefit of dependants—Power to exclude any dependant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule I. (4) (5) (6).

An arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act,

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1897, has no power, when awarding compensation to the dependants of a deceased workman, to direct payment of the compensation money in such a way as may result in the exclusion of any dependant who is not sui juris.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Durham County Court on a special case stated by an arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of a deceased workman who met with his death by an accident in the course of his employment. The arbitration was heard before an arbitrator agreed on by the parties.

The arbitrator stated the following special case for the purpose of submitting a question of law for the decision of the county court judge, in pursuance of clause 4 of the second schedule to the Act:

"Joshua Manchester, aged fifty-two, was employed as a hewer at East Howle Colliery, in the county of Durham, at an average weekly wage of 15s. 9½d., with rent allowance and coals. He was killed through being crushed by the engine set on the 25th of February, 1903, and he left a widow, a son aged thirteen, and two daughters aged nineteen and thirteen respectively, none of whom was in any employment. It was agreed before me that the total amount of compensation recoverable was £154 7s. 6d.; and I was requested, on behalf of the applicant, to make an order that the money should be paid to three trustees nominated by the applicant for the benefit of the widow and children of the deceased in manner hereinafter mentioned. The only question which arose for my decision was with respect to the extent of the powers, in relation to the investment or other application of the compensation, conferred upon me by clause 6 of the first schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. On behalf of the applicant it was contended that, under the clause to which I have referred, I had power to order that the compensation money should be invested in the names of three trustees (as asked) to be held and applied by them for the benefit of the widow and her children, the trustees having power from time to time to apply both principal and interest for the benefit of any one or more to the exclusion of any other or others of the four beneficiaries as they (the trustees) thought fit, and that it was not incumbent upon me to make any apportionment specifically allotting to the widow and each of her children her or his separate share of the compensation, the desire of the parties being that the compensation should be treated as one entire fund to be applied by the trustees at their discretion for the benefit of any one or more to the exclusion of any other or others of the widow and her children as their circumstances might from time to time in the judgment of the trustees seem to render expedient. If I have power to make an order, I am of opinion that it would be to the advantage of the widow and her children that the order should be made. Amongst miners, as the sons attain the age of 13 years or upwards, it is practically certain that they will be employed in some capacity in the mine and will become wage earners. The probability accordingly is that, as the son of the widow in the present case attains the age of about fifteen years he will be to a large extent self-supporting, and that the benefit of the compensation, which so long as the son was not earning sufficient wages or no wages at all such son was entitled to, might and should thereafter be applied for the benefit of the widow and her daughters, who were not and were not likely to become earners of wages; moreover, as the son approaches the age of twenty-one years he would not only be entirely self-supporting, but might marry and cease to contribute to the support of his mother, which would render it proper for the trustees to divert the share of the compensation, which his wages had rendered no longer necessary for him, to the benefit of the widow and daughters, who might continue to require the assistance of the compensation. The question of law which I therefore desire to submit is whether the committee or other arbitrator referred to in clause 6 of the first schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, has power (a) with, or (b) without, the concurrence of the applicant, to direct the payment of compensation to trustees to be invested or otherwise applied by such trustees for the benefit of the widow and other dependants or any one or more of them to the exclusion of any other or others, as regards principal and interest, in such manner as such trustees may from time to time deem expedient."

The county court judge held that it was not competent to the arbitrator to direct payment of the compensation in the manner proposed.

The applicant appealed.

Minton Senhouse, for the applicant.—The question is whether, where a deceased workman leaves dependants, the arbitrator is bound to award a specific sum to each dependant, or whether it is open to him to order the total amount of the compensation to be paid to trustees to be applied by them in their discretion for the benefit of the dependants. The deceased was a member of a workmen's association, and the respondents are members of an employers' association, and a joint committee of these two associations have appointed three persons to act as trustees of all money paid by employers as compensation under the Act. This is a convenient practice and is in accordance with the intention of the Act. By clause 1 (a) (i.) of the first schedule to the Act, where death results from the injury, and the workman leaves dependants, a lump sum is to be paid as compensation. By clause 4 such payment is to be made "to or for the benefit of his dependants." By clause 5 any question as to who is a dependant, or as to the amount payable to each dependant, is, in default of agreement, to be settled by arbitration. By clause 6 the sum allotted as compensation to a dependant may be invested or otherwise applied for the benefit of the person entitled thereto, as agreed, or as ordered by the arbitrator.

Ellis Hill (Garland with him), for the employers.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The question stated in the special case for the opinion of the court by the county court judge is, in substance, whether it is competent to an arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act to direct payment of the amount which he awards as compensation to the dependants of a deceased workman in such a way that some of the dependants may be excluded, and the distribution which he made in the first instance may from time to time be altered. I am of opinion that there is no power to direct such payment unless the dependants are persons sui juris who are in a position to renounce their rights. The arbitrator must conform to the provisions of the Act. In this case no award at all has been made at present. We must look to the first schedule of the Act to see what are the powers of the arbitrator when he comes to make his award. By clause 5 the arbitrator may settle any question as to who is a dependant, or as to the amount payable to each dependant. That is to say, the arbitrator has power to allot the compensation among the dependants in what proportions he thinks right; and, if the widow consents, he may leave her out. By clause 6 he has power to order that the sum allotted to any dependant may be invested or otherwise applied for the benefit of such dependant. No question is raised here as to that power. All that it is necessary to decide is that the arbitrator has no power to exclude any dependant who is not sui juris.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Hyman Isaacs & Lewis, for Isadore Isaacs & Heath, Sunderland.

Solicitors for the employers, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Cooper & Goodger, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } Jan. 14.

In re DOWDING'S TRUSTS.
GREGORY v. DOWDING. (a.)

Settlement—Marriage settlement—Covenant to settle after-acquired property of wife—Inclusion or exclusion of life annuities.

The fact that the terms of a covenant contained in a marriage settlement for the settlement of after-acquired property of the wife are sufficiently comprehensive to cover such property as annuities or life interests is not conclusive that such property is to be included in or caught by the covenant. Regard must be had to the intention of the covenantor as shown by the nature of the trusts declared of the after-acquired property covenanted to be settled, and if such trusts as they stand do not fit property of the nature of annuities, such property will be deemed not to be caught by the covenant.

Townshend v. Harrowby, 4 Jur. N. S. 353, followed.
Scholfield v. Spooner, 32 W. R. 910, 26 Ch. D. 94, distinguished.

By a settlement dated the 5th of May, 1886, made in contemplation of the marriage shortly afterwards solemnized between the Rev. T. W. Dowding and Margaret Carwithen, spinster, the intended wife (inter alia) agreed that all real and personal property (if any) not thereinbefore settled to which she at the time of the then intended marriage, or at any time during her intended coverture, was or should be or become entitled, whether in possession, reversion, or otherwise, except jewels, trinkets, ornaments of the person, plate, linen, china, furniture, prints, books, or other articles of the like nature, and also except any legacies or other property acquired at one and the same time not exceeding in amount or value the sum of £100, should . . . be assured and transferred by the said intended wife and all other necessary parties (if any) to the trustees of the settlement upon trust at such time and in such manner as they should think fit (but as to any reversionary interest, not until it should fall into possession), to sell and convert into money such part of the said property as should not consist of money or of investments of the nature thereinbefore authorized and stand possessed of the said investments and of the moneys to arise from such conversion as aforesaid upon the trusts, and with the powers thereinbefore declared concerning certain funds thereinbefore referred to as the wife's trust fund, and in the meantime and so long as any property thereby agreed to be settled should remain unsettled upon trust to pay the rents and income thereof (in effect) to the person for the time being entitled to the income of the funds comprised in the settlement under the trusts thereof.

The wife's father (who died in 1903), by his will made in 1894, gave to the wife Margaret Dowding "an annuity of £40 for her life," and by a second codicil made in 1896 gave to her "an additional annuity of £60 a year for her life in addition to any benefit which she may take under my will." The will and codicils were duly proved, and the question raised by this summons was whether or not the annuities given by the will were bound by the agreement to settle contained in the settlement, and if they were, how they ought to be dealt with.

T. T. Methold, for the wife, argued that the annuities were not included.

H. T. Methold, for the trustees of the settlement.

S. B. L. Druce, for the infant children of the marriage.

The following cases were cited, and are dealt with in the judgment: Lewis v. Madocks, (1803) 8 Ves. 150; In re Bendy, 43 W. R. 345, [1895] 1 Ch. 109; Finlay v. Darling, 45 W. R. 445, [1897] 1 Ch. 719; White v. Briggs, (1848) 22 Beav. 196*n*; St. Aubyn v. Humphreys, (1856) 22 Beav. 175; Townshend v. Harrowby, (1858) 4 Jur. N. S. 353; In re Crawshay, 39 W. R. 682, [1891] 3 Ch. 176; and Scholfield v. Spooner, 32 W. R. 910, 26 Ch. D. 94.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question is whether two annuities given to a married lady are caught by a covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in her marriage settlement. It is a covenant although it is in the form of an agreement; it is executed by all the parties and it is a covenant by all. The covenant is in the widest possible terms. I cannot conceive that anyone could put it in wider terms. [His lordship read the terms of the agreement.] There are certain exceptions which I must notice for two reasons—first, because it is said that one of these exceptions includes these annuities, so that they are literally excepted from the operation of the covenant; secondly, because it is always necessary where there are exceptions to a general provision to see what is regarded as excepted in order that from that you may obtain light as to what is intended to be included. The words are "except jewels, trinkets, ornaments of the person, plate, linen, and china, furniture, prints, books, or other articles of the like nature, and also except any legacies or other property acquired at one and the same time not exceeding in amount or value the sum of £100."

It is said that these annuities are legacies within that exception. For some purposes no doubt an annuity is a legacy—a legacy payable by instalments—and if that were the right view to take in this case, the instalments are less than £100, so that no part of them would be settled. But an annuity is not a legacy for all purposes, and in ordinary phraseology an annuity is distinct from a legacy. A legacy is a sum which the legatee is entitled to have paid down; an annuity is a sum which is to be secured by setting apart a portion of the personal estate, and has to be paid in the shape of an annual payment, and in that sense it is not a legacy. In my opinion it would be entirely wrong to hold that these annuities were legacies within the exception.

Then the question is whether these annuities are covered. They are within the words "all real and personal property to which the said Margaret Carwithen at any time during the said intended coverture shall be or become entitled." Of course I am bound to construe these words according to the intention of the parties, and it may appear that an intention may be presumed or proved in some way or other that these annuities are not meant to be caught; but the words themselves are large enough. Nor is it right that annuities, according to the ordinary practice of those who draw marriage settlements, cannot be included in covenants to settle after-acquired property. On the contrary, Mr. Methold confirmed my own impression that the ordinary precedents for covenants of this kind do include annuities and life interests, but when the draft is properly settled there is a direction that annuities and life interests shall be held for the benefit of the husband or wife as the case may be, and possibly where they are for the benefit of the wife to be held for her separate use restrained from anticipation. Therefore, apart from one authority which I will deal with presently, where the question was as to a life interest being included, there is no doubt that an annuity may be properly included. There is nothing foreign to the purpose of a covenant to settle after-acquired property in including an annuity. In one sense, therefore, the covenant fits the property or the property fits the covenant. The difficulty arises from this, that the trust is for conversion, that that which is really the life interest of the wife is to be converted by the sale out and out of the annuity or possibly by investing the annuity when it is received from time to time, and that is to be capitalized, so that the wife or the husband who takes the first life interest would only receive the dividends. That is where the pinch occurs. You can make the covenant fit the annuity, and you can make the annuity fit the covenant, but neither fits the other as it stands—that is to say, not according to the ordinary practice of mankind: it goes against one's general knowledge of the practice to say that that which is an annuity is to be capitalized and only to become a dividend-earning fund. These difficulties have occurred again and again, and several cases have been cited in which this question has been discussed. A great difficulty of this kind occurred in Lewis v. Madocks. I mention that case because it has given rise to a certain amount of discussion from time to time. There the husband gave a bond with a condition to settle all the personal estate that he should at any time during the coverture be possessed of. The Lord Chancellor pointed out the great difficulty of executing the instrument, but thought that he was constrained by the general words of the bond, and declared that the personal estate of which the husband was possessed during the coverture was liable to the bond. This, in so many words, would appear to include every sovereign that came into his purse during the coverture, and it did occur to me when the question came before me in In re Bendy that the Lord Chancellor meant that when you had a general covenant of that kind you must execute it, however absurd it might be, and however great the practical difficulty in doing so. But a similar case came before Romer, J.—Finlay v. Darling—and he differed, I have no doubt soundly, from the view which I took of Lord Eldon's decision in Lewis v. Madocks. After shewing that that was a covenant by the husband to settle the whole of his personal estate however acquired, he said this (p. 722): "Lord Eldon pointed out in that case even that income which the husband received would not be bound by the covenant, but he did say that if that income became capital then the capital which accrued to him would be bound. I do not know that that decision went so far as that, but certainly there is a statement of Lord Eldon to that effect. In the first place, I think that his observation must have been limited in its application to the case immediately before him, which, as I pointed out, concerned and dealt with a covenant of a substantially different kind from the covenant before me; and, secondly, I am not sure that Lord Eldon did not mean by the word 'capital' capital which was so held by the husband as to show that he intended it to become part of his personal estate which was bound by his covenant." I quote that as showing that there may be a way out of a covenant of that kind, and that Romer, J., thought that Lord Eldon meant to get out of it in that way, although his language was more general, and that he himself would have been able to do so. Lewis v. Madocks was also cited in a case of White v. Briggs, which is reported in a note to St. Aubyn v. Humphreys, and was referred to by Lord Romilly in his judgment in the latter case, although apparently not cited in the argument. In St. Aubyn v. Humphreys there was a settlement by the husband of all his personal estate to which he was then or might thereafter become entitled in trust for himself for life with remainder absolutely to his wife. As regards the subject-matter of the settlement, that was not unlike the bond in Lewis v. Madocks. It was held not to comprise his interest in a fund bequeathed to him for life with remainder to his children. All that the Master of the Rolls says is: "Upon consideration of the case of Lewis v. Madocks and of White v. Briggs I am of opinion that I must hold"—and he held—"that the life interest was not caught by the settlement." The judgment of the Master of the Rolls therefore is of no value of itself. He looked at Lewis v. Madocks and read that with White v. Briggs, and thought that he was bound by authority to hold as he did. I have not, therefore, the benefit of the independent judgment of the Master of the Rolls, but I have the benefit, in a note to that report, of the decision in White v. Briggs. That, in my opinion, is a case of great importance. There there was a covenant by the husband to settle one moiety of the property he should acquire during the coverture upon the usual trusts. It was in quite general terms. It was held not to include his life interest in property bequeathed to him for the benefit of himself and his family. Some little account is given there of the nature of the bequest. There was a direction under a will to settle property on the husband and his family. That gave rise to a good deal of litigation, and ultimately Lord Cottenham determined that that direction meant that the husband took a life interest only (2 Ph. 583). Then the reporter tells us this: That he afterwards declared that "the interest which Charles Herbert White took under the will was not subject to the covenant contained in his marriage settlement." Therefore we have a distinct decision of Lord Cottenham—than whom there could not be a higher authority—that a covenant of this kind framed in the most general terms did not include a life interest given to him by will; and the Master of the Rolls followed that. I say nothing about the case cited there of Duncan v. Cannan (No. 2), (1855) 21 Beav. 307, because in my opinion that was a case of a different character.

(a.) Reported by ALAN C. NESBITT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then I am referred to a case before Kindersley, V.C., of Townshend v. Harrowby. There the Vice-Chancellor had to deal with a covenant framed in the broadest possible terms to settle the wife's after-acquired property, and one of the questions was whether a life interest was covered by it. The Vice-Chancellor expressed a decided opinion upon it. He says: "It appears to me that the whole scope of such a clause as this (assuming it in the strongest way against the lady), holding her to be covenantor and the person who is to do the act, that it is beyond the principle upon which the court has interpreted such clauses to hold that that applies to a mere life interest, so as to say that that life interest must be turned into corpus; that each annual or half-yearly payment on that life income was to be assigned over to the trustees to be capitalized, so that he, as tenant for life under the settlement, would only have the income arising from the investment of each succeeding sale as it accrued due from the property. I consider, therefore, that the life interest to the separate use of Lady Townsend is not affected by this covenant. If it had been an absolute interest to her use, I should consider it was affected, but being a mere life interest, it does not signify whether it is to her separate use or not. It appears to me that it is not within the letter of the covenant." That is a distinct finding by a most experienced judge that a life interest is not within a covenant in general terms to settle after-acquired property. Unless there is some authority to the contrary overruling the decision of Kindersley, V.C., and differing from the decision of Lord Cottenham, I am bound to hold that a covenant of this kind does not cover a life interest. What is there to the contrary? I can see nothing in any one of the cases cited which touches those authorities. The case mainly relied on is Scholfield v. Spooner, but before dealing with that case I ought perhaps to mention a case before North, J., cited to me—In re Crawshay. That does not really touch this case, because North, J., declined to try the question whether any life interest was affected by the covenant in that case, and he held that the particular life interest in that case was not affected because it was not assignable. Scholfield v. Spooner deserves more attention. On the covenant in that case there can be no question that the framer of the covenant contemplated including in it annuities and life interests, but by some curious omission there was no trust declared as to those annuities and life interests when assigned to the trustees, and it was argued in the Court of Appeal that because there were no trusts declared therefore the court could not hold the annuity there in question to be included in the covenant at all. To that there was a conclusive answer: It is there, and if it is to be included in the covenant it must be brought within the covenant and held upon some trust or other. If there are no trusts declared, then they are to be found by proper construction of the document. That is the substance of the decision. It is perfectly true that in the course of the judgments there are expressions showing that an annuity may be properly included in a covenant of that kind. Fry, L.J., distinctly says so. He says: "But really about that there is no doubt. If you have apt words an annuity may be included." In that case there were apt words, and it was obviously intended that they should be included. There is no objection to an annuity or a life interest being included. White v. Briggs and Townshend v. Harrowby were not cited in Scholfield v. Spooner, and it does not touch the question raised in this case, which is this—whether where the covenant is framed in general terms, and there is nothing in the settlement to bring in an annuity or life interest specifically, the inclusion of an annuity or life interest is consistent with the general intention of the parties in making the settlement. That question was not affected by Scholfield v. Spooner.

It seems to me that I am in the same position as Lord Romilly found himself in, except that I am more strongly bound. He was bound by White v. Briggs. I am bound by that case and by Townshend v. Harrowby. There is no case the other way, and I must hold that, strong and general as the words are—quite strong enough by themselves to include an annuity or a life interest, yet having regard to the general intention of the parties, these annuities are not covered by the covenant.

Solicitor for all parties, Nicholas Hanhart.

Chan. Div. } Dec. 8, 9, 16.
Farwell, J. }

BRUNER v. MOORE. (a.)

Contract—Option for six months—Lunar or calendar months—Expiry of period—Agreement for extension implied from conduct and correspondence—Option duly exercised by dispatch of telegram or letter within extended period.

M., an inventor, granted to B. an option to purchase prospective patent rights during "six months" from the 29th of September, 1902. The option had not been exercised on the 16th of March, 1903, when six lunar months expired, but later correspondence contained casual mention of the 1st of April as the date of its expiry. M., who was travelling about, informed B., who was in London, that he would be at Genoa on the 27th of March and in Paris on the 30th. On the 28th B. exercised his option by a telegram to Genoa and a letter to Paris—the latter due in course of post to arrive on the 29th—but through a misunderstanding neither of these reached M. till the 30th.

Held, that the option was for six lunar months; but that an agreement to extend it to the end of March was to be implied from the correspondence and conduct of the parties; and that even if the option expired on the 29th it was duly exercised by the posting of the letter and sending of the telegram before that date.

This was an action for specific performance of a contract dated the 29th of September, 1902, by which the defendant, who was the inventor of a sewing-machine attachment, had granted to the plaintiff the exclusive option of purchasing, during six months from the said date, either for himself or his nominees, all the defendant's right, title, and interest in and to the said invention, and the letters patent for the same which had been or might be applied for in the United Kingdom, Russia, Belgium, Luxemburg, Germany, Italy, and five other countries named, the price for the whole being fixed at £8,000. During the said period or any extension thereof the plaintiff was to have the right of selling, subject to the consent of the defendant, the rights for any one or more of the said countries for a less sum than £8,000, and upon any such sale 80 per cent. of the price thereof was to be paid to the defendant on account of the £8,000, and on payment of the whole of the last-named sum the defendant was to assign to the plaintiff the rights for such of the said countries as had not in the meantime been so sold.

It appeared that the plaintiff had been instrumental in forming a company for the purchase of the British patent for £2,000, and had empowered his solicitor to sell certain shares therein and to pay the proceeds to the defendant in respect of his share in the said purchase-money. Also that the plaintiff had sold the rights for Germany for £2,000 (payable half in cash and the balance secured by a promissory note of the purchaser), and those for Russia, Belgium, and Luxemburg together for £2,000, of which he had received £1,000, the balance being payable one month after the issue of the Russian patent.

The plaintiff had only paid £800 to the defendant in respect of these sales, but he alleged that he had assigned to him the benefit of the contracts, and that all the above-mentioned arrangements had received the defendant's assent. The defendant, however, maintained that his consent had been conditional on payment being made to him in cash, and he counterclaimed for moneys he alleged to be due to him in respect of the sales.

It further appeared that the defendant, in contravention (according to the plaintiff) of the agreement, had sold the Italian rights for £2,000, subject to a commission of £460 to an Italian agent, and he alleged that in effecting such sale he had acted as the plaintiff's agent and with his consent, and that he was entitled to 80 per cent. of the proceeds after deducting the said Italian commission.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

No further sales for the countries comprised in the option had been made, and in a letter from the defendant to the plaintiff dated in February or early in March, 1903, he referred to the option as expiring on the 1st of April.

On the 23rd of March the plaintiff wrote to the defendant mentioning that his option would expire in a few days, and asking for a reply by telegraph as to whether an extension could be granted.

On the 26th of March the defendant, in reply to an inquiry by the plaintiff as to his future address, telegraphed from Rome as follows: "Genoa Friday, Paris Monday," those days being respectively the 27th and 30th of March, and on the 27th he telegraphed "No extension till I see you." Through an error in its address the first of these telegrams did not reach the plaintiff in London till late on the 27th, and on the 28th the plaintiff telegraphed from London to the defendant at Genoa: "Have money ready to carry out option in exchange for documents. When will you be here?" This telegram he confirmed by letter of the same date, addressed to the defendant in Paris.

The defendant did not, as the plaintiff had expected, travel direct to Paris from Genoa, but left the latter place early on the 28th for Monte Carlo, where he remained one night, and consequently the plaintiff's telegram, instead of being delivered to the defendant at Genoa, was forwarded thence to Paris, where it was handed to him on the morning of the 30th, together with the plaintiff's letter confirming it. Their receipt was briefly acknowledged by the defendant, who, after interviews with the plaintiff, wrote on the 7th of April to the plaintiff treating the option as expired, but offering to extend it on certain terms which the plaintiff declined.

The principal questions argued at the trial were: Whether the option expired on the 16th or on the 29th of March—i.e., at the end of six lunar or six calendar months from the date of the contract, and, in the latter case, whether the option was duly exercised by the notice given in the plaintiff's letter and telegram of the 28th of March, seeing that they did not reach the defendant till after the six calendar months had expired.

Jenkins, K.C. (A. H. Jessel with him), for the plaintiff.

Upjohn, K.C. (J. A. Hay with him), for the defendant.—Month, unless in an Act of Parliament by virtue of the Interpretation Act, means primâ facie lunar month. The option was not even exercised within six calendar months, for the plaintiff's telegram and letter were not delivered till the 30th of March. The telegram giving the defendant's address was an intimation that the plaintiff was to find him at Genoa on the Friday, and not that the plaintiff was to do something in London. The question is whether you constitute the Post Office an agent to receive or to convey. The plaintiff has treated it as an agent to receive, but he was only authorized to appoint an agent to convey, and the notice ought to have been personally served. The words "Genoa Friday" could not mean "Genoa Friday and Saturday." Nor was there any exercise of the option evidenced by conduct of the plaintiff, for he did nothing beyond disposing of separate rights for different countries, and in so doing he was not exercising his option but acting as agent to the defendant, to whom he had to account for 80 per cent. of the proceeds. The courts have been very strict in dealing with options, which are unilateral contracts, the execution of which is entirely in the hands of the person to whom the option is granted.

He cited Simpson v. Margitson, 11 Q. B. 23; Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 25 W. R. 680, 2 App. Cas. 439, 448 (judgment of Cairns, C.); and Henthorn v. Fraser, 40 W. R. 433, [1892] 2 Ch. 27.

Jenkins, K.C., in reply.—I admit that the word month must be taken to mean lunar month except in a commercial document, but the document in question can be brought within that definition. It is not a contract of sale, and is not revocable; it was an instrument between two business men; it would only become a contract when read in connection with later documents, which I submit cannot be done. I submit that it is time for a decision by the court that the term "commercial document" includes a document leading up to a commercial transaction. As to the sale of the German rights, and those for Russia, Belgium, and Luxemburg, the evidence shows that the defendant was to receive the whole of the proceeds, and not 80 per cent., as provided in the clause dealing with separate sales. This clause, then, was varied at the request of the defendant. As to the Italian patent we are willing that it should be excluded altogether, if the whole purchase-money be reduced from £8,000 to £6,000.

He cited Hart v. Middleton, 2 C. & K. 9; Turner v. Barlow, 3 F. & F. 946; Hutton v. Brown, 29 W. R. 928; and Stroud's Judicial Dictionary (2nd ed.), pp. 1221, et seq.

THE COURT referred to Wilkinson v. Calvert, 26 W. R. 829, 3 C. P. D. 360, 362; and Barlow v. Teal, 15 Q. B. D. 403, 501, 33 W. R. Dig. 115.

Cur. adv. vult.

FARWELL, J.—This is an action for specific performance of a contract dated the 29th of September, 1902. [His lordship read the material part of the contract.] The first question arises on the option, which is given for value and is therefore not revocable: Are the six months given for its exercise lunar or calendar months? Although in the ecclesiastical courts months mean calendar months (see Catesby's case, 6 Rep. 62*b*; 2nd resolution (ed. 1826, vol. 3, p. 379), and Bluck v. Rackham, 5 Moo. P. C. 305, 308 per Knight-Bruce, V.C.) it is well settled that, at common law, month denotes lunar month—so much so that when it has been desired to make an alteration, recourse has had to be had to statute or statutory rules; e.g., as to the construction of Acts of Parliament, by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, and as to Bills of Exchange, by 45 & 46 Vict, c. 61, and as to documents which are part of any legal procedure, under the rules of court by ord. 64, r. 1. It is therefore a question of construction in each case, to which the ordinary rules of construction apply—viz., that words must bear their ordinary primary meaning unless the context of the instrument, read as a whole, or surrounding contemporaneous circumstances, show that the secondary meaning expresses the real intention of the parties, or unless the words are used in connection with some place, trade, or the like, in which they have acquired the secondary meaning as their customary meaning quoad hoc. This is a question of fact, which (unless so often proved as to be judicially recognized) has to be proved by evidence; statements by either party as to the sense in which he used or intended to use the words, made subsequently to the execution of the document, and subsequent acts of the parties, are inadmissible for the purpose of construing the document. This is, in my opinion, the meaning of the judgment in Simpson v. Margitson, 11 Q. B. Rep. 23, where Lord Denman says (pp. 31, 32): "It is clear that the construction of a written contract, subject to the exceptions mentioned below, is for the judge. It is also clear that "months" denote at law "lunar months" unless there is admissible evidence of an intention in the parties using the word to denote "calendar months." If the context shows that calendar months were intended, the judge may adopt that construction. If the surrounding circumstances, at the time the instrument was made, show that the parties intended to use the word, not in its primary or strict sense, but in some secondary meaning, the judge may construe it from such circumstances, according to the intention of the parties. If there is evidence that the word was used in a sense peculiar to a trade, business, or place, the jury must say whether the parties used it in that peculiar sense. If the meaning of a word depends upon the usage of the place where anything under the instrument is to be done, evidence of such usage must be left to the jury. Also the jury may have to give the meaning of some technical words." I have only expressed my own opinion in consequence of an argument that in addition to the cases mentioned by Lord Denman there was a general exception of all mercantile or commercial documents, founded on a dictum of Littledale, J., in Reg. v. Chawton, 1 Q. B., at p. 250, and repeated in some of the text-books. In my opinion there is not and cannot be any such general exception; if any such exception be set up it must be proved in each case (unless judicially recognized) as a customary usage in the particular trade or place. Erle, C.J.'s, ruling in Turner v. Barlow, 3 F. & F., at p. 949: "The law in all cases, not mercantile transactions, in the City of London, as to the meaning of the word 'month,' meant 'lunar month.' In all mercantile transactions in the the City of London a month means 'calendar' month"—accords with this. It is a statement of a judicially recognized custom in the city, and I do not think that Littledale, J., meant to do more than refer generally and tersely to the customary qualification of the meaning of the word. A contrary holding would necessitate a definition of "mercantile or commercial transactions"—a task of no small difficulty, unless I adopted the plaintiff's suggestion that all contracts for sale of goods and chattels, including patents, are mercantile transactions.

I hold, therefore, that "months" in this contract means "lunar months," and it is agreed that if this be so the option would expire on the 16th of March. But although the contract bears this primary meaning, and the subsequent acts of the parties are not admissible in order to alter the meaning, there is nothing to prevent the parties from coming to a subsequent agreement, having the effect of extending the period of option—and such agreement need not be in writing (apart from the Statute of Frauds, of which there is no question in the present case), but may be implied from a course of conduct (as in Const v. Harris, T. & R., at p. 523, and Pilling v. Pilling, 3 D. J. & S. 162, the principle of which modus et conventio vincunt legem is not confined to partnership cases)—and may be the more readily implied where the conduct of the party resisting has induced the other to do work or expend money on the faith of a state of things existing under the supposed new agreement, but non-existent under the old, and even if no such agreement can be implied the conduct may be of such a nature as to raise an equity against the party resisting. It is not necessary to speak of fraud or intentional misleading; it is either a case of sub-contract, or it is an application of the principle enunciated by Lord Cairns in Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 25 W. R. 680, 2 App. Cas. 439. In that case notice to repair within six months was given by a landlord; negotiations for a sale of the reversion ensued, which fell through three days before the six months expired; the landlord served an ejectment on the expiration of the three days, but was restrained in equity. Lords Cairns says (p. 447): "There had been a notice in October to repair in six months. The effect of the letter of November, as it seems to me, was to propose to the appellant, and the further letter of the appellant had the effect of an assent by the appellant, to suspend the operation of that notice in order to enter upon a negotiation for the purchase and sale of the lease. That negotiation was entered upon, and, as I have assumed, came to an end on the 31st of December. My lords, it appears to me that in the eye of a court of equity, or in the eye of any court dealing upon principles of equity, it must be taken that all the time which had elapsed between the giving of the notice in October and the letter of the 28th of November, was waived as a part of the six months during which the repairs were to be executed, and that all the time from the 28th of November until the conclusion of the negotiation, which I have assumed to be on the 31st of December, was also waived—that it was impossible that any part of that time should afterwards be counted as against the tenant in a six months' notice to repair."

Then on p. 448 he says: "It was not argued at your lordships' bar, and it could not be argued, that there was any right of a court of equity, or any practice of a court of equity, to give relief in cases of this kind, by way of mercy, or by way merely of saving property from forfeiture, but it is the first principle upon which all courts of equity proceed, that if parties who have entered into definite and distinct terms involving certain legal results—certain penalties or legal forfeiture—afterwards by their own act or with their own consent enter upon a course of negotiation which has the effect of leading one of the parties to suppose that the strict rights arising under the contract will not be enforced, or will be kept in suspense, or held in abeyance, the person who otherwise might have enforced those rights will not be allowed to enforce them where it would be inequitable having regard to the dealings which have thus taken place between the parties. My lords, I repeat that I attribute to the appellant no intention here to take advantage of, to lay a trap for, or to lull into false security those with whom he was dealing; but it appears to me that both parties by entering upon the negotiation which they entered upon, made it an inequitable thing that the exact period of six months dating from the month of October should afterwards be measured out as against the respondents as the period during which the repairs must be executed."

Nothing turned on any equitable doctrine of relief against forfeiture, but the House considered that by reason either of agreement or of innocent representation the landlord was prevented from enforcing his right under the lease.

In the case before me the plaintiff was busying himself under the clause in the contract to obtain purchasers of the various patents, and was in constant communication by letter and telegram with the defendant, who was himself desirous of getting speedy sales in order to obtain cash, so much so that he induced the plaintiff, somewhat against his will, to allow him, the defendant, to try and sell the Italian patent whilst he was in Italy. On the 7th of March, 1903, the defendant writes to the plaintiff mentioning the 1st of April, "which is only three weeks off," as the date for the payment of the purchase-money, and suggesting that this would give the plaintiff or his agent Martin full time to sell the Austrian and German patents, and in other respects asking him to continue to act under the agreement, on the footing that it lasted until the end of the month. On the 17th of March, the day after the six lunar months expired, the plaintiff telegraphed for defendant's assent to a sale of the German patents, and received it on the same day. On the 20th there is a telegram and a long letter relating to others of the patents replied to by the defendant. On the 23rd of March the plaintiff writes that the duration of his option will expire in a few days, and asks for two months' extension, as he would otherwise have to borrow the money to complete. On the 23rd, 24th, and 25th letters and telegrams passed between plaintiff and defendant on the subject of sales of the Swiss and other patents. On the 27th defendant telegraphs "No extension until I see you"; and on the 28th the plaintiff telegraphs "Have money ready to carry out option in exchange for documents, when can I see you?" On the 6th and 7th of April the plaintiff and defendant had interviews, at which they tried to settle the accounts between them; but in no letter and at no time before action did the defendant ever suggest that the option had expired on the 16th of March. The contention is put forward for the first time by counsel at the bar, avowedly without regard to the defendant's own view.

In my opinion the letters of the 7th and the 23rd of March, coupled with the intermediate and subsequent acts of the parties, are evidence of consensus ad idem—namely, that the option should extend to the end of the month of March. Even if no actual agreement could be inferred, the letter of the 7th of March, coupled with the expenditure of time, work, and money by the plaintiff consequent thereon and resulting therefrom, in the belief, as appears by the letter of the 23rd of March, that the option extended until the end of the month—operates in equity to prevent the defendant from asserting that the option expired on the 16th of March, just as the letters in Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co. were held to operate to prevent the appellant from enforcing his legal right of entry. It is not necessary (as is also pointed out in that case) to find fraud; innocent representation, if effectual, will raise the equity; here no fraud is alleged, and not only do I see no ground for supposing that the defendant had any intention or even idea of inducing the plaintiff to give his work and time for nothing—knowing that the option had expired—but also I am convinced, from the evidence that I heard, that both parties treated, and intended to treat, the option as open until the end of the month. There is no other conceivable reason for the continuance of the plaintiff's efforts to sell, and of his frequent communications with the defendant on the subject; it is not open to the defendant to suggest that this might have been done for the sake of the 20 per cent. under the clause in the contract, for this premium expired with the option, and great part of the work was done subsequently; and moreover, the defendant, by his counterclaim, denied any right in the plaintiff to retain any of this percentage for work done at any time, and claimed repayment, and he adhered to this claim in the witness box.

I hold, therefore, that the option was extended till the end of March, and on this view the next question does not arise; but, as the point was fully argued, I will express my opinion on it, assuming that the option expired on the 29th of March. The facts are these: On the 22nd of March the plaintiff telegraphed for the defendant's address, and on the 23rd of March wrote the letter to which I have already referred; the defendant received this letter on the 26th, the day he left Rome for Genoa, and telegraphed from Rome to the plaintiff, "Genoa, Hotel Gènes, Friday; Paris, Monday." On the 28th the plaintiff telegraphed to the defendant at Genoa exercising his option under the agreement, but before that message arrived the defendant left for Monte Carlo, and proceeded to Paris on Sunday, arriving on Monday, the 30th. The plaintiff wrote a letter dated the 28th of March confirming his telegram and exercising his option, and posted it on the 28th addressed to the defendant in Paris; this letter would arrive in due course on the 29th, but the defendant did not reach Paris till the 30th. It is now argued (though this again is not the defendant's, but his counsel's suggestion) that this option having expired on the 29th of March, a telegram and letter sent on the 28th, but not reaching the defendant until the 30th, were too late. In my opinion this contention fails also, for the option was duly exercised when the telegram was sent and the letter posted. I take the rule, as stated by Lord Herschell in Henthorne v. Fraser, 40 W. R. 433, [1892] 2 Ch., at p. 33: "Where the circumstances are such that it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that, according to the ordinary usages of mankind, the post might be used as a means of communicating the acceptance of an offer, the acceptance is complete as soon as it is posted."

In the present case the parties are American citizens, staying temporarily at London hotels when they signed the contract; that contract obviously contemplates the events that in fact happened, that the two parties would separate and would visit various parts of Europe, and would communicate with one another constantly by letter and telegram; if there ever was a case in which the parties contemplated that "the post might be used as a means of communicating" on all subjects connected with the contract, this is that case.

I hold, therefore, that the option was duly exercised. I have already disposed of the point as to the Italian contract; the fact being that the defendant has sold it without authority, and therefore cannot make a title to the plaintiff; the parties, to save the expense of an inquiry, have agreed its value at £2,000; and the judgment will therefore omit the Italian patent, and reduce the purchase-money to £6,000.

I have also dealt with the deferred payments for two of the patents. The plaintiff must pay the £6,000, and take over these payments, but he is not bound to pay until the defendant assigns to him all the patents (except the Italian) not already assigned to the purchasers on sales made under the power in the contract. As the defendant has not yet fully performed his part of the contract by procuring patents in all the countries, I think that the best course will be to make a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of the contract, and that the defendant is bound to obtain and assign the outstanding patents (naming the countries) on payment of £6,000 cash, less the £800 paid for the Russian patent, with liberty to apply. The defendant must pay the costs of the action; and the counterclaim is dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, W. O. Vizard; Paterson, Candler, & Sykes.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) Dec. 7, 9.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. PAYNE & CO. (a.)

Weights and measures—Beam scale—Weight indicated exceeding true weight of article sold—Paper bag placed in scoop in which tea is weighed at request of customer—Metal clip fastened to machine—Having in their possession a scale which is false or unjust—Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49), s. 25.

The respondents, who were wholesale tea merchants, received orders from certain customers to supply them with tea in quarter-pound packets weighed in customers' own bags, the net weight of each packet to be a quarter of a pound. In order to meet the wishes of their customers the respondents set aside one of their weighing machines, on one arm of which they attached a metal disc as nearly as possible corresponding in weight with the weight of a bag. The respondents were summoned under section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, for having in their possession a scale which was false and unjust.

Held, reversing the decision of the magistrate, that the respondents should have been convicted, because there was evidence that the beam scales in question could not weigh accurately, and were therefore false and unjust within the meaning of the section.

Case stated by Cecil Chapman, Esq., a metropolitan magistrate.

On the 13th of January, 1903, the respondents appeared at the Southwark police-court to answer two informations which had been laid against them on behalf of the appellants. The first information charged that the respondents did use on the 24th of November, 1902, at their business premises, Boss-street, Tooley-street, Bermondsey, for trade a weighing instrument, to wit, a beam scale, which was false or unjust contrary to section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878—that is to say, the said beam scale had attached thereto a metal disc. The second information charged a similar offence at the same time and place in respect of another beam scale which had a paper bag placed under the goods scoop thereof. The two informations were by consent heard together, and at the hearing the following facts were proved or admitted by both parties:

The respondents were wholesale tea merchants, and on the 4th of November, 1902, an inspector of weights and measures for the district in which the respondent's premises were situated visited the premises and found in a room where tea was being weighed two beam scale which were in use for weighing out tea.

The first of these had a small metal disc affixed by wire to the arm of the scale on which the scoop for receiving tea was placed, the effect being that the quantity of tea required to turn the scale with a weight of a quarter of a pound in the opposite pan was less than a quarter of a pound by the weight of the disc, which was about two or two and a-half drachms.

The disc was as nearly as might be equivalent to the weight of the paper bag or wrapper in which each quantity of tea was to be placed, and the tea so weighed out for the purpose of obtaining upon each weighing such a quantity of tea, as with its bag or wrapper would weigh exactly a quarter of a pound.

The other beam scale had a folded paper bag placed underneath the scoop in which the tea was being weighed. This bag was used for the same purpose and with the same effect as the disc above referred to.

The respondents thus weighed tea only for those customers who were retail dealers in tea, and who requested to be supplied with it so packed, and these customers themselves supplied the bags or wrappers each of which had printed upon it an intimation that the weight of the paper was included.

There were also in use other scales that were correct and just. Directions had been given by the respondents to their employees, who worked under proper supervision, not to use scales with a metal disc or paper bag to weigh out tea for any customers other than those above referred to. The respondents themselves did not sell tea by retail.

The scales with the disc attached were physically incorrect to the extent and in the mannner described.

The respondents acted fairly towards their customers and only gave them what they asked for.

The appellants contended that the beam scales to which the disc was attached were false or unjust within the meaning of section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, and they relied on Lane v. Rendall, 48 W. R. 153, [1899] 2 Q. B. 673.

The respondents contended that to constitute an offence under this section the scale must be false or unjust with reference to the trade use that in fact was being made of it, and they relied upon Withall v. Francis, 42 J. P. 612, and Crick v. Theobald, [1895] 64 L. J. M. C. 216, 43 W. R. Dig. 191.

But for the fact that the customers had requested the respondents to supply tea in such quantities and so packed as aforesaid the magistrate would have, following Lane v. Rendall, convicted the respondents, but it appeared to him impossible to say that the beam scales were false or unjust in the face of such request. The cases of Withall v. Francis and Harris v. Alwood, [1893] 53 J. P. 7, appeared to him to establish the contrary, and he accordingly dismissed the informations.

The appellants appealed, and the question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the facts the respondents ought to have been convicted.

Dickens, K.C. (Daldy with him), for the appellants.—Section 25 of the Act of 1878 makes it unlawful for a person to have on his premises "unjust or false scales," and the learned magistrate appears to have thought that as there was no fraudulent motive on the respondents' part they ought not to have been convicted. Under section 26 the consent of the purchaser is material, for under that section fraud has to be proved, but under section 25 the question of motive is wholly immaterial. It is no defence to say that these scales which had been manipulated by the addition to one arm of a small metal disc corresponding in weight to the bag were only to be used for a special purpose. In the interest of the public that argument could not be allowed to stand, for if proper supervision were not exercised the servants of the trader might use them: Great Western Railway Co. v. Bailie, 13 W. R. 203, 5 B. & S. 928, 34 L. J. M. C. 31. The case of Lane v. Rendall, 48 W. R. 153, [1899] 2 Q. B. 673, is expressly in point. [He was stopped by the court.]

Avory, K.C., and George Elliott, for the respondents.—The facts in this case show that the machine in itself was just and accurate, and in that sense was in compliance with section 25. The metal disc and the paper bag are no part of the machine. The bags supplied by the customers were printed with an intimation that the weight of the bag was included in the weight of the tea. The respondents were merely executing the wishes of their customers. Lane v. Rendall is distinguishable, because in that case the seller was a retail dealer, and the decision was simply that the purchaser who asked for a pound of tea was entitled to receive a pound of tea and not a pound of tea less the weight of the bag and package. Here what the customer asked for was a specified weight of tea less the weight of the bag. And that was what he got. Moreover, the case of Great Western Railway Co. v. Bailie, if it can be said to apply here at all, is really an authority in the respondents' favour as showing that the section is directed against machines which are in themseves unjust, and not against the particular use of an accurate machine: Withall v. Francis, 42 J. P. 612.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dickens, K.C., in reply.—The metal disc and the paper bag were not placed on the scales with the object of accurately weighing the article to be sold. Therefore Withall v. Francis is not an authority in the respondent's favour. So long as these additions remained as parts of the machine it was impossible for the scales to accurately weigh out the tea with what was just and true balance.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 9.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case I confess I have felt great difficulty during the argument and I am very anxious not to appear to lay down any general rule or any rule which is not applicable to the particular case. I have come to the conclusion, however, that the argument of Mr. Dickens is correct, and that the appeal must be allowed. There seems to me to be two classes of cases—the cases where scales are kept, used or had in possession—that is, used or kept for use—in a state which makes them false or unjust, that seems to be one class of cases which come under section 25. There is another class of cases where honest scales are honestly used in a particular way for the purpose of carrying out a particular weighing operation. The two cases are illustrated by Lane v. Rendall, on one side, and by Withall v. Francis on the other. I am anxious that I should not be thought to lay down any rule that it is an infringement of section 25 honestly to use scales that are otherwise just for the purpose of carrying out a particular operation by temporarily adjusting them for a given purpose, and the difficulty I have really felt in this case is within which class of cases upon the facts this case falls. I have come to the conclusion, for reasons which I will very briefly state, that the case falls within the class of cases in which the person against whom the proceedings have been taken, has had in his possession an unjust balance.

I think the real difficulty is upon these facts to say whether or not what the magistrate has found makes what was being done of the nature of a mere temporary adjustment of an honest balance for use for a particular purpose, or was having in his possession a scale which was inaccurate and unjust, contrary to section 25. I think on these facts it must be taken that not only this scale, but others open to the same objection were regularly kept in that condition. It is found that one of them had a metal disc, fixed by wire, to adjust the weight of the paper. It is found that the other had a folded paper bag placed underneath the scoop in which the tea was being weighed, or in other words the two scales are in such a condition that the material put into the weighing scoop would not be justly weighed. I think it may be possibly not an unfair method of construing section 25 to say that while there may be a temporary use of scales so as to make them carry out a particular weighing operation which is honest and desired to be done, the instrument in its normal condition as kept, must be in a condition to weigh justly, by which I mean accurately, that which is put in to be weighed. In this case the scales as kept will not weigh accurately the tea that is put into the scoop, it will weigh it plus the weight of the paper bag, which is underneath in the one case, and the metal disc which is fastened on in the other.

The case states that "the respondents weighed out tea only for those customers who were retail dealers in tea who requested to be supplied with it so packed." Such customers supplied the bags or wrappers. "At the time of the inspectors' said visit other scales in the same condition as the two scales, the subject of the information, were being used at the repondents' premises for weighing out tea for such customers as aforesaid, and there were also in use a number of scales for weighing out tea in full weights, and all these last mentioned scales were correct and just. Directions had been given by the respondents to their employees, who worked under proper supervision, not to use scales with a metal disc or paper bag to weigh out tea for any customers other than those above referred to." I think that statement shows that these scales complained of were permanently kept in that condition, and that it required what is here spoken of as supervision and superintendence, so that they might not be used for an improper purpose. Therefore it seems to me that that points to a condition of things which, though it may be perfectly innocent in itself, and really no substantial breach, yet still it is a contravention of the section, because the scales are kept in a condition in which they will not accurately and justly weigh that which is put in to be weighed. That the learned magistrate took that view of the facts I think is clear from the grounds upon which he dismissed the summons. He said: "But for the fact that the customers had requested the respondents to supply the tea in such quantities and so packed as aforesaid, I should have followed the case of Lane v. Rendall." In other words, he really has rather adopted the argument with which we were pressed by Mr. Avory in his most able argument, that the request to carry out this particular weighing operation was an answer to this summons. I say that if I had come to the conclusion that merely and solely for the time when these scales were being used for this particular purpose, a temporary adjustment was made, and that that was not found to be the condition of the scales as kept by the respondents, I should have come to a different conclusion. I think the magistrate has meant to find here that the scales were kept in the condition that they would not accurately weigh—would not justly weigh—what was put in to be weighed; that being so, he has thought that the mere request by customers to have their tea so weighed was an answer to the summons; I have therefore come to the conclusion that the appeal ought to be allowed.

With regard to the authorities, of course, there is Crick v. Theobald; so far as I can see that has nothing to do with the case. With regard to Withall v. Francis, that undoubtedly was a case coming within what I have called the temporary use of proper scales for a given purpose, and that is why I am so anxious it should not be thought I am laying down a rule that there is anything unlawful in doing what was recognized by the court as being lawful in Withall v. Francis. With regard to Lane v. Rendall, although it is a case exactly on the lines I have indicated, I do not think it can be recognized as laying down the rule apart from the facts of that case, because I have not the slightest doubt that in Lane v. Rendall the scales were being used for weighing paper and tea under the name of weighing tea; therefore, although no fraud was found, because it was found to be done for other purposes, yet the scales were being in fact kept and used in the unjust condition which I have already referred to—that is to say, not in the condition of weighing fairly and justly the tea that was put into the scale. This is obviously a technical breach, and one which I do not suppose it will be suggested for a moment that the respondents, who are weighing tea to be put into bags which were going to indicate that the paper bag was to be weighed, were doing anything in the least morally wrong, but I think that they have brought themselves within the mischief, because, after all, as was pointed out in this argument, if supervision is required for scales so adjusted, they may be used at times when that supervision fails for weighing other matters. Therefore I think technically there was a breach of this section, and that the magistrate ought to have convicted, notwithstanding there had been a request by customers to have their tea weighed, so that the weight of the bag might be included. I therefore think the appeal must be allowed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion, upon the ground that in this case, beyond doubt, the respondents were using, or had in their possession, a weight, measure, scale, and so forth, which was false and unjust at the time of the visit of the inspector. The object of the statute clearly was not that there should be an inquiry, when it has been found that there is a scale being used which is unjust, as to whether any fraud had been committed or not, because if that had been so in every case it would have been necessary for the respondents to come forward and say: "In this case nobody was taken in." The question is not whether it was false and unjust towards the particular customer who was using it, but whether it was false and unjust in fact. Nobody can doubt for a moment it was, if used by anybody else upon the premises, false and unjust at that time. Nobody could doubt if the disc or paper had been concealed, that that would have been a fraud; and one's idea upon section 25 is strengthened by section 26, which is really pointed to fraudulent user. There is no pretence for saying there was fraudulent user here, but it throws the burden upon inspectors of weights and measures to inquire every time whether the person had been taken in or not. The effect of the section seems to me to be perfectly clear; it is: Any persons who have in their possession weights and scales which are false and unjust even if they are false and unjust in a manner not to the injury of the customer (because if that had been so, if it had been concealed from him, there would have been an offence under section 26), seem to me to come entirely under it, and to come within the judgment in Lane v. Rendall. I therefore think that this appeal must be allowed.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The informations charge the respondents with using for trade a weighing machine—to wit, a beam scale—which was false or unjust. Now, speaking entirely for myself, it seems to me that the object, for a very obvious public reason, which was sought to be attained by this section, and that which in fact it does not attain as I construe it, is this: That the instrument itself must be such as in its condition, whether on a particular occasion or generally, when it is being used for trade, gives a just and true—that is, a correct result, as regards the weight of the thing being weighed, the thing placed in the scales; and if you have to consider an adjustment for any purpose, such as Mr. Avory in his very able argument contended, then my own personal view of this section is that the trader must make what is shown by the weight on the other side, by the balance, a true result of what is being weighed; but if with the most honest intention, and at the request of the purchaser, you try to obtain the adjustment by an alteration of the machine itself, you are then using a machine for trade which is false or unjust. It seems to me, I confess, that all the argument which seems (in fact, it is stated by the learned magistrate) to have weighed with him—and to have turned the scale, if I may say so, in his mind—as to the acquiescence or request of the purchaser, is nihil ad rem; and I will give an illustration which strikes me, at any rate as being an illustration which shews the danger of such a contention prevailing. A man, a trader, has a machine which, either as originally constructed or by reason, we will say, of some accident in the user, becomes to some extent inaccurate, is himself liable under the section, however honest his intent, if in fact he uses or employs an adjustment which is not an adjustment of the thing within the scale—that is, the thing to be weighed, but is an adjustment which affects the truth and accuracy of the weighing machine. Therefore it seems to me that, while I was struck with it at the time, put in the clear and persuasive way in which Mr. Avory put it, there is a fallacy in the analogy suggested of an adjustment of scale by putting in a weight into one scale in order to get a result which could not otherwise be attained, owing, we will say, to the deficiency of a three-pound weight when three pounds was all to be got out of the other side. You are not affecting the truth or accuracy of the machine so as to make it false or unjust if you are putting into the scale to be weighed as part of the thing to be weighed, any weight you like, because then unjust and inaccurate. Enter a purchaser who says: "I want to have tea weighed." The trader says: "Well, I have got a machine for weighing, but it is inaccurate." "Oh, never mind," says the purchaser, "we will get as near as we can." Now, I have taken the strongest case that you could take both of honesty and request; I have no doubt in my mind that if that trader uses a machine that is inaccurate, and the inspector entered the shop at that moment and saw the operation the section would apply. It must apply. You could not say he was not using a machine which was false or inaccurate. The object was the safety of the public in the user, as well as the possession of an accurate machine. An accurate machine is one that shows correctly the weight of the thing put into the opposite scale which is to hold the goods to be weighed. But if by reason of any adjustment of the machine, you make, not the thing weighed, accurately weighed, but make the machine represent that in its result which is not the fair weight of the thing in the scale by an alteration or adjustment of the machine, it appears so me, I confess, entirely speaking for myself, that whether it was with acquiescence or without acquiescence on any one occasion or many occasions there would be user of the machine within the section. There is no reason why you should not put in the scale any weights you like to make the three-pound balance, or because you have got a weight on the other side which is larger than the one you want to obtain, you fill up the tea by putting, honestly, of course, a weight in the scale. There is no objection to that. If you alter the machine itself, so that, as it stands, its contents are not truly represented on the index on the other side, it seems to me the Act has been contravened under this section, and there has been a user of an instrument which is in fact inaccurate and unjust.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, W. A. Blaxland.

Solicitors for the respondents, Lamb, Son, & Prance.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright and Ridley, JJ.) — Jan. 25.

In re A DEBTOR.
Ex parte ROCK RED BRICK CO. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Stay of execution—Judgment summons—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g) —County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 25, rr. 17, 25, 26, 27

A creditor having obtained judgment in the High Court issued a judgment summons in the county court against the debtor, and also a bankruptcy notice, under which an act of bankruptcy became completed before an order was made on the judgment summons. After the order had been made another creditor presented a bankruptcy petition founded on the above act of bankruptcy.

Held, that as there was a completed act of bankruptcy before the making of an order on the judgment summons, a receiving order ought to be made.

Appeal from a decision of the registrar of the county court at Leeds, refusing to make a receiving order.

Upon the 21st of September, 1903, the Leeds Patent Brick Co. obtained a judgment against the debtor in the High Court for £43, and took out a judgment summons for the amount on the 25th of September in the county court at Leeds.

The summons was served upon the debtor upon the 2nd of October, and was returnable for the 2nd of November. On the 13th of October the same creditor issued a bankruptcy notice against the debtor founded on the same judgment. This notice was served upon the debtor upon the 17th of October, and the act of bankruptcy thereunder became completed on the 25th of October.

Upon the 2nd of November the judgment summons came on for hearing in the county court, when an order was made for payment of the judgment debt by instalments.

Upon the 3rd of November the Rock Red Brick Co., the present appellants, presented a bankruptcy petition against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy relied upon being non-compliance with the bankruptcy notice issued by the Leeds Patent Brick Co.

The petition was heard upon the 27th of November, when the receiving order was refused, on the ground that a bankruptcy notice could not properly be issued pending the hearing of a judgment summons based on the same debt.

The petitioning creditor appealed.

Ringwood, for the appellant.—The question here is whether the issue of a judgment summons operates as a stay of execution so as to preclude the creditor from issuing a bankruptcy notice upon the same judgment. The learned registrar based his judgment on the decisions in Jones v. Jenner, 25 L. J. Ex. 319 and Montgomery & Co. v. De Bulmes, 47 W. R. 22, [1898] 2 Q. B. 420, but they do not appear to be applicable. [WRIGHT, J.—Jones v. Jenner has no application to this case.] I rely upon Ex parte Johnston, In re Watson, 41 W. R. 34, [1893] 1 Q. B. 21. [He was stopped by the court.]

Hansell, for the debtor.—The issue of a judgment summons has the effect of staying all other forms of execution: see the County Court Rules of 1889, ord. 25, rr. 17, 25, 26, 27. [WRIGHT, J.—Those rules cannot limit the power to issue execution in the High Court.] The County Court Rules apply in the High Court for the purpose of judgment summonses. [WRIGHT, J.—Rule 27 can only apply to county court judgments.] Then I say that the principle laid down in Montgomery & Co. v. De Bulmes is applicable to this case, that where a plaintiff issues a judgment summons in the county court and obtains an order for payment by instalments, he relinquishes his right to issue execution in the High Court.

Ringwood, in reply.—In this case there was a completed act of bankruptcy before the instalment order was made.

WRIGHT, J.—This is a very short point. The receiving order was wrongly refused by the registrar for the simple reason that there was a completed act of bankruptcy available to any creditor before the date when the order for payment by instalments was made. That, to my mind, is an end of the case. Apart from that reason, I should have thought that there was a great deal in Mr. Hansell's point that the principle laid down in Montgomery & Co. v. De Bulmes ought to apply.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree. I do not see how we can come to any other decision, seeing that the act of bankruptcy was completed before the making of the order under the Debtors Act.

Appeal allowed; leave to appeal granted.

Solicitors for the appellant, Barton & Pearman, for Scatcherd, Hopkins, & Middlebrooks, Leeds.

Solicitors for the respondent, Walter & E. H. Foster, Leeds.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Dec. 14; Jan. 18.

In re REIS.
Ex parte THE TRUSTEE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Marriage settlement—Covenant for future settlement of property — Transfer of property to trustees of settlement after act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47, sub-section 2.

In construing section 47, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, "Any covenant or contract made in consideration of marriage for the future settlement on or for the settlor's wife or children of any money or property wherein he had not at the date of his marriage any estate or interest, whether vested or contingent, in possession or remainder, and not being money or property of or in right of his wife, shall on his becoming bankrupt before the property or money has been actually transferred or paid pursuant to the contract or covenant, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy," the words "on his becoming bankrupt" must be interpreted to mean on his committing an act of bankruptcy within three months of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition on which he is subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt.

Motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy to set aside a conveyance of property by the bankrupt to the trustees of his marriage settlement made upon the 10th of June, 1903.

In 1879, Reis, the bankrupt, had executed a settlement in consideration of marriage, whereby he covenanted (inter alia) that "all real and personal property, if any, except business assets, to which the settlor or his wife may at any time become entitled," should be conveyed to the trustees of the settlement.

In 1880 Reis became bankrupt, but obtained his discharge in 1882.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1894 he was again in difficulty and made a composition with his creditors. After that he started the business of an outside stockbroker and for some years was very successful in business.

In 1901 he bought and furnished a house in Holland Park, the subject-matter of the conveyance now sought to be set aside.

In 1903 he was unfortunate in business; in April his position was serious, and by the date of the mid-May Stock Exchange Account had become worse. He had only four or five creditors of importance, all of whom were members of the Stock Exchange.

On the 23rd of May the trustees of his marriage settlement gave him a written notice requiring him to convey to them the house and furniture in Holland Park.

On the 26th of May he summoned his two largest creditors to meet him in the presence of his solicitor, told them that he was not in a position to meet his liabilities on the impending settlement day, and authorized them to close his account, which they at once did.

On the 10th of June he conveyed the house and furniture to the trustees of his marriage settlement, and on the 12th of June he held a meeting of his creditors and offered them a composition of 2s. in the £1, which was refused.

A receiving order was made against him on the 15th of July; he was subsequently adjudged bankrupt, and a trustee was appointed, who moved to set aside the transfer of the 10th of June.

Upon the hearing of the motion evidence was called on both sides as to what was said by the debtor and his solicitor to the creditors whom they saw on th 26th of May. Wright, J., came to the conclusion on the evidence of the witnesses for the respondent alone that what was said by the bankrupt and his solicitor amounted to notice of intention to suspend payment and consequently that an act of bankruptcy was committed by Reis on the 26th of May. Various points were argued on both sides, but the only arguments which the court considered necessary for the decision of the case appear in the judgment.

Herbert Reed, K.C., David, and Adler, for the trustee in bankruptcy.

Horridge, K.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the trustees of the marriage settlement.

Hansell and Macklin, for the bankrupt's wife.

WRIGHT, J. (after dealing with the evidence).—Then, that being the conclusion of fact, there was an act of bankruptcy on the 26th of May. On the 10th of June the debtor transferred to the trustees of his marriage settlement the after-acquired property which he had covenanted to settle. A receiving order was made against him on the 15th of July, and the effect of the whole is that the bankruptcy relates back to the 26th of May. Then section 42, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is: "Any covenant or contract made in consideration of marriage, for the future settlement on or for the settlor's wife or children of any money or property wherein he had not at the date of his marriage any estate or interest, whether vested or contingent in possession or remainder, and not being money or property of or in right of his wife, shall, on his becoming bankrupt before the property or money has been actually transferred or paid pursuant to the contract or covenant, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy." On the construction of those words the first question is, What is the meaning of "becoming bankrupt"? There is apparently no authority to guide me in that. There are strong reasons urged for the view that "commencement of the bankruptcy" would have been used if that had been meant. On the other hand it is said that "adjudicated bankrupt" would have been more natural than "becoming bankrupt" if that had been meant. I must construe "becoming bankrupt" by the right of section 43. Section 43, reading only the material words, says: "The bankruptcy of a debtor . . . shall be deemed . . . to commence at . . . the time of the first of the acts of bankruptcy proved to have been committed within three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition." If the bankruptcy is to be deemed to have commenced at that time, then as from the date when it is to be deemed to have commenced the bankrupt must be deemed to have become bankrupt.

Then, secondly, comes the question, What is the proper meaning of the words "becoming bankrupt before the property or money has been actually transferred or paid pursuant to the contract or covenant"? It has been argued that various kinds of constructive transfers are enough. It seems to me that the very object of the language used is to exclude all such arguments, and that it means what it says; that the sub-section is to apply unless there has been an actual legal transfer pursuant to the contract or covenant. The cases of Ramsay v. Margrett, [1894] 2 Q. B. 18, 42 W. R. Dig. 10, and In re Satterthwaite, 2 Mans. 52, which were decided on the Bills of Sale Acts, do not seem to me in point. In Ramsay v. Margrett there had been an actual verbal sale and payment of consideration. In Satterthwaite's case the house and furniture in it had been actually assigned to trustees for the wife and under those circumstances it was held that possession which might on the face of it be ambiguous must follow the title. Here there was no actual transfer until the 10th of June. I think section 47 cannot be construed by any reference to the Bills of Sale Acts, and that there was no actual transfer here at the date of the 26th of May.

Then it remains only to consider whether section 47 is in any way subject to or modified by section 49. That point has not been really argued, and I do not think it could be properly argued. Section 49 seems, on the face of it, only to be applicable where section 47 does not apply, and the enumeration of the cases where section 49 is to apply does not include any description applicable to the facts of this case. The transfer to the trustees was not a payment by the bankrupt to any of his creditors; it was not a payment or delivery to the bankrupt; it was not a conveyance or assignment by the bankrupt for valuable consideration; and it was not a contract, dealing, or transaction by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration. I think it is not desirable to decide the difficult and doubtful questions which arise on other parts of the case, because it seems to me that I am bound to come to the conclusion to which I have come on the question of fact, and on the construction of section 47. The transfer must be declared void as against the trustee in bankruptcy.

Application allowed.

Solicitors for the applicant, W. H. Martin & Co.

Solicitors for the trustees of the marriage settlement, Norden & Defries.

Solicitors for the bankrupt's wife, Spyer & Son.

K. B. Div.
(Wright and Phillimore, JJ.) Dec. 7, 12.

In re JOHNSON.
Ex parte MATTHEWS & WILKINSON. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Settlement of settlor's own property — Limitation of life interest to settlor determinable on bankruptcy — Second bankruptcy — Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47.

In 1893 the bankrupt had settled property on trustees who were to pay him the income, but upon bankruptcy his rights to the income were to cease, and the trustees were left with the power to apply the income to his support or accumulate it as they thought fit. In 1900 he became bankrupt; the trustees raised enough out of the settled funds to pay the debts in full, but the bankruptcy was not formally annulled. In 1902 he again became bankrupt, and the trustee in bankruptcy claimed the life income.

Held, that the trustee could not succeed, as the bankrupt's interest in the income had determined upon his bankruptcy in 1900, and passed to the trustees of the settlement.

Appeal from a decision of the county court judge at Manchester.

In 1893 the bankrupt Johnson, who had then just come of age, made a settlement of certain property of which settlement the appellants were the trustees. The bankrupt had never married.

The property settled consisted of a share of the residue passing to the bankrupt under his grandfather's will. The testator, when bequeathing legacies to his sons for their lives, made such legacies determinable upon bankruptcy or upon the assignment or charging of the annual income.

The settlement made by the bankrupt in 1893 did not express the trust and limitations clearly, but by reference to his grandfather's will.

The effect of the two instruments read together was that the settlor assigned property to the trustees on trust to pay him the annual income until he was declared bankrupt or assigned or charged his income. On such events his interests were to determine, and the trustees were to have power to apply the income or any part thereof for his support or otherwise in their discretion, and to apply the residue, if any, for the benefit of his children, if any, or to accumulate it and add it to the settled funds which were eventually to go to relatives.

Johnson was adjudicated bankrupt for the first time in 1900, when the trustee in the bankruptcy moved to set aside the settlement so far as was necessary to pay the debts of the bankrupt, and an order to this effect was made by consent. The settlement trustees raised money enough out of the settled funds to pay all the debts provable in the bankruptcy, but there was no formal order annulling the bankruptcy.

In 1902 Johnson again became bankrupt, and the trustee in this bankruptcy moved to set aside the settlement as before. This time, however, the application was opposed, and with success, the county court judge finding as a fact that at the time when the bankrupt executed the settlement, which was more than two years before the bankruptcy, he was able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement.

The trustee then applied for a declaration that the life estate of the bankrupt under the settlement vested in him, and that he was entitled to the income thereof with the arrears.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The county court judge made an order to that effect, from which the present appeal was brought.

Leigh Clare, for the appellants.—The order was wrong because there was nothing on which it could take effect. All the bankrupt's interest passed to the trustees on his being made bankrupt in 1900.

Carrington, for the respondent.—The first bankruptcy must be treated as having been annulled, as all the debts provable therein were paid in full: Metcalfe v. Metcalfe, 38 W. R. 397, 43 Ch. D. 633.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 12.—The judgment of the COURT (WRIGHT and PHILLIMORE, JJ.) was read by PHILLIMORE, J. (after stating the facts).—An owner of property cannot by way of settlement or contract qualify his own interest in property by a condition determining or controlling it, in the event of his own bankruptcy, to the disappointment or delay of his creditors. This was decided in Wilson v. Greenwood, 1 Swans. 471, and the decision has been followed in a number of cases, many of which will be found enumerated in Mackintosh v. Pogose, 43 W. R. 247, [1895] 1 Ch. 505.

But this rule applies only to a limitation upon bankruptcy, and to cases where but for this limitation the property or income would have come to the assignee or trustee in bankruptcy, and then only so far as it would have thus come. Thus in Detmold v. Detmold, 37 W. R. 442, 40 Ch. D. 585, the husband settlor, with a similar clause, suffered an incumbrance of his income by the appointment of a receiver at the suit of a judgment creditor on the 19th of July, 1888. In or about September of the same year he was adjudicated a bankrupt upon an act of bankruptcy committed on the 29th of July. It was held that before the act of bankruptcy there had been a forfeiture by the husband owing to the appointment of a receiver; that the limitation over to the wife upon such forfeiture was good, inasmuch as it defeated a particular alienee, and was not a fraud on the bankrupt laws; that, therefore, the gift over had taken effect before the bankruptcy, the income had become vested in the wife, and there was nothing for the trustee in bankruptcy to take.

Following this authority, the judge in In re Brewer's Settlement, Morton v. Blackmore, 45 W. R. 8, [1896] 2 Ch. 503, stated as follows the point which he had to determine: "The question is whether the life interest had determined previously to bankruptcy." In that case it was held that what had been done previously to the bankruptcy did not amount to forfeiture or determination of the life interest, and therefore the trustee in bankruptcy took the life interest.

In the case before us the trustee in the first bankruptcy, if he had failed in setting aside the settlement would have succeeded in getting the bankrupt's life interest under it, because to allow the limitation over to take effect would have been in the language of the cases, a "fraud upon the bankrupt laws," or a disposition of property forbidden by law. But though the alienation could not take effect so as to disappoint and delay the creditors in the first bankruptcy, it operated as against the settlor as a forfeiture. He lost all his rights to the residue left after paying those creditors. The income came under the control and discretion of the trustees. If the limitation over had been to a determined person (as to the wife in In re Detmold), she would have claimed a vested interest, which could only have been divested by impeaching the settlement—an impeachment which in this case has failed.

The case looks different because the trustees of the settlement have a discretionary power; but the law to be applied is the same. The appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, W. E. Dowson.

Solicitor for the respondent, W. B. Glasier.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J.) } Jan. 19.

MAYOR, &c., OF NORTHAMPTON v. ELLEN. (a.)

Waterworks—Water rate—Supply of water—Differentiation of rates—Corporation of borough—"Rates"—Northampton Waterworks Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. xlvii.), s. 59—Northampton Corporation Waterworks Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. ccviii.), ss. 10, 25, 36—Northampton (Extension) Order, 1900, Art. 36.

By section 59 of the Northampton Waterworks Act, 1861 (which incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847), the waterworks company might from time to time supply any person with water for such remuneration and on such terms and conditions as should be agreed upon. By the Northampton Corporation Waterworks Act, 1884, the waterworks undertaking was transferred to the corporation with all the authorities, rights, powers, and privileges of the company. By section 36 of the Act "the corporation may thenceforward charge for the supply of water for domestic use to any dwelling-house a sum not exceeding 7½ per centum per annum on the net rateable value of such dwelling-house, as ascertained by the valuation list in force at the commencement of the quarter during which the water rate becomes payable, or if there be no such list, then on the net rateable value of such dwelling-house as the same is assessed to the last poor rate." There was no section in any of the Acts which gave any specific directions or powers as to either equality or differentiation of rating. The defendants' dwelling-house was, until 1900, situated in Kingsthorpe, a district outside the borough of Northampton, but within the corporation's area of water supply. By the Northampton (Extension) Order, 1900, the area of the borough was extended so as to include that part of Kingsthorpe where the defendants' house was situated, and by article 36 of the order the general district rates to be levied in the added part of Kingsthorpe were not in any one year for ten years to "exceed such an amount as, when added to the poor rate and the borough rate, and any other rate made by the corporation in the same year," would make up a total rate of 5*s.* 6*d. in the pound on the rateable value of such hereditament. The rates levied in the added part of Kingsthorpe (other than the water rate) always amounted to* 5*s.* 6*d. in the pound. The corporation had, down to June,* 1901, been paid a water rate of 7½ per cent. from all domestic consumers in the old borough and the added part. In June, 1901, the corporation reduced the water rate to 5 per cent. in the case of consumers in the old borough, but retained it at 7½ per cent. in the case of consumers in the added part.

Held, (1) that there was nothing in the Acts to prevent the corporation from differentiating the water rate as above set forth; and (2) that the words "any other rate" in article 36 of the Northampton (Extension) Order, 1900, did not include a water rate, and that the corporation were entitled to charge a water rate from the defendant, though the rate payable by him, exclusive of the water rate, amounted to 5*s.* 6*d. in the pound.*

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J., upon a special case stated for the opinion of the court in an action (reported in 87 L. T. 335).

The plaintiffs claimed from the defendant, who was a burgess and ratepayer of the borough of Northampton, £1 4s. 9d., being the amount of a quarterly instalment of the annual water rate for the supply of water for domestic use to his dwelling-house at Kingsthorpe, a district which had formed part of the area of water supply since 1861, and was incorporated with the borough of Northampton by the Northampton (Extension) Order, 1900. The said sum of £1 4s. 9d. was made up of £1 0s. 3d., being one quarter's instalment of an annual rate of 7½ per cent. on the rateable value of £54, and 4s. 6d., being one-one-quarter's instalment of an annual rate of 18s. extra charges for bath and water-closets. The defendant only disputed the payment of the sum of £1 0s. 3d. In 1884 the plaintiffs, in pursuance of powers conferred on them by section 19 of the Northampton Waterworks Act, 1882, purchased the undertaking of the Northampton Waterworks Co. (which company was incorporated by the Northampton Waterworks Act, 1861) by virtue of an Act called the Northampton Corporation Waterworks Act, 1884.

By section 10 of the Act of 1884 the Act of 1861 and the Act of 1882 were to be read as if the plaintiffs had been therein named instead of the company. The plaintiffs' rate for the supply of water for domestic use was based on section 36 of the Act of 1884, which repealed section 49 of the Act of 1861, by which rates varying with different annual values were authorized. Section 36 of the Act of 1884 said that "the corporation may thenceforward charge for the supply of water for domestic use to any dwelling-house a sum not exceeding seven and a-half per centum per annum on the net rateable value of such dwelling-house, as ascertained by the valuation list in force at the commencement of the quarter during which the water rate becomes payable, or if there be no such list then on the net rateable value of such dwelling-house as the same is assessed to the last poor rate."

By section 5 the "undertaking" which was transferred to the plaintiffs included (inter alia) all authorities, rights, powers, and privileges of the company.

Section 20, sub-section 2, provided that any moneys borrowed in the manner authorized by that section should be a charge on the net revenue of the water undertaking and on the district fund and general district rate, or some or one of them; and such revenue or rate should be deemed to be the local rate within the Local Loans Act, 1875.

Section 24 provided that the corporation should keep accounts in respect of their water undertaking separate from all their other accounts, and should apply all money from time to time received on account of revenue in a certain order, and should carry the balance in any year to the district fund.

Section 25 of the Act of 1884 provided as follows: "If in any year, the amount standing to the credit of the water account be insufficient for the payment of the charges thereon, and the execution of this Act in relation to the water undertaking, the deficiency shall be made up out of the general district rate by carrying an adequate sum therefrom to the credit of the water account, and the corporation from time to time, in preparing the estimates of the amount required in their judgment to be raised by means of a general district rate for the purposes of the borough may include therein such sums (if any) as in the judgment of the corporation are necessary to be provided in aid of the deficiency from time to time arising as aforesaid in the water account, and shall collect the same as part of such general district rate." There was no section in this or any of the other Acts which gave any specific directions or powers as to either equality or differentiation of rating.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Northampton Waterworks Act, 1861, incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and by section 59 "the company may from time to time supply any person with water for any purpose for which such supply may be required, for such remuneration and upon such terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon between the company and the person desirous of having such supply of water, under a special agreement." The defendant's dwelling-house was and had always been situate within the plaintiffs' statutory area of supply, and the plaintiffs did not contend that any special circumstances existed rendering his dwelling-house less favourably situated than the other dwelling-houses within the said area for purposes of supply or rating. The defendant had since the commencement of his occupation of the dwelling-house until the 24th of June, 1901, paid a water rate of 7½ per cent. of the net rateable value. In 1900 the boundaries of the then borough of Northampton were extended so as to include that part of Kingsthorpe in which the defendant's house was situated. Article 36 of the Northampton (Extension) Order, 1900, which was confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 14) Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. clxxxiii.), was as follows: "The general district rates to be levied in the added part of . . . Kingsthorpe . . . shall not in any one year during a period of ten years from the commencement of this order exceed such an amount in the pound as, when added to the poor rate and the borough rate and any other rate made by the corporation in the same year, will in respect of the assessment of any hereditament included in any such rate make up . . . in the case of the added part of Kingsthorpe a total rate of five shillings and sixpence on each pound of the rateable value of such hereditament." From the commencement of the operation of the said order up to the present time the rates levied in the added part of Kingsthorpe (other than the water rate) had continuously amounted to 5s. 6d. in the pound. From the commencement of the order until the 24th of June, 1901, the plaintiffs continued to demand a water rate of 7½ per cent. per annum from the defendant and all other domestic consumers both in the old borough and the added parts. On and after the 24th of June, 1901, the plaintiffs reduced the water rate from 7½ to 5 per cent. per annum in the case of domestic consumers within the boundaries of the old borough, but retained the rate of 7½ per cent. in the case of the defendant and all other domestic consumers in the added part of Kingsthorpe. This differentiation of the water rate was effected by the plaintiffs in accordance with a recommendation of the town council which stated that the deficiency so created was to be met out of the district rate, and that as the district rate for this purpose would only be chargeable within the old borough, it was obvious that the reduction ought to apply only to the old borough until such time as the rates on the newly added portion ceased to be differential. It was estimated that this reduction would leave a sum of about £3,500 to be contributed out of the district rate of the old borough. The plaintiffs stated that they deemed it equitable to effect the reduction on the ground that a large amount of property in the borough of Northampton which was rateable to the poor and district rates, and which benefited by the presence of an adequate public water supply for fire extinguishing and sanitary purposes, did not pay anything towards the cost of the water undertaking, because the owners and occupiers of the said property did not, in respect of the same, take any water from the water supply of the plaintiffs, and that as a means of enforcing contribution from the said owners and occupiers the plaintiffs had adopted the reduction, so that the said owners and occupiers within the old borough would by their contributions to the district rate fund have to make good any deficiency created by the reduction of the water rate. There were in the added parts a number of residents who did not take the plaintiffs' water supply for domestic purposes, and whose property was therefore not subject to the payment of water rate.

The plaintiffs contended that they were entitled to refrain from reducing the water rate in the added parts from the 7½ per cent. now levied, inasmuch as the ratepayers in the said added parts, being privileged from an increase in the district rate for a period of ten years (which period has not yet elapsed), would bear no part of the extra burden that might be thrown upon the district rate of the old borough by reason of any deficiency resulting from such reduction.

The defendant contended (1) that the said water rate was a rate within the meaning of article 36 of the Northampton (Extension) Order, 1900, and that, inasmuch as the poor, borough, and general district rates payable by him amounted together to the maximum sum of 5s. 6d. in the pound fixed by the said order, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover from him the said sum of £1 0s. 3d. or any other sum in respect of the water rate. (2) In the alternative, that if he was chargeable with a water rate the plaintiffs were not authorized to demand of him a higher rate than that demanded in respect of domestic consumers in the old borough taking a similar supply under similar circumstances, either upon the contention of the plaintiffs set forth herein or at all, the differentiation of the water rate as effected by the plaintiffs being contrary to the terms and intention of the Northampton (Extension) Order, 1900, not being authorized by the Acts of 1861, 1882, or 1884, and being in breach of the general law of the realm; and the defendant claimed that the plaintiffs were bound to place all domestic consumers in the borough on an equality save in so far as express statutory powers might authorize otherwise. (3) That the plaintiffs were not authorized to estimate for a deficiency on the water account as they had done for the reasons given by them, either accompanied by the aforesaid differentiation or not so accompanied.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether the plaintiffs were entitled to differentiate the water rate as hereinbefore set forth. (2) Whether the plaintiffs were entitled to demand a water rate of the defendant within the period of ten years from the commencement of the extension order, so long as the rates payable by the defendant, exclusive of water rate, amounted to 5s. 6d. in the pound. (3) Whether the plaintiffs were entitled to reduce the water rate for the purpose of creating a deficiency on the grounds hereinbefore stated.

If the court answered the above questions, more particularly the first, in the affirmative, judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs. If the court should answer them, more particularly the first, in the negative, judgment should be entered for the defendant.

Bigham, J., in answer to the first question, held that the plaintiffs had no power to differentiate the rate. In answer to the second question he held that the water rate was not a rate to be taken into consideration in making up the total rate of 5s. 6d., and he accordingly answered the second question in the affirmative. He answered the third question in the negative. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and Ryland Adkins, for the plaintiffs.

Horace Avory, K.C., Forder Lampard, and Bernard Campion, for the defendant.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a case of importance, because if Bigham, J.'s, judgment stands, it is a clear and simple decision that by reason of section 36 of the Northampton Corporation Waterworks Act, 1884, the plaintiffs have no power to differentiate the water rate. That is a decision of very great importance, and it is one which has been on several occasions suggested in other circumstances, but has never until the present case received judicial sanction; and I am very anxious to see if the reasons given by Bigham, J., in his judgment for that conclusion were founded upon the considerations urged before us by Mr. Avory on the appeal—namely, that there must be equality of charge for the supply of public commodities, such as water, in the same way as there must be equality of charge in the case of the poor rate. It will be convenient if I state what are the points raised in the case. The action was brought to recover £1 4s. 9d., being the amount of one quarter's instalment of an annual water rate, of which £1 0s. 3d. represented a sum equal to 7½ per cent. upon the rateable value of the defendant's dwelling-house. There is no question that the defendant is liable to pay the water rate, and that the sum claimed is within the maximum charge allowed by the Act. The defendant, however, says that while he is liable to pay a charge based on 7½ per cent., every domestic consumer must pay on 7½ per cent., and that if the other customers are not charged at that rate the plaintiffs cannot recover it from him.

In these circumstances the defendant contends that the plaintiffs have no power to charge under their statutory powers a rate other than an equal rate for all consumers; and, further, that by virtue of the provisional order, which enlarged the boundaries of the borough of Northampton so as to include Kingsthorpe, the total rates, including the water rate, are not in Kingsthorpe to exceed 5s. 6d. in the pound for ten years. In the first place I will deal with an argument advanced by Mr. Avory—namely, that the effect of only charging 5 per cent. for water in the old part of the borough would be that a larger sum in respect of a deficiency in the water account would have to be charged on the general district rate within the old part of the borough, and that, therefore, there would be greater probability of the sum 5s. 6d. being maintained as the total rate to be levied in Kingsthorpe, and the inhabitants of Kingsthorpe would be thereby deprived of the chance of the rate being reduced below 5s. 6d. I confess that I am wholly unable to see how that question can be raised by the defendant in this action. The defendant does not say that the charge for water made upon him is not a lawful charge. He only says that the plaintiffs cannot reduce the rate in the old part of the borough and that the grounds for reducing the rate alleged by them are not valid grounds. Unless, therefore, the defendant can maintain the ground upon which Bigham, J., decided the case—namely, the necessity for equality of charge—he is not entitled to place himself in the position of a ratepayer who complains that the conduct of the corporation is ultra vires. I see the difficulty of a single ratepayer raising that question; but I think that a ratepayer might, either with the assistance of the Attorney-General, or by some other proceeding, question the right of the corporation to reduce the rates for the supply of water so as to increase the general district rate and thus to throw an increased burden upon it. That question, however, cannot be raised in this action so as to cut down the right of the plaintiffs to make a perfectly lawful charge within the maximum.

That brings me to the main point in the case—namely, can the plaintiffs differentiate the water rates and does the fact of their doing so make the rate bad? The absence of an equality of charge clause from the Waterworks Acts has been commented on in many cases. The case of Hungerford Market Co. v. City Steamboat Co., 3 E. & E. 365, is of importance in this connection, because it raised the question as to the obligation of a company entitled by statute to take tolls for passengers embarking or disembarking at a pier to charge a uniform toll, there being no equality clause in the statute. The court held that there was no such obligation. There are sections in the Northampton Waterworks Act, 1861, which enabled the waterworks company to make contracts of all kinds for the supply of water. By section 59, "The company may from time to time supply any person with water for any purpose for which such supply may be required, for such remuneration and upon such terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon between the company and the person desirous of having such supply of water, under a special agreement." If a water consumer is entitled to make an agreement the effect of which would be that he would pay less for his supply of water than other consumers, that would destroy to a great extent the foundation of Mr. Avory's argument. In 1884 the waterworks company's undertaking was transferred to and vested in the corporation of Northampton. The undertaking has to be carried on by the corporation as a separate and distinct undertaking, the accounts having to be kept separate from all other accounts of the corporation, subject to this, that there is the security of the general district rate for any deficiency in the amount standing to the credit of the water account. The waterworks simply became the corporation's waterworks instead of the company's waterworks. All the authorities, rights, powers, and privileges of the company were transferred to the corporation, and the corporation was placed in the same position as the company in so far as concerned their powers of dealing with their customers. It is said that section 36 of the Act of 1884 imports the obligation of equality of charge, and that the effect of the section is to make a charge which is not equal to all domestic consumers a bad charge. I am unable to take that view. The only effect of the section seems to me to be to alter the statutory mode of payment prescribed by section 49 of the Act of 1861, and to introduce into the calculation the net rateable value of the dwelling-house. It is impossible to say that section 36 overrides the powers of the corporation, by virtue of their being the successors of the company, to enter into agreements with customers as to the supply of water. It is no defence to this action to say that, though the £1 0s. 3d. is due from the defendant, yet by some arrangement, either public or private, the corporation charge other consumers only 5 per cent. It is not, in my opinion, correct to speak of this particular corporation as making a rate for water. That may or may not be the case with other corporations. This corporation charges for a supply of water, the charge being fixed by a percentage on the net rateable value. There is no foundation for saying that the power to make agreements as to the charge for the supply of water is cut down by section 36. For these reasons I think that the ground upon which Bigham, J., decided against the corporation—namely, that they have no right to differentiate the charge—is bad, and the appeal must be allowed.

With regard to the second question raised in the case, I agree with Bigham, J., that the words of article 36 of the Northampton Extension Order, 1900, "and any other rate made by the corporation," do not include a water rate. The words mean rates in the proper sense of the term, and do not include water rates.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion, and as we are differing from Bigham, J., I will add a few words. The question is whether the corporation are entitled to differentiate the water rate—in other words, whether they are entitled to charge persons in one district one rate and persons in another district another rate. Bigham, J., upheld the contention that the corporation are not entitled to do so. We have to see whether the Act has imposed a limitation on the right of the corporation to charge for water supplied for domestic use to a dwelling-house other than a limitation as to the maximum charge allowable. That is to say, we have to see whether the Act imposes the obligation of equality of charge. We begin the discussion by the admission that there is no express provision to that effect in the Act. It is said, however, that section 36 of the Northampton Corporation Waterworks Act, 1884, imposes the obligation of equality. I do not think that that is the true effect of the section. That section repealed section 49 of the Northampton Waterworks Act, 1861, which prescribed a number of different standards of charge varying with the annual rack-rent or value of the dwelling-house, and provides that "the corporation may thenceforward charge for the supply of water for domestic use to any dwelling-house a sum not exceeding 7½ per centum per annum on the net rateable value of such dwelling-house as ascertained by the valuation list in force at the commencement of the quarter during which the water rate becomes payable." The section uses the term "water rate." It does not, however, by any other expression indicate whether the rate is to be an equal rate on every dwelling-house in proportion to its net rateable value. It is said that the words "any dwelling-house" mean all dwelling-houses. That suggestion seems to me to impose a gloss upon the words which cannot be supported. But even if the word "all" were substituted for "any," the section only imposes a rate of 7½ per cent. as a maximum charge. Why should we import into the section an obligation of equality of charge? The main reason alleged is that the section calls it a "water rate," and the suggested analogy of a poor rate has been pressed upon us. It seems to me that the basis upon which the obligation of equality of charge rests in the case of a poor rate is entirely absent when one comes to consider the case of a water rate. In the original enactment by which the poor rate was established there is, no doubt, no express provision for equality of rate; but the very reason and essence of the poor rate involve equality, because it is an imposition upon citizens in favour of the community at large to contribute to the poor fund according to their means. What possible analogy is there between that and the case of a person purchasing a marketable commodity, such as water? The latter case is altogether different from the obligation of a citizen to fulfil a public duty and to support a public burden. Further, when one considers that that marketable commodity is necessarily supplied at different cost to different localities, it seems to me to presuppose that there may be an inequality of charge. There is, therefore, no presumption of equality of charge. I have dealt with the case upon principle, because the argument in support of the obligation of equality of charge is founded on the use of the word "rate" in the section and on the fact that a percentage charge is imposed. But there is an authority which assists us in determining the question. In Hungerford Market Co v. City Steamboat Co. it was held that there was no obligation of equality of charge to different persons for what was the same thing, and that was because there were no express words in the statute requiring equality of charge, and there was no necessary implication to that effect to be derived from any provision in the statute. That case related to tolls to be charged for persons embarking or disembarking at a landing-place. There is no higher implication to be derived from the use of the word "rate" in the present Act than there was from the use of the word "toll" in that Act. For these reasons, as well as for those given by the Lord Chief Justice, I am of opinion that the judgment of Bigham, J., cannot be supported.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. My first impression was in favour of the decision of the learned judge in the court below, but having heard all the arguments I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the Act to show that all the houses in the borough of Northampton must be charged at the same rate. I will first consider the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, which is incorporated with the Northampton Waterworks Act, 1861. Is there anything in the Act of 1847 which shows that the rate must be based on the same percentage of the rateable value of all the dwelling-houses in the district? I cannot find any such provision. As has already been pointed out, there is nothing which makes it primâ facie fair and right that all dwelling-houses should pay at the same rate. The cost of supplying two dwelling-houses of the same rateable value with water might very well be different. I cannot find any special provision in the Act of 1847 which supports the defendant's contention. The definition of "water rate" in section 3 says that "the expression 'water rate' shall include any rent, reward, or payment to be made to the undertakers for a supply of water." There are provisions in that Act—for instance, the duty of the undertakers to lay down communication pipes to a dwelling-house upon payment or tender of the proportion of the water rate made payable in advance (section 44), and the provision that if the profits of the undertakers exceed the prescribed rate in any year, the undertakers are to make a rateable reduction in the rates for water (section 80)—which show that there are difficulties in the way of saying that it is not necessary that the rate shall be equal. Still, in my opinion, those difficulties do not outweigh the other considerations, and do not show that the defendant's contention is right.

That being so, I pass to the Act of 1861. It is clear that there is nothing in its wording which would prevent the waterworks company from charging one dwelling-house at a less rate than they charged other houses. Section 59, which gave the company power to make agreements with customers as to the supply of and charge for water, is material in this connection. The Act contemplates that by agreement the company might charge some dwelling-houses less than others. The maximum charge is fixed by a percentage upon the net rateable value of the dwelling-house, and it should not be forgotten that dwelling-houses may not, in a town like Northampton, constitute a majority of the houses or premises taking a supply of water from the company. There is nothing in the Act of 1861 to show that the company could not, as between different dwelling-houses, have charged a different rate. Then, with regard to the Northampton Corporation Waterworks Act, 1884, it is clear that, whatever powers the company had under the Act of 1861, the corporation now have the same powers. It seems to me that the corporation have the same rights as the company had with regard to charging for water, subject to the provisions of section 10. As to the rest of the case, I have nothing to add to what has been already said.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Sharpe, Parker, & Co., for Herbert Hankinson, Northampton.

Solicitors for the defendant, Warren, Murton, & Miller, for Lamb & Stringer, Kettering.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Vaughan Williams and Romer, L.JJ.) — Dec. 1, 3.

In re BEACHEY.
HEATON v. BEACHEY. (a.)

Mortgage—Leaseholds—Mortgage by sub-demise prior to Conveyancing Act, 1881—Statutory transfer subsequent to Act—"Benefit of mortgage"—Legal estate—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 27, Schedule III., Part II.

On granting or assigning a term of years a deed will pass the legal estate in the term, however inartistic, untechnical, or uncertain the words may be, provided that the intention that the legal estate shall pass is apparent from the terms of the deed, but in the absence of technical or proper words to pass the legal estate it will not be held to pass unless the intention to part with the possession is plain. Thus where a lessee executed a mortgage of his leaseholds by sub-demise before the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and the executors of the mortgagee, after the passing of that Act, by a transfer in the statutory Form A, given in Part II. of Schedule III., conveyed and transferred "the benefit of the said mortgage" to one of themselves,

Held, that the legal estate in the mortgaged leaseholds did not pass to the transferee.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 25th of September, 1880, George King demised to John Beachey the residue of a term of ninety-nine years (less the last ten days) in certain property at Newton Abbott for securing repayment of £350 and interest.

By an indenture dated the 9th of February, 1881, King further charged the said property in favour of John Beachey to secure an additional sum of £50.

By his will dated the 25th of September, 1883, John Beachey gave and bequeathed his residuary estate to Richard William Beachey and John Salter upon certain trusts therein mentioned, and he appointed the said R. W. Beachey and John Salter his executors.

By an indenture dated the 29th of November, 1893, which was in the statutory Form A given in Part II. of the third schedule to the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, R. W. Beachey and John Salter, as legal personal representatives and mortgagees, "conveyed and transferred" to R. W. Beachey "the benefit of" the said mortgage and further charge.

In December, 1893, George Furneaux was appointed a trustee of John Beachey's will in the place of John Salter.

By an indenture dated the 30th of December, 1893, which was in the same statutory form, R. W. Beachey transferred the said mortgage and further charge to R. W. Beachey and George Furneaux.

In January, 1894, R. W. Beachey retired from the trusteeship, and by an indenture dated the 16th of January, 1894, which was also in the same statutory form, R. W. Beachey and George Furneaux transferred the said mortgage and further charge to George Furneaux.

By a memorandum of deposit and undertaking under hand dated the 28th of December, 1894, George Furneaux deposited the security with the Wilts and Dorset Bank to secure his personal overdraft. And by an indenture dated the 7th of August, 1900, he demised the property to the bank. The present action was brought for the administration of John Beachey's estate.

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs, who were beneficiaries under John Beachey's will, that the transfers above mentioned did not avail to pass the legal estate, but that it remained in R. W. Beachey and John Salter upon the trusts of the will.

On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the bank that the property being leasehold no special form of words was required to pass the legal estate.

Kekewich, J., held that the legal estate did not pass, but remained vested in R. W. Beachey and John Salter upon the trusts of John Beachey's will.

The bank appealed.

E. Ford and A. à Beckett Terrell, for the bank.

Warrington, K.C., and Ward Coldridge, for the plaintiffs.

E. Ford replied.

The following authorities were referred to in the course of the argument: In re Ethel and Mitchells & Butler's Contract, [1901], 1 Cl. 945, 49 W. R. Dig. 127; Ex parte Smith, 2 D. & Cl. 271; Jones v. Gibbons, 9 Ves. 407; White v. Hunt, L. R. 6 Ex. 32, 19 W. R. Dig. 9; Preston's Conveyancing (3rd ed.), vol. 2, p. 177; Robbins on Mortgages, vol. 2, p. 826; and Bythewood & Jarman (4th ed.), vol. 5, p. 207.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The only question before us in this appeal is whether the words in the operative part of the transfer of the 29th of November, 1893, are sufficient to pass the legal estate in a mortgage of a leasehold term granted by George King to the testator John Beachey.

It has been very properly admitted by the learned counsel for the appellants that they cannot rely upon the statute as giving any special meaning to the words "the benefit of the said mortgage." The mortgage was not a statutory mortgage, and it is only necessary to look at the language of section 27 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, to see that the special meaning by virtue of that section can be given to the words which we have here, only where the original mortgage was itself a statutory mortgage. But it is said that the transfer was obviously intended to bear the meaning given by the statute to a transfer of a statutory mortgage. Therefore what we have to consider is, whether, apart from the statute, a conveyance made in the year 1903 of "the benefit" of a mortgage of leasehold property is sufficient to pass the legal estate in the term. Now, I agree that in a conveyance of leaseholds, however inartistic, untechnical, or uncertain the words used may be, if you gather an intention that the legal estate shall pass, that is sufficient to pass it. Looking then at the deed before us, and endeavouring to ascertain the intention from its terms, I should not myself come to the conclusion that it was the obvious intention of the parties, or indeed their intention at all, that the legal estate should pass. I adopt the principle that on granting or assigning a term of years there must, in order that the legal estate may pass, be some words which imply the intention to part with the possession. Now, can we ascertain such an intention from this deed? It first of all refers to the mortgage, then it recites the will of the mortgagee appointing executors, his death, the probate of his will. Then the operative part states that in consideration of the principal moneys and interest "having become the property" of the transferee, the representatives of the mortgagee convey and transfer to R. W. Beachey "the benefit of the said mortgage." It is argued that those words were intended to pass the legal estate in the mortgaged leaseholds, but in my opinion it is quite open to argument whether the words were not designedly used to give the transferee the pecuniary benefit of the mortgage only, without putting him in the position of an underlessee. I agree that possibly, as counsel for the appellants said, making the transferee an underlessee would not have done him much harm, since there was no privity between himself and the original lessee. Indeed, the argument went so far as to say that if the mortgage had been by way of assignment of the original term the result would have been the same. But on reading this deed I do not feel constrained to come to the conclusion that the legal estate was intended to pass by this deed, and it contains no word which would in ordinary conveyancing language be sufficient to pass the legal estate. Not finding either any such intention as I have indicated, or any technical or necessary words capable of passing the legal estate, I am of opinion that we ought not to hold that the words "convey and transfer the benefit of the said mortgage" are sufficient to pass the legal estate. In my judgment, therefore, the decision of Kekewich, J., was right, and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree.

ROMER, L.J.—I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for H. Fulton, Salisbury; Stow, Preston, & Lyttelton, for Friend & Tarbet, Exeter.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Nov. 9, 10.

SIMPSON v. SIMPSON. (a.)

Settlement—Marriage settlement—After-acquired property—Covenant to settle—Scots domicil—Jus relictæ—Spes successionis.

A mere spes successionis of a wife to succeed to her husband's personalty in the event of his death leaving her surviving, even though it be coupled with an indemnity in damages by the husband contingently upon the failure of the spes by reason of his change of domicil or otherwise, is not caught by, or included in, a covenant in the marriage settlement whereby it was provided that "if at any time during the coverture" the wife should "in any manner become entitled to any personal property for any estate or interest whatsoever" exceeding £200 in value, the same should be brought into settlement.

Appeal from Buckley, J.

By the ante-nuptial settlement dated the 27th of January, 1873, of William Simpson, then a domiciled Scotsman, and Alice Hall, his intended wife, the husband and wife respectively covenanted that if the wife then was, or if at any time during the intended coverture the wife or the husband in her right should become in any manner entitled to or acquire an absolute power of disposition over any real or personal property which should amount to or be equal in value from any one source at any one time to the sum of £200 for any estate or interest whatsoever (except as therein mentioned), the wife and husband and each of them, and any other necessary parties, should assure the same to the trustees of the settlement to be held by them upon the trusts therein declared.

A separation deed in Scottish form was executed between the husband and the wife (then both resident in Scotland) on the 13th of April, 1895, by clause 7 of which both parties agreed that the separation deed was to be construed according to the law of Scotland, and that whatever the domicil of the parties might be, all questions relating to the personal status and patrimonial interests of both of them should be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session; and the husband covenanted that in the event of his death in the lifetime of the wife the wife's rights in his means and estate should not be less than she would have been entitled to by the law of Scotland if he had been a domiciled Scotchman at the date of his death notwithstanding that he might be in fact domiciled elsewhere at the time of his death.

The husband died on the 15th of July, 1902, possessed of about £16,000 net personal estate, leaving the wife and three children him surviving, and having made a will dated the 24th of November, 1901, in which he described himself as of St. Margaret-on-Thames, Middlesex, "a domiciled Englishman."

The will contained no provision in favour of the wife.

There was evidence of a Scottish advocate to show that in the events which had happened the wife, according to the law of Scotland, would be absolutely entitled on her husband's death to one-third share of the £16,000, as her jus relictæ; that according to the law of Scotland and upon the construction of the separation deed the wife had nothing more than a spes successionis in her jus relictæ, which was a right which vested in her only upon the death of her husband, he being free to dispose of the whole of his property in his lifetime in any manner he chose, and so by his alienation in his lifetime to defeat the prospective right of the widow.

The executors of the husband's will took out an originating summons against the wife and the trustees of the settlement for the determination of the question whether, in the events which had happened, the one-third share to which the wife was entitled belonged to her absolutely or was bound by the covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in the marriage settlement.

All objections as to jurisdiction being waived by all parties, the summons was heard by Buckley, J., who held that, though the jus relictæ itself as a mere spes successionis would not be within the scope of the covenant, the contractual right which the wife acquired under clause 7 of the separation deed was property which fell within it. Accordingly the learned judge made a declaration that the one-third share of the husband's personal estate, in the events which had happened, should be paid to the trustees of the settlement as after-acquired property covenanted to be settled.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The wife appealed.

Wace, for the appellant.—The main object of a covenant to settle after-acquired property of the wife is to prevent its falling under the sole control of the husband, and it is therefore primâ facie not intended to apply to property the wife's title to which does not accrue until after the husband's death; and general words in such a covenant ought to be construed according to that intention: In re Edwards, 22 W. R. 144, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 97, approving of Dickinson v. Dillwyn, 17 W. R. 1122, L. R. 8 Eq. 546, and Carter v. Carter, L. R. 8 Eq. 551, 18 W. R. Dig. 124. It was followed in Fisher v. Shirley, 38 W. R. 70, 43 Ch. D. 290. The object of the covenant to settle the wife's after-acquired property was to protect such property against the husband. The contractual right of the wife under the separation deed was not property as to which the covenant could protect the wife, for that could never have become operative until after the husband's death, and therefore not during the coverture. The wife never became during the coverture entitled to any property in the husband's mobilia. The agreement in the separation deed related to what was at the date thereof the husband's property; and a covenant to settle after-acquired property is never intended to relate to the husband's property.

He referred also to Davenport v. Marshall, 50 W. R. 39, [1902] 1 Ch. 82.

C. E. Bovill, for the respondents, the trustees of the marriage settlement.—The wife acquired a contractual right under clause 7 of the deed of separation, and the right was "property" within the meaning of the covenant to settle after-acquired property in the marriage settlement. It was in the nature of a contingent interest defeasible according to the circumstances existing at the husband's death. It was a sum ascertainable on an uncertain event.

He referred to Lafitte & Co. v. Lafitte, 21 W. R. 750.

Judah Israel, for the executors of the husband's will, took no part in the argument.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—[His lordship read the clause as to the settlement of the wife's after-acquired property, and continued:] Mr. and Mrs. Simpson agreed to separate, and there was a separation deed entered into. [His lordship read the material clauses of the deed of separation, and continued:] The husband having predeceased the wife, it turned out after his death that he had personal property which would have been subject to the widow's right in respect of jus relictæ according to the law of Scotland; and the one-third share of that property to which the widow by Scotch law would be entitled is the sum of £5,333. What we have to consider is whether that sum to which the wife would have been so entitled must be handed over to the trustees of the marriage settlement or not. That depends upon two considerations. We must ascertain first what is the meaning of the words used in the marriage settlement; and, secondly, what is the meaning of the words used in the deed of separation; and see whether the sum to which the wife became entitled under the covenant in the deed of separation falls within or without the operation of the covenant in the marriage settlement. Now, what is the nature of the right which the wife acquires under the deed of separation. She acquires, to my mind, the benefit of a covenant and nothing else. It is the benefit of a covenant of indemnity by the husband against any loss accruing to her by her spes successionis—for that is what during the lifetime of the husband her right was—becoming abortive by reason of the husband losing his Scotch domicil and acquiring a different one. I have said that the right, against the loss of which the indemnity was given, is a spes successionis and nothing more, and really that proposition is not controverted. Both sides agree to that, and we have the statement of Scotch lawyers in evidence, from which it appears that such is the nature of the jus relictæ. It is a right which the wife has to come in and prove against the estate of her deceased husband, secondary to the rights of his creditors. Now, in considering the rights of the wife under this covenant in the deed of separation, it seems clear that it is a covenant to indemnify, and that the wife's right is really a right to damages under the covenant if there is a breach of it; and the moment that is ascertained to be the nature of the right it follows that it is a claim which could not possibly arise during the coverture. It is not a claim which can be ascertained at any time during the coverture. During the coverture it is only a possible claim for damages which may accrue to the wife on the death of the husband. That being the nature of the wife's right, we have to look at the covenant in the marriage settlement and see whether or not this claim falls within the terms of the covenant to settle after-acquired property. That really depends on she meaning of the word "property," in this covenant, and in determining that meaning we must look at the settlement as a whole and construe the settlement by the light of the objects of the settlement; and, in my opinion—when we remember what the objects of such a settlement are as stated by James, L.J., in In re Edwards—it cannot be said that this claim falls within the operation of the covenant in the settlement, or that the "property" mentioned in that covenant extends to a claim for indemnity in the nature of damages, a possible claim which could not arise in the lifetime of the husband at all, and of such a nature that it depends upon a contingency, the happening of which cannot be measured by any actuarial tables. It cannot, in my opinion, be said that such a claim falls within the word "property" as used in the marriage settlement. For these reasons I think that the decision of Buckley, J., was wrong, and ought to be reversed.

ROMER, L.J.—With regard to the sum of money now in contention, it is clear to my mind that it represents no property in which the wife can be said to have had any estate or interest during the coverture within the meaning of the covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in the marriage settlement. But it is said that such right or claim as the wife had, by virtue of her position as a wife, coupled with the provisions contained in the 7th clause of the deed of separation constituted "personal property" within the meaning of the covenant to settle after-acquired property. In my opinion this view is not correct. To my mind the effect of the 7th clause was to secure to the wife the jus relictæ, to which, as survivor, she would be entitled if the husband died a domiciled Scotchman, coupled with a right or claim to indemnity to a similar extent if, through his change of domicil, the wife should be deprived of her jus relictæ. During the coverture it was a mere hope of succession, coupled with a claim for indemnity in case her hope should be disappointed. Now it is beyond doubt that a spes successionis would not fall within the covenant to settle after-acquired property. The only question can be whether the claim to indemnity, in case the spes successionis fails, can be said to constitute "property" within the meaning of the covenant. In my opinion it cannot be said to represent property to which the wife was entitled during the coverture within the meaning of the covenant. It was a mere claim for damages, not a debt properly so-called, nor a claim for any sum which could be ascertained during the coverture. It was a contingent claim for damages which could not arise till after the husband's death, and the amount of which could not be ascertained till after the husband's death. To my mind it cannot be said that such a claim falls within any fair construction of the covenant to settle after-acquired property, the covenant being that "if at any time during the coverture the wife should become entitled to any personal property which should amount to or be equal in value from any one source at any one time to £200, it should be brought into settlement." This claim was not personal property of that kind at all. Certainly no one at any time during the coverture could have said in the first place that the claim would ever arise; or, secondly, that it would be property of the value of £200. Bearing in mind what the general object of this covenant to settle after-acquired property is, and the way in which such covenants have been construed by the courts, I come to the conclusion that within any fair construction it cannot be said that such a claim as the one I have indicated is covered by the covenant.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Buckley, J., decided two points. First, that the right of the wife under the law of Scotland was not bound by the covenant to settle after-acquired property, and the accuracy of this decision on that point has not been, and in my opinion cannot be, disputed. But, secondly, the learned judge decided that, inasmuch as by the deed of separation the wife acquired a contractual right, that contractual right was "property" which was bound by the covenant, and on that point the question has been argued very fully before us. Now, what was the contractual right which the wife acquired? It was a right that if she should survive her husband her rights should not be less than if her husband were a domiciled Scotchman at the time of his death. That was a right which could only arise and take effect after the death of the husband—i.e., after the determination of the coverture. If the obligation which was imposed upon the husband by that stipulation in the deed of separation was broken, the right would be a right to damages which could only be ascertained on the husband's death—i.e., after the determination of the coverture. The right which was conferred on the wife by the contract gave her no estate or interest in any part of her husband's property. It was simply and solely a right to damages in the events which I have mentioned. This observation appears to me to apply just as much to the reversionary interest which was covered by the fifth clause of the deed of separation as to the other property referred to. The contention is that a right of this nature is "property" within the meaning of the covenant to settle after-acquired property. Having regard to the objects of such covenants, I confess that I should have great doubt in arriving at that conclusion. But, supposing that to be the true view of it, still it was property which was quite incapable of being valued during the coverture, and therefore cannot be said to be of the value of £200 according to the terms of this covenant so as to be bound thereby. On that point, which really does not appear to have been considered by the learned judge in the court below, I think that his decision was wrong and ought to be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Routh, Stacey, & Castle.

Solicitor for the respondents, J. P. Simpson.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Jan. 13, 14.
Byrne, J. }

In re BEARD'S TRUSTS.
BUTLIN v. HARRIS. (a.)

Will — Construction — Bequest to voluntary schools — Education Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 42).

By his will in 1886 testator bequeathed shares in a bank to the managers of voluntary schools upon trust to pay the income thereof to the said schools so long as they should be supported by voluntary subscriptions, but, in the event of the said schools ceasing to be so supported or becoming subject to the control of a school board, a gift over.

Held, that the schools had not ceased to be supported by voluntary subscriptions, and that the gift over had not taken effect in consequence of the Education Act, 1902.

This was an adjourned summons, raising the question whether, according to the true construction of the will of testator, the plaintiffs and one of the defendants as trustees of the said will should transfer to the vicar and churchwardens of the parish of Leonard Stanley, Gloucestershire, seventy-seven shares in Lloyds Bank, representing the present investment of the proceeds of shares bequeathed by the said will to the managers for the time being of the Leonard Stanley National Schools, upon the trusts therein mentioned, and the dividends thereon, as from the commencement of the Education Act, 1902.

The facts sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Cave, for the trustees.

Lawrence, for the Gloucestershire County Council.

Baker, for the managers.

Gatey, for the churchwardens.

BYRNE, J.—In this case the testator made his will in 1886, and thereby gave and bequeathed to the managers for the time being of Leonard Stanley Schools shares in a bank, or, if he should have sold the same, a sum of money, to be held by the said managers, with power to change investments, upon trust to pay the income thereof to the said schools so long as the said schools should be supported by voluntary subscriptions, but in the event of the said schools ceasing to be so supported or becoming subject to the control of a school board, a gift over.

The testator died in 1891. During his lifetime he appears to have found moneys, when wanted, for the purposes of these schools. The schools are built upon property in respect of which only 1s. a year is paid, and there were a certain number of subscriptions. As to what the amounts were, and when they were paid, I have no information, but, up to the time of testator's death, moneys were found by himself and others for the purposes of the schools as required. There was in testator's lifetime an endowment bringing in about £15 a year, which has been continued up to the present time. A Mr. Jones, after testator's death, found moneys from time to time for the school as they were wanted. Year by year there has been some small sum over and above the receipts which has been expended, and it appears that the managers have, on their own credit, got an overdraft at the bank. In all these years there is somewhere about £60 due from the managers. The managers have taken upon themselves the liability to pay, and therefore, if the bank required them to pay, they would have no right to get the money from anywhere else, and they would have to pay and be subscribers for the necessary amount.

(a.) Reported by PERCY WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In consequence of the passing of the Act of 1902, if these funds given by the testator are available in addition to the old endowments and to the Government grant, there will be ample funds without calling upon anyone for further subscriptions.

The argument is now originated on behalf of the vicar and churchwardens that the gift over has taken effect, because there has been nothing like subscriptions. It is said that the gift over takes effect either if the schools cease to be supported by voluntary subscriptions or in the event of their becoming subject to the control of a school board. With reference to the latter I am satisfied that that event has not taken place, because these schools were never under the control of a school board. The local education authority is now the county council. It has many duties formerly discharged by the school boards. The Act expressly abolishes school boards. In so many words the county council is a different body. The new education authority is now elected by a different body from the former school board. It has a different constituency and different duties.

The question is, Can the schools now be said to be supported by voluntary subscriptions? How were they supported before testator's death? They were supported by voluntary subscriptions so far as the funds were not sufficient. Now, testator, knowing the position of affairs, gave only the income of this fund in or towards the schools so long as they did not cease to be supported by voluntary subscriptions —that is, in aid of the endowment for the time being existing, and it appears he must have contemplated that these subscriptions would only be such subscriptions as were necessary with the endowment to support the schools. In my opinion there has not yet been any forfeiture under this clause.

Declaration that the gift over had not yet taken effect.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Le Brasseur & Oakley, for Edward Brownlow Haygarth, Cirencester.

Solicitors for the managers, Walker & Rowe, for J. Lapage Norris, Stroud.

Solicitors for the county council, Field, Roscoe, & Co.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Dec. 16, 17, 18.

In re DALLAS. (a.)

Mortgage—Equitable charge—Future property—Expectancy under will—Priority—Notice—Renunciation of sole executor—Property in court in lunacy—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 79.

The priorities of incumbrancers of future property are regulated by the order in which notices of their charges are given to the legal holder of the property, after it has come into existence, and as between incumbrancers who have so given notice on the same day, in the order of the creation of their charges. A notice given to a person who is not, at the moment when it is given, but afterwards becomes, the legal holder, is ineffectual.

Where the future property is an expectancy under a will, a notice given to a sole executor who afterwards renounces probate, is ineffectual, inasmuch as he has never been the legal holder of the property.

The case is a fortiori where such sole executor is also the beneficiary who has incumbered his interest.

Under such circumstances an administrator cum testamento becomes the legal holder of the property as soon as letters are granted, notwithstanding the fact that the property is then in court in lunacy.

Johnstone v. Cox, 30 W. R. 114, 19 Ch. D. 17, and Boss v. Hopkinson, 18 W. R. 725, applied.

Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Langley, 32 W. R. 792, 32 Ch. D. 460, distinguished.

This was a reference by the master to obtain the direction of the judge as to the method of ascertaining the priorities of the several incumbrancers of a fund in respect of which a petition had been presented for its payment out of court.

By his will, dated the 7th of July, 1893, Robert Dallas gave a legacy of £10 000 to his son Frederick, and appointed three executors, of whom only one —namely, Frederick—survived the testator.

On the 28th of June, 1898, lunacy proceedings in respect of the testator were taken, a receiver of his property was appointed, and his personal estate was paid into court in lunacy.

The testator died on the 24th of December, 1902. In the interval between the date of the will and the death of the testator, F. Dallas charged his expectant legacy in favour of a number of persons for amounts in the aggregate largely exceeding the sum of £10,000.

On the 9th of January, 1903, F. Dallas renounced probate.

On the 4th of March, 1903, administration with the will annexed was granted to Mrs. Beedell, a daughter of the testator.

By an order, drawn up the 17th of March, and completed on the 27th of March, 1903, the funds in court of the testator were directed to be paid out to Mrs. Beedell.

On the 3rd or 4th of May, 1903, these funds reached her hands.

On the 24th of May, 1903, F. Dallas was adjudicated a bankrupt.

On the 28th of May, 1903, Mrs. Beedell, acting under the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1893, paid the sum of £9,985, representing the legacy of £10,000, less costs, into court.

By an order of the 4th of July, 1903, made on the above-mentioned petition, certain inquiries and an account were directed. The reference to the judge, which was made in pursuance of a direction in the order to that effect, was as to the principle to be adopted in determining the priorities of the incumbrancers, having regard to the notices which had been given.

The particulars as to the steps taken by the several incumbrancers to protect their charges, so far as they were material to the arguments addressed to the court were as follows:

The executor of a deceased member of the firm of Brooks, Jenkins, & Co., two other members of that firm, the British Empire Mutual Life Insurance Society (all of whom were petitioners), and the Staffordshire Financial Co. gave notice, through Messrs. Brooks, Jenkins, & Co., to Mrs. Beedell on the morning after administration had been granted to her (5th March, 1903).

Frederick Stuart gave notice to Brooks, Jenkins, & Co. on the 12th of March, 1903.

Joseph Chapman gave notice to Mrs. Beedell on the 31st of January, 1903.

A. M. Kettlewell, in addition to an earlier charge, took a charge from F. Dallas after the death of the testator, on the 29th of December, 1902.

H. Attenborough gave notice to the administratrix on the 5th of May, 1903.

John Edwards gave notice to Messrs. Brooks, Jenkins, & Co., who had acted both for the receiver of the income of Robert Dallas and for Mrs. Beedell, on the 23rd of January, 1901.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Romer Macklin, for the executor of the deceased member of the firm of Brooks, Jenkins, & Co., and two of the present members of the firm.—F. Dallas could and did effectually charge his expectant legacy under the will of his father. The charge operated as a contract which could be enforced as soon as the property with which he purported to deal came into existence: In re Clarke, 36 Ch. D. 348; Tailby v. Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, 13 A. C. 523, 543. Priorities will be regulated by the order in which notice was given, after the property came into existence, to the person who had the legal control of it. That it is of no use to give notice to that person before he has the legal control is shown by Johnstone v. Cox, 30 W. R. 114, 19 Ch. D. 17, a case on the mortgage of an army commission. Of course it is not necessary in every case for the incumbrancer to give formal notice to the trustee: Lloyd v. Banks, 3 Ch. App. 488. But the judgment in that case is based on the assumption that the notice must be of such a sort as will influence the trustee in the execution of the trust. The person who receives the notice must be under an obligation existing at the time when the notice reaches him to pay over the fund out of which the debt is to be settled: Addison v. Cox, 21 W. R. 180, 8 Ch. App. 76, 79. Notice to the solicitors of trustees is not notice to the trustees: Saffron Walden Second Benefit Society v. Rayner, 28 W. R. 681, 14 Ch. D. 406.

Astbury, K.C., and J. Gatey, for the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation (Limited), who were the assignees of the British Empire Mutual Life Assurance Society; and Ryland, for the Staffordshire Financial Co., were in the same interest.

H. Terrell, K.C., and P. S. Stokes, for Stuart.—Notice to the legal holder of the fund does not create any priority as between persons who took their charges before the fund came into existence, and, consequently, all the charges rank pari passu. The doctrine of priority by notice, in its present form, is founded on the decision in Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1, where it is put on the ground that the negligence of the prior incumbrancer in not giving notice tends to damnify subsequent incumbrances. And this is the true ground: Warde v. Duncombe, 42 W. R. 59, [1893] A. C. 390. Looked at from this point of view, therefore, the critical period for giving notices is the date when the second incumbrance is taken. If at this period there is no one in existence to whom notice can be given, the first incumbrancer is not guilty of any negligence towards the second incumbrancer. If notice was not necessary then, it is not necessary at any other time. In so far as the cases on mortgages of army commissions rest on the principle that notice after a chose in action has come into existence is essential to complete the title to a charge previously created upon it, that principle must be taken to be overruled by Tailby v. Official Receiver. [On this part of the case he referred to the army commission cases mentioned in the judgment.] Assuming those cases to have been rightly decided, they are inapplicable here. The critical time there for giving notice was the next morning after the retirement of the officer had been gazetted, and the notice had to be given to the army agents into whose hands the purchase-money had come. There was, therefore, someone to whom notice could be given the moment when the chose in action came into existence. But here the chose in action came into existence at the death of the testator. At that moment, owing to the subsequent renunciation of probate by the executor, there was no one in existence to whom notice could be given. To extend the principle of those cases so as to cover the present case would give an unfair advantage to the incumbrancers who were the legal advisers of the administratrix. Lastly, if notice is necessary, F. Dallas, the executor, had notice of all the incumbrances. An executor derives his title from the will, not from the probate; he can do anything before probate, except prove his title. Notice to him, therefore, confers a priority which ought not to be taken away by his subsequent renunciation.

A. Adams, for Chapman.—Prior to, and shortly before, the 4th of March Mrs. Beedell had notice of my incumbrance. Priorities, as a general rule, will be regulated by the order in which notices are given to the administratrix after letters are granted. But the authorities show that the notice to an intending administratrix was sufficient to preserve, though not to create, a priority already obtained. No incumbrancer, therefore, whose charge was subsequent in date of creation to mine could, by giving notice to the administratrix after the grant of letters, obtain a priority over me: Arden v. Arden, 33 W. R. 593, 29 Ch. D. 702, 708; Lloyd v. Banks, at p. 490; Meux v. Bell, 1 Ha. 73, 84; Ward v. Duncombe.

Percy Wheeler, for Edwards.—The solicitors of Mrs. Beedell had notice of my charge before she obtained administration. There ought to be an inquiry whether or not they brought the existence of my charge to her mind after the grant and before the notices relating to the charges of the other incumbrancers were given to her.

Vaughan Williams, for Kettlewell.—My second charge operated as an express notice to F. Dallas, in his capacity of executor, of my first charge. At the date of my second charge he was the proper person to receive notice, for the executor, up till the moment of renunciation, is the legal owner of the property: Smith v. Miller, 1 T. R. 480. Section 79 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), provides only that on renunciation an executor's rights shall cease, not that they shall be deemed never to have existed. In In re Wasdale, 47 W. R. 169, [1899] 1 Ch. 163, it was held that notice to all the trustees of a reversionary fund in existence at the time of an assignment was sufficient to enable the assignee to obtain priority over a person who took his assignment after the death or retirement of all those trustees and who gave notice to the new trustees. The army commission cases show that notice given before the fund is in existence is inoperative: Somerset v. Cox, 12 W. R. 590, 33 Beav. 634. Therefore the mere fact that F. Dallas knew of the charges is immaterial. It was necessary that he should have express notice while he was an executor. In any event my second charge, which was created after the fund came into existence, will take priority.

Cozens-Hardy, for Attenborough.—The charges rank in the order in which notice was given to the administratrix after the fund had reached her hands. So long as funds are in court priority can be gained only by stop orders, not by notices to the trustees: Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Langley, 32 Ch.D. (at p. 493).

Hugo Marshall, for Evans.—Between the renunciation of F. Dallas and the appointment of the administratrix, Brooks, Jenkins, & Co. were in the position of trustees of the estate for the whole of the incumbrancers; it was, therefore, inequitable on their part to attempt to obtain priority by first giving her notice of their own incumbrances.

Buckmaster, K.C., in reply.—Tailby v. Official

Receiver had nothing to do with the question of notice, and is merely a decision that a man can assign a future chose in action and that after such assignment, if he become bankrupt, there can pass to his trustee in bankruptcy only such property as the bankrupt still possesses. A trustee in bankruptcy cannot obtain priority over a mortgagee of a chose in action belonging to the bankrupt by giving notice, before the mortgagee: In re Wallis, 50 W. R. 430 [1902] 1 K. B. 719. In such a case as the present to say that notice does not give priority would be to overrule the army commission cases. Ward v. Duncombe only decided that it is not necessary to repeat notices on a change of trustees: Lewin on Trusts (10th ed.), p. 865. Notice given to F. Dallas before he renounced probate had no effect. Renunciation operates as from the death of the testator, and, therefore, the executor was never in a position to have legal control over the property. According to Ward v. Duncombe notice gives priority for several reasons, none of which are applicable to the case of notice given to an executor who afterwards renounces. The argument is stronger where the executor is also the person beneficially entitled to the fund and has incumbered it: Browne v. Savage, 7 W. R. 571, 4 Drew. 635. The object of giving notice where all the assignments have taken place before the chose in action has come into existence, is to prevent further assignments: Foster v. Cockerell, 3 Cl. & F. 456.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, continued: The notices are of these simple classes—First, there were notices given after the death of the testator on the 24th of December, 1902, but before the renunciation of probate by Frederick on the 9th of January, 1903, to Brooks, Jenkins, & Co. They are a firm of solicitors, but between those dates they were not the solicitors for any person who was the legal holder of the fund. As regards these notices, therefore, there is no question. Secondly, there were notices given by Brooks, Jenkins, & Co. to Mrs. Beedell, before she obtained administration, on the 4th of March, 1903. Thirdly, there were notices given by Brooks, Jenkins, & Co. to Mrs. Beedell on the 5th of March, 1903. And fourthly, there was a notice given to the administratrix after the date in May, 1903, when the fund reached her hands. The questions to be determined are, first, whether notice is necessary at all? and secondly, if it is necessary, at what time and to whom is it to be given?

During the period between the date of the will and the death of the testator, Frederick Dallas had no property at all. He had merely a possibility or expectancy of property, based on the fact that if his father died without having revoked the legacy the property would be his. Now, that an equitable incumbrance can be given on an expectancy or on future property is settled law. A passage in the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in In re Clarke (at p. 351), explains the operation of a charge so given: "It is clear that an assignment cannot at law pass future property, but it may be made effectual against future property on the ground that a court of equity will in a suitable case enforce it as a contract." And in Tailby v. Official Receiver, Lord Macnaghten, at p. 543, says: "It has long been settled that future property, possibilities, and expectancies are assignable in equity for value. The mode or form of assignment is absolutely immaterial provided the intention of the parties is clear. To effectuate the intention, an assignment for value, in terms present and immediate, has always been regarded in equity as a contract binding on the conscience of the assignor, and so binding the subject-matter of the contract when it comes into existence if it is of such nature and so described as to be capable of being ascertained and identified." That proposition is not contested.

When there is a dealing with such a class of property, there is no legal holder to whom an equitable incumbrancer can give notice, because there is no fund in existence, and therefore it is impossible to give notice. The question then arises whether it is necessary to give notice at all. Now in this connection there is a considerable body of cases which arose before purchase in the army was abolished, and which appears to me to be in point. An officer's commission was not his property, but was something which might, in an event, be represented by money. He had a possibility which would become property if he left the army. When that event happened, the money which represented the value of the commission was placed in the hands of the army agents, and became the property of the officer immediately his retirement was gazetted. The cases to which I refer, eight in number, are Buller v. Plunkett, 9 W. R. 190, 1 J. & H. 441, Yates v. Cox, 17 W. R. 20; Boss v. Hopkinson; Somerset v. Cox; Calisher v. Forbes, 20 W. R. 160, 7 Ch. App. 109; Addison v. Cox; Johnson v. Cox; and Roeburgh v. Cox, 30 W. R. 74, 17 Ch. D. 520. All those case were decided in accordance with the same principle. Before the moment at which the fund became the property of the officer, there was no property of which there was a legal owner. It followed that notices which were given to the army agents before the appearance of the gazette were idle. It was not open to an incumbrancer to say that the army agents, on the appearance of the gazette, ought to remember a previous notice which was altogether void. Immediately after the appearance of the gazette, therefore, equitable incumbrancers took care to give notice. The rule was that, as between those who gave notice on the same day, the incumbrancers took priority according to the dates of their charges. Refinement in these cases was carried to such an extent that it was held that notices which were given the day before the critical date were bad if they were given during office hours, but good if they were given after office hours, because in the latter event they would be presumed to have been given on the morning of the critical date. In all cases it was held that the rights of incumbrancers were regulated according to the priority of their notices.

Two principles follow from these decisions. The first is, that where the subject of the incumbrance is an expectancy, notice is necessary; and the second is, that priorities rank according to the dates on which notice is given after the fund has come into existence. Those being the principles on which the army commission cases were decided, I think that there is no distinction between them and such a case as this. During the life of his father Frederick Dallas had an expectancy; the officer was in the same position while he was still in the army. On behalf of the respondents arguments have been advanced which are not wanting in courage. Their contention, briefly is, that all the army commission cases were wrongly decided, in consequence of the House of Lords having, in two later cases, given decisions which are said to have been founded on principles irreconcilable with those on which the army commission cases were decided. Among the judges who gave decisions in the army commission cases were Page-Wood, V.C., James, L.J., Mellish, L.J., Jessel, M.R., and Lord Selborne, L.C. —a formidable list.

I proceed to deal with the two cases in the House of Lords which are said to have overruled these decisions. The first is Tailby v. Official Receiver. In that case Tailby was the assignee of a book debt from Wilson Brothers, and gave notice to them. The assignor became bankrupt, and the debtors paid Tailby. The official receiver in the assignor's bankruptcy sued Tailby for the amount of the debt as money had and received, and after many vicissitudes, in which each court in its turn overruled the decision of the court immediately below it, the official receiver failed in the House of Lords. The whole question for decision was whether the property there referred to was sufficiently identified, so as to be capable of assignment by virtue of the doctrine laid down in Holroyd v. Marshall, 11 W. R. 171, 10 H. L. C. 191. The House expressed no opinion as to the question before me, and the case is not in point.

The other case is that of Ward v. Duncombe. When the judgments in that case are read, it will be found that what was established was this—that the doctrine of notice rests on the principles, first, that an equitable assignee ought to take such steps as will or may prevent the assignor from retaining the apparent ownership of the fund; and secondly, that he must take such steps as will give him a right in rem against the fund, as distinct from a right against the conscience of the assignor; and that that must be done, as far as possible, by taking possession. Now, the rule in Dearle v. Hall has often been criticized, notably in Ward v. Duncombe, where it was said that it was not to be extended. But Ward v. Duncombe has left the doctrine itself wholly untouched, though whether it has left it as resting on the negligence of the prior incumbrancer is not so clear. If that be the whole effect of Ward v. Duncombe, how does it touch the equitable assignment of a possibility of any kind? In my opinion it does not touch it at all. The argument is that at the moment at which the equitable incumbrance was taken, it was impossible for the incumbrancer to give notice, and that, therefore, he need never give notice. That argument is in direct contradiction to the army commission cases which are binding on me, and which have not been affected by the cases in the House of Lords to which I have referred. To put the argument of the respondents in a different form, the proposition being granted that an equitable incumbrance on an expectancy only operates as binding the conscience of the assignor, it is said that no subsequent incumbrancer can get more than the assignor could at the date of the subsequent incumbrance conscientiously given him. Or, again, it was said that there was no legal holder of the fund in existence at the time when the second incumbrance was taken, and that it being, therefore, unnecessary to give a notice at that time, it was never necessary to give notice. In support of that proposition, a sentence from the judgment of Fry, L.J., in In re Wyatt, 40 W. R. 177, [1892] 1 Ch. 188, the case which was afterwards affirmed by the House of Lords under the name of Ward v. Duncombe, at p. 274, was cited, "The time of the taking of the subsequent charge, or, more exactly, the time when inquiry was or ought to have been made of the trustees, and not the period of distribution, appears to be the critical moment." The argument which was based on that sentence shows the fallacy into which one is likely to fall if one reads a sentence divorced from its context and the circumstances to which it was addressed. That language was used in a case where of two trustees one had notice of an incumbrance and was succeeded by another trustee who had no knowledge of it. The question was whether a second incumbrancer could say that the trustee who had notice was dead, and that he was entitled to priority because the doctrine could not apply. The question in this case is that, there being no legal holder of the fund until the death of the testator, but after his death there being a legal holder, ought the incumbrancer to give notice to him? To the argument that it is not necessary for him to do so, the army commission cases are a complete reply, for in those cases the equitable incumbrancer did get more than the assignor could conscientiously give him. Notice, therefore, in my opinion, is necessary.

The next question is, what notice is necessary, and to whom must it be given? There is a sentence in Lord Selborne's judgment in Addison v. Cox, at p. 79, which is the substratum of all the decisions on the mortgages of army commissions. He says that notice must be given to a person who "is himself bound by some contract or obligation, existing at the time when the notice reaches him," to pay over the fund out of which the debt is to be satisfied. He says that notice to the agent at the time when he was not so bound is futile. In the first place, therefore, notice must be given to a person who is bound by a contract or obligation. Next, notice is operative if it is given under such circumstances as would lead a man of business to have knowledge. As was said by Lord Cairns, L.C., in Lloyd v. Banks, at p. 491, "If it can be shown that in any way the trustee has got knowledge of that kind—knowledge which would operate upon the mind of any rational man, or man of business, and make him act with reference to the knowledge he has so acquired—then I think the end is attained, and that there has been fixed upon the conscience of the trustee, and through that upon the trust fund, a security against its being parted with in any way that would be inconsistent with the incumbrance which has been created." Further, suppose that there are several trustees, notice to one of them will be sufficient, provided that he be not a trustee who is standing in such a position as that it will be his interest to conceal the incumbrance. None the less will this be the case if the trustee who has received notice dies before the fund comes into possession. That was the decision in In re Wyatt, which was affirmed in Ward v. Duncombe. And an effective notice, once given, will not be displaced by any subsequent change of trustees: In re Wasdale. But this last proposition is subject to the exception established by Timson v. Ramsbottom, 2 Keen 35, a decision which was commented on in Ward v. Duncombe, at p. 381. Moreover, if the assignor be the only one of several trustees who receives notice, then according to the rule in Browne v. Savage, notice to him will not be sufficient. The reason is given by Kindersley, V.C. (at p. 640). He says, "In the case where the assignor is himself one of the trustees, he being the only one of the trustees who has any notice or knowledge of the assignment which he has made, if he should afterwards apply to another person to advance him a sum of money on an assignment of his interest, concealing the fact of the prior assignment, such proposed assignee could not, by any caution in making inquiry of all the trustees, discover the fact of the prior assignment; for it is the interest of the trustee, who is the proposed assignor, to conceal the prior assignment, and the other trustees know nothing about it."

I pass on to consider who were the persons who actually had, and who were the persons who ought to have had, notice. Now, the first proposition which has been advanced is based on the fact that Frederick Dallas, the sole surviving executor, was the assignor, and, therefore, knew of the assignments. The question is, Was he, when the testator died, the legal holder of the fund, so that his knowledge, so acquired, operated, on the principle of Lloyd v. Banks, in favour of all the assignees? The answer to that question depends on the effect of his subsequent renunciation of probate. Section 79 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, and section 16 of the Court of Probate Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 95), are sections dealing with the renunciation of probate by an executor, or his death without probate, or his failure to appear when cited. The section dealing with renunciation by a person appointed executor provides that "the rights of such person in respect of the executorship shall wholly cease, and the representation to the testator and the administration of his effects shall and may, without any further renunciation, go, devolve, and be committed in like manner as if such person had not been appointed executor." On that first ground, therefore, I should be able to say that an executor who subsequently renounced, as a result of that renunciation, stood from the first in such a position as never to have been the legal holder of the fund. The same conclusion may be reached by a consideration of the circumstances on general grounds. According to Ward v. Duncombe it is necessary to give notice to the person who has the disposal of the fund. An executor who renounced never was a person who had the disposal; he could not have been in a position to have it unless he had intermeddled, and thereby disqualified himself from renouncing. He was not, therefore, a person to whom effective notice could be given. A further question has been raised. Suppose a sole executor to have been served, and to have subsequently renounced probate, would it be his duty to hand on the notice to an administratrix when she was appointed, and would that notice, when it reached her, have a retrospective effect? The answer to that question is in the negative. An executor who renounces has no duties to the estate. His position is that the testator has nominated him to the office, and it is true that his tenure is by virtue of the will, and not of the probate. But he is not bound to accept the office, and if he refuses it, he does not owe the estate the duty of handing on notices which in his hands were of no effect. Apart from those grounds, Frederick's position was both that of executor and assignor. If under any circumstances notice to him could be effectual, this further question arises, in a case where the sole legal owner of the fund is also the equitable assignor, does the knowledge which he possesses enure for the benefit of the equitable incumbrancers. On the application of Browne v. Savage, it does not. Notice to one of several trustees, that one being the assignor, is not sufficient. The same principle applies in the case of an equitable assignor. Accordingly, notice to Frederick who had knowledge, was not sufficient to protect equitable incumbrancers.

If the executor who renounced was not the proper person to receive notice, who was that person? There came into existence on the 4th of March, 1903, a legal holder of the fund, in the person of Mrs. Beedell. In the interval between the death of the testator and that date the legal ownership was somewhere, but it was not in any person who was in fact served with notice. On the 4th of March, 1903, she became administratrix, and therefore, the person to be served.

Substantially that determines all the questions which are before me. But I proceed to notice several subsidiary arguments. I will deal first with the argument which was advanced on behalf of Joseph Chapman. It was said that the order in which notices were given to the administratrix, is to regulate the priorities, with the exception that, as against a person who gave notice to her before she obtained administration, an incumbrancer subsequent in point of date cannot, by giving notice to the administratrix, obtain priority. I fail to see that that proposition has any foundation. There were cited in support of it Arden v. Arden, Meux v. Bell, and Lloyd v. Banks. I do not see that those cases have any bearing upon the point. In none of them was notice given to a person who, at the time of receiving the notice, was not a trustee. I cannot understand how notice to a person who is not the legal holder of the fund can have any effect.

Then on behalf of John Edwards, whose notice was given on the 23rd of January, 1901, to the solicitors who acted for the administratrix, it was argued that, if Mrs. Beedell heard of that notice after she became administratrix, it would be good notice to her; and it was suggested that there ought to be an inquiry as to whether she did or did not hear of it. I fail to see that there is anything in the point.

Another argument for which there is, again, no foundation, was that the first charge which was executed after the death of the testator, and of which notice was given, took priority over all the others. The last contention was that the fund did not actually reach the hands of the administratrix until the 5th of May; and that, until that date, notice to her was ineffectual. The argument in support of it was based on Mutual Life Assurance Society v. Langley, and was that so long as the fund was in lunacy, priority could be obtained, if at all, only by stop orders. In that case the fund in court was in Chancery, and the trusts were being administered by a Chancery court. Under those circumstances the court stands in the position of a trustee. Accordingly it was there held that the priorities of different assignees were regulated by the dates on which they obtained stop orders. But the distinction between that case and the one before me is clear. The Court of Lunacy is only in the position of a custodian of property on behalf of a person who is unable to control it. When he dies there is no basis for its jurisdiction, because there is no lunatic. The person on whom the lunatic's property has devolved is, for all purposes, the legal owner of the fund. That argument, therefore, fails.

The result is that I arrive at the conclusion that the priorities of the incumbrancers rank according to the dates of the notices which were given to Mrs. Beedell after administration was granted to her, and that as between the incumbrancers who gave notice on the same day their priorities will rank according to the date of their charges. I wish to add one word more. The respondents say that, if my interpretation of the law is correct, it will be very difficult for equitable incumbrancers to protect themselves. The same condition of affairs was apparent in the army commission cases. It was necessary for the incumbrancers to look out for the appearance of the gazette. The difficulty was often provided against by writing a letter daily to the army agents. It is said that there is not the same faculty for ascertaining where and to whom letters of administration have been granted as existed for ascertaining the date when the retirement of an officer was gazetted. But that difficulty has nothing to do with the law. If it be the law, as I hold it is, that an equitable incumbrancer can obtain priority only by giving notice to a legal holder, it may be necessary, as in the old days, that he should post a letter every day.

Solicitors, Brooks, Jenkins, & Co.; Mellor & Co.; Smiles & Co., for Duignan & Elliot, Walsall; G. S. Warmington & Co.; Woodhouse & Davidson; Hicks, Arnold, & Mozley; A. J. Spreckley; Attenborough & Son; Marshall & Marshall.

Chan. Div. }
Joyce, J. } Nov. 19.

In re WILLIAMS.
HOLDER v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Administration— Retainer—Real representative—Proceeds of sale of real estate—Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), ss. 1, 2, sub-section 3.

The Land Transfer Act, 1897, does not give an administratrix a right of retainer out of the proceeds of sale of the intestate's real estate for a debt due to her from the intestate.

Adjourned summons.

This was a creditor's action for the administration of the estate of Henry Williams, who died intestate on the 13th of May, 1902.

The defendant, Ann Williams, was his widow and administratrix. The estate was insolvent.

On the 19th of March, 1903, the defendant took out this summons, asking (1) that she might be at liberty to complete a contract which she had entered into for the sale of the intestate's real estate for the sum of £1,000, and the goods and chattels in or about the premises for £306; (2) that it might be declared that the defendant was entitled out of the sum of £77 9s. 6d., or other the balance in her hands, or out of the respective sums of £1,000 and £306 to retain the sum of £600 due to her from the intestate's estate with interest at £4 per cent. in priority to the other creditors of the estate.

The defendant had lent her husband this £600 in March, 1901, to help him in his business.

The question now raised was whether the defendant was entitled to retain this sum against the proceeds of sale of the real estate. It was admitted that she had such right against the personal estate.

Hughes, K.C., and W. Howland Jackson, for the defendant.—Before the Land Transfer Act, 1897, was passed the personal representative was entitled to retain a debt due to him out of the "legal assets." That Act now makes the real estate legal assets: Carson's Real Property Statutes, p. 408. The real estate, so far as the right of retainer is concerned, is in the same position as personal estate. The defendant is entitled to retain in respect of a loan to her husband: In re May, Crawford v. May, 38 W. R. 765, 45 Ch. D. 499. The proviso in section 2 (3) does not affect the right of retainer. For the whole of the personal estate is practically gone, and the real estate comes to be applied in payment of debts.

Younger, K.C., and P. F. Wheeler, for the plaintiff.—The right of retainer is not extended to real estate by the Land Transfer Act. The right has been always looked on as an anomalous and unjust right, and is not to be extended except by very express language: Crowder v. Stewart, 29 W. R. 331, 16 Ch. D. 368; In re Jones, Calver v. Laxton, 34 W. R. 249, 31 Ch. D. 440. The Land Transfer Act, 1897, was intended to "establish a real representative," and made the personal representative the real representative, putting additional duties upon him, but the Act has not altered the rule as to the costs of administering estates in an administration action: In re Jones, Elgood v. Kinderley, 50 W. R. 215, [1902] 1 Ch. 92. Nor has it altered the rule as to retainer. Cases before the Act show the limits to which retainer must be confined: Bain v. Sadler, 19 W. R. 1077, 12 Eq. 570; In re Illidge, Davidson v. Illidge, 33 W. R. 18, 27 Ch. D. 478. Section 2, sub-section 3, is conclusive against this claim.

Hughes, K.C., in reply.—If the right of retainer is anomalous, a greater anomaly would arise if this claim is not allowed, as the administratrix would be placed in an inferior position to the other creditors: In re Illidge, Davidson v. Illidge.

JOYCE, J.—This summons raises an important and interesting question. The first part of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, entitled "Establishment of a Real Representative," vests the real estate of a deceased person in his personal representative as thereby provided. The present case is one of an administratrix. The deceased being indebted to her, it is contended on her behalf that she is entitled to retain out of the proceeds of sale of real estate belonging to the intestate a sufficient sum to pay the debt which is due to her, in preference to the other creditors. That is a somewhat startling proposition, bearing in mind what has been said by various judges, and in particular by Malins, V.C., in the case of Crowder v. Stewart, upon the subject of retainer—viz., that "the right of retainer is a relic of old law not founded on justice, and working the greatest possible injustice." There is no doubt about the truth of that. But I have to consider the terms of the Land Transfer Act, and if their necessary effect is to give to the personal representative this extended right of retainer, she must have it. The object of the first part of the Act was to establish a real representative, and I can find nothing express in the title or any part of the statute to the effect that there is to be an extension or alteration of the rights of an executor or administrator with reference to retainer. It appears to me that the very part that is relevant was, speaking generally, to simplify and improve the machinery for the administration of real assets without altering in any manner the ultimate rights of the persons beneficially interested in the proceeds of such assets. I agree with what was said by Kay, J., in In re Jones, Calver v. Laxton—viz., that "the right of retainer, as it produces inequality, is never assisted," and I do not think that a statute the object of which is to establish a real representative by vesting the real estate of the deceased person in the personal representative should be construed to give incidentally to such representative a new right of retainer or priority, unless I am compelled so to determine. Now, am I compelled to hold that the extended right of retainer claimed in the present case has been conferred by the first part of the Land Transfer Act? I think not. For it appears to me, after some consideration, that there is a comprehensive overriding proviso at the end of section 2 (3) which prevents the right of retainer contended for being claimed successfully. [His lordship read the sub-section, and continued:] Now, that enactment, omitting immaterial words, provides that nothing in the Act contained shall alter or affect the order in which real assets are now applicable in or towards the payment of debts. By real assets I understand the several kinds of real assets—e.g., real estate belonging to the deceased and real estate appointed under a general power, and there are other differences and distinctions. And by debts I understand the different species of debts, as, for instance, debts due to the Crown or other preferential liabilities and debts due to the legal personal representatives and other persons respectively. To introduce a new right of retainer or priority in favour of the personal representative as against real assets would, in my opinion, be to alter or at least affect the order in which real assets were previous to the statute applicable in or towards the payment of debts. Therefore upon this short ground, though there are other arguments against the contention of the administratrix well worthy of consideration if need be, I hold that she is not entitled to any such right of retainer as claimed against real assets.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Jackson & Jackson, for Heath & Eckersall, Cheltenham; Badham & Comins, for Brookes & Badham, Tewkesbury.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Nov. 2.

"THE DUC D'AUMALE." (a.)

Ship—Salvage—Tug in tow—Rights of innocent parties.

A tow was brought into distress by the negligence of the master of her tug, and the tug thereupon salved her.

The Court held that nobody connected with the tug could claim as salvors.

Action.

This was an action for salvage under the following circumstances:

The plaintiffs were the owners, master, and crew of the tug Challenge, belonging to the Elliott Steam Tug Co., and the defendants were the Compagnie Maritime Francaise, who were the owners of the barque The Duc D'Aumale.

The material facts were briefly as follows: On the 21st of June, 1903, The Duc D'Aumale left the Millwall Docks, London, in tow of The Challenge, bound for Cherbourg.

On the following day, when off Dungeness, during a dense fog The Duc D'Aumale was run into by the steamship Camrose, but the tug and tow were alone to blame. The Challenge then towed The Duc D'Aumale to Calais, and in respect of that service claimed salvage.

The defendants contended that inasmuch as the defendants were wrongdoers they were not entitled to profit by their wrongdoing, but the question was raised whether the innocent members of the crew of The Challenge were or were not entitled to an award, it being admitted on both sides that the master of the tug was himself alone to blame.

Aspinall, K.C., and Nelson, for the plaintiffs, cited The Sappho, L. R. 3 P. C. 690; The August Korff, [1903] P. 166, 51 W. R. Dig. 153; The Ripon City, [1897] P. 226, 45 W. R. Dig. 153; The Five Steel Barges, 15 P. D. 142, 38 W. R. Dig. 192; The Romance, [1901] P. 15, 49 W. R. Dig. 167; The Devonian, 49 W. R. 665, [1901] P. 221; and The Glengaber, 3 A. & E. 534.

Carver, K.C., and Noad, for the defendants, cited The Minnehaha, 15 Moo. P. C. 133; The Cargo Ex Capella, 1 A. & E. 356; and The Robert Dixon, 28 W. R. 716, 5 P. D. 54.

BARNES, J., in giving judgment, said: In this case the Elliott Steam Tug Co., and others, the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Challenge, are seeking to recover salvage for services rendered to The Duc d'Aumale, her cargo and freight. It was admitted also that what was decided in the previous case which I heard—the suit between The Camrose and The Challenge and The Duc d'Aumale—namely, that the collision which took place was caused by the negligence both of The Challenge and of The Duc d'Aumale, and that the negligence on The Challenge was that of her master. That has been admitted in the present case, so that the facts are not in dispute. They give rise to certain questions of law. The Challenge and The Duc d'Aumale were somewhat to the west of Dungeness when the collision took place, and after the collision The Challenge towed The Duc d'Aumale to Calais. The services for which salvage is claimed consisted in what was done subsequent to the collision and up to the time when the vessel was left at Calais. It is said, first of all, that the plaintiffs, the owners, master, and crew of The Challenge, can recover no salvage remuneration at all, because the collision and what happened afterwards, and as a consequence of it, were due to the negligence which I have referred to on board The Duc d'Aumale and on board the tug. I deal for a moment with the general question, because a second question has been discussed—namely, whether anybody out of the crew or the owners of the tug—anybody other than the person who was the actual negligent person—can recover salvage. The first point appears to me to depend upon the decisions and principles which have guided this court in arriving at its judgments on the subject of salvage services. There is only one matter to refer to further before dealing with this case. Counsel for the plaintiffs relied on the towage contract which was entered into between the owners of The Duc d'Aumale and the Elliott Steam Tug Co. under which The Duc d'Aumale was to be towed from London to Cherbourg. There are conditions on the back of it which he said affected the present case. Those conditions are very long. I have read them carefully, and I take the view presented by the defendants' counsel in connection with the exceptions referred to, that they really are exceptions which excuse the owners from liability, but do not affect this present question of salvage services. What is the general position in dealing with the case of tug and tow where what has happened is due to the negligence both of the tug and of the tow? The question has been discussed in one or two cases, amongst others in The Minnehaha, 15 Moo. P. C. 133, in which that well-known judgment, which is set out in so many subsequent cases, and in the text-books, is to be found. There is one passage in it which is of importance, viz.: "If the danger from which the ship has been rescued is attributable to the fault of the tug; if the tug, whether by wilful misconduct, or by negligence, or by the want of that reasonable skill or equipments which are implied in the towage contract, has occasioned or materially contributed to the danger, we can have no hesitation in stating our opinion that she can have no claim to salvage." It has been said that such observations do not apply where both tug and tow are negligent, but in my judgment that cannot be said of such a case as The Altair, decided by myself and reported in [1897] P. 105. There a tug was held responsible for the direction of the course, and, having been found negligent in respect of it and in not taking soundings, her claim for salvage was dismissed. There was in that case a counterclaim by the defendants. It was also dismissed, because their master was held guilty of contributory negligence in allowing the tug to run on instead of ordering her to haul off when approaching a difficult port in foggy weather. There was negligence of both tug and tow, and both claim and counterclaim were dismissed. The Robert Dixon, 5 P. D. 54, has been cited to me, but I do not think there was any point of negligence on the part of both tug and tow. But one part of the judgment of the late Lord Esher, then Brett, L.J., is very important, where he says: "The plaintiffs, being under a towage contract, bring this action, in which they assert that the towage service was altered into salvage; and it seems to me that the plaintiffs are in this position, that it lies on them to show that the change occurred without any want of skill on their part, but by mere accident over which they had no control. The burden of proof on both the affirmative and the negative issue is on the plaintiffs—that is, both that there was an inevitable accident beyond their control and that they showed no want of skill." It appears to me, apart from the question of individuals, with which I will deal in a moment, that where there is an occurrence—I will not use the word accident—which requires services of a salvage nature, and that occurrence has originated in the negligence of both tug and tow, the tug cannot claim any salvage for services afterwards rendered in extricating the ship from the difficulty in which she has been placed by that joint negligence. The next point which has been taken is that at any rate those persons on the tug who were not negligent, and even her owners, because they were not negligent properly, can recover for salvage services. Counsel for the plaintiff argued for the crew, other than the master, on this point, and for the owners. As far as the owners are concerned, it seems to me that this point depends partly upon this contract which he referred to and which to my mind does not affect the question of salvage at all; and that they really stand or fall by the negligence of their master, and cannot recover, for the reasons I have already given, for salvage services. I do not think it true in this case to say, as he contended, that the tug was under no obligation whatever afterwards to do anything for the ship. It seems to me not carrying out the principles to be found in The Minnehaha in that part of the judgment set out at the top of p. 154. I cannot regard the tug, in a case of this kind, as released from all duty towards the tow. It seems to me that after the accident happened she was not relieved from all obligation toward the ship, but that if salvage services were performed in getting the ship out of the difficulty, there would be, to use the language of the Privy Council in The Minnehaha, "services of a different class and bearing a higher rate of payment," and it would be "held to be implied in the contract that the tug" should be "paid at such higher rate." But in this case there would be no payment for reasons I have already given, because there was negligence on the part of the master contributing to the situation from which the ship had to be relieved. So I cannot accept the view that the tug was under no obligation whatever to the tow, as contended for by the plaintiffs' counsel. A good deal seems to me to follow from that, because I have no doubt whatever, for the reasons I have given, that the tug owner and the master cannot recover in this case, because of the negligence of the master. But the contention further is that the crew at any rate can recover—those, I mean, who are not responsible for this disaster. So far as I know it is the first time this point has been raised, so as to endeavour to separate the crew from the master or the negligent person in a case of this kind of tug and tow. There has been one or two cases which have practically no bearing, to my mind upon this particular question. There is first of all The Sappho L. R. 3 P. C. 690, where services were performed to ships belonging to the same owner, and the master and crew were held entitled to salvage. There is also the case of The Glengaber, L. R. 3 A. & E. 534, where by the improper navigation of a steam tug a vessel at anchor was sent adrift and placed in jeopardy. Another steam tug, The W., rendered assistance to the drifting vessel, and it was held that the owners of The W. were entitled to an award, although some of them were also owners of the vessel which occasioned the mischief. Sir R. Phillimore, in giving judgment in that case, said: "With regard to The Warrior, it has been contended that that vessel is not entitled to be considered as a salvor, because it appeared in evidence that some of her owners were also owners of The Black Prince. This objection, if allowed to prevail, could not affect the claim of the crew, nor could it affect those owners of The Warrior who are not owners of The Black Prince, and in my opinion it cannot be sustained. I know of no authority for the proposition that a vessel wholly unconnected with the act of mischief is disentitled to salvage reward simply because she belongs to the same owners as the vessel that has done the mischief. I shall therefore hold that The Warrior is entitled to salvage reward." That judgment, in the part which I have read, showed the difference between the claim of the crew and the claim of those owners who were not owners of The Black Prince, and he allowed the whole claim—at least, he allowed, as I understand, salvage for all. But that case differs from the view expressed by Butt, J., in The Glenfruin, 33 W. R. 826, 10 P. D. 103, where it was held that the master and crew were entitled to salvage. The head-note to that case is as follows: "A steamship, laden with cargo, became disabled at sea in consequence of the breaking of her crank shaft. Such breakage was caused by a latent defect in the shaft, arising from a flaw in the welding, which it was impossible to discover. Her cargo was shipped under bills of lading which contained among the excepted perils, 'all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and of navigation of whatsoever nature or kind.' Another vessel belonging to the same owners towed the disabled vessel to a place of safety. In an action of salvage brought by the owners, master and crew of the salving vessel against the owners of cargo on the salved ship: Held, that the master and crew were entitled to salvage, but that the owners were not, for that there was an implied warranty by them that the vessel was seaworthy at the beginning of the voyage." He awarded salvage to one owner who was not owner of the ship under contract, and he awarded some to the master and officers of the crew of the other ship—the independent ship. I can understand quite well that where the vessel which renders salvage services is entirely unconnected with the ship that is salved, those persons, like the master and crew or owners, who are in no way owners of the ship that is salved, or under no liability to persons on board that ship—I can quite understand that those independent persons can recover salvage without any difficulty in the way of it. But I do not think that applies to the case of a tug and her tow. I cannot help thinking one must consider a little upon what principle the court proceeds in awarding salvage. The court is guided—I am speaking generally and without that minute consideration which I should give if I were writing my judgment—by due regard to the benefit conferred, combined with regard to the general interests of ships and commerce; I mean the policy of what is to be done comes into consideration as well as the mere benefit received. It seems to me that both as a principle and a matter of good policy it would not be desirable to encourage a crew to recover a salvage reward in such cases of tug and tow where their master has been one of the causes of the disaster from which the ship to which salvage service has been rendered was rescued. There is a case which supports that view—the case of The Cargo ex Capella, 1 L. R. A. & E. 356. In that case Dr. Lushington said: "In my mind the principle is this, that no man can profit by his own wrong. . . . The rule would bar any claim for services rendered to the other ship which was co-delinquent in the collision; but the present claim, it is to be observed, is a demand for salvage against the cargo, the owners of which were perfectly innocent." That, therefore, was a claim by the master and crew of one of the colliding vessels. In the case of The Glenfruin, to which I have referred, the people of the salving vessel had nothing whatever to do with the accident that happened to the salved vessel. In the case of The Glengaber, the steam tug which came up and rendered assistance had nothing to do with the accident which originally brought about the difficulty; and it is a remarkable fact, I think, that no case had been cited to me in which any similiar suggestion has been made of the crew in a towage case recovering salvage where the master and owners could not. The point must have arisen. It was capable of being made in The Cargo ex Capella. It was capable of being made in The Altair, and in other cases. But it has never been suggested, and it seems to me that it may be that the right view to take is this, that the tug owners are not relieved entirely from their contract by what has happened, and when they proceed to render services afterwards they are extricating themselves and their ship from a difficulty in which both are placed by joint negligence. In this case what the tug did was, in fine weather, to tow this ship to Calais. The owners and master could not recover, and the crew did nothing more than their ordinary duties on the tug, without any risk, that I can see. They do nothing more than, it seems to me, their ordinary duties towards their owners and master. It may very well be that there might be a case of joint negligence producing a disaster to a tow, where a man might be put on board the tug, or required to perform services entirely outside the ordinary duties of tug and tow. When such a case arises it can be dealt with. But this case, I think, can be dealt with on that argument alone with which I have already dealt. It seems to me it would be bad policy to encourage sailors, as it were, to hope and expect that their master might get the ship he was towing into danger, so that they would have to render services for which they could recover. I think that would be introducing something extremely novel into this court, and what seems to me to be a dangerous kind of policy. On the whole, although this matter has been very fully discussed, and I have given judgment without reserving it, it seems to me that I am right in holding that no salvage award can be recovered in this case by anybody connected with the tug. One word more. I only wish to refer to the cases of The Bernina and Milburn v. The Jamaica Fruit Co. They appear to me to have nothing whatever to do with the present case. My judgment therefore must be that the suit of the plaintiff is dismissed. I think, in the circumstances under which the case has come before the court—they are peculiar—the proper order is that each should pay their own costs.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Crump & Sons.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). } Dec. 15.

WAKEFIELD CORPORATION v. COOKE AND OTHERS. (a.)

*Local government—Street—Paving expenses—Decision of justices that street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large—Res judicata—Wakefield Corporation Act,* 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. lxxi.), ss 29, 30, 31—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), ss. 6, 7, 8.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon an objection by the owners of premises in a street to a scheme for certain private street works which the local authority proposed to execute under a local Act (which contained provisions identical with sections 6, 7, and 8 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892), the justices decided that the street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and upheld the objection. Subsequently the local authority proposed to execute private street works in the street under a different scheme.

Held, upon objection taken by the owners of premises in the street, that the matter was res judicata, by reason of the former determination of the justices.

Reg. v. Hutchins, 29 W. R. 724, 6 Q. B. D. 300, distinguished.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 305, [1903] 1 K. B. 417) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.) (51 W. R. 305, [1903] 1 K. B. 417), reversing a judgment of the Divisional Court (50 W. R. 254, [1902] 1 K. B. 188).

The special case is set out at some length in the court below. Shortly the facts are as follows:

The General Works Committee of the Corporation of Wakefield passed a resolution in November, 1900, in pursuance of section 29 of their private Act, 1887 (sections 29, 30, and 31 of the Wakefield Act are identical with sections 6, 7, and 8 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892), that the corporation should do certain sewering, flagging, &c., in the private street known as Sludge-lane. This resolution was confirmed, and at a subsequent meeting of the corporation the provisional apportionment of expenses was approved, and copies served on the owners of the premises as required by the Act. Several of the owners of these adjoining premises duly objected that Sludge-lane was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. Upon the application of the corporation, after the expiration of the time for sending in objections the justices appointed a time for hearing objections, and upon the hearing it was contended that the matter was res judicata by reason of a former decision of the justices in 1898, that Sludge-lane was repairable by the inhabitants at large, and the justices took this view and so held.

The Court of Appeal considered the matter was res judicata.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and W. Senior, for the appellants.—The decision of the magistrates no more concludes the matter in the present case than it did in Reg. v. Hutchins, 29 W. R. 724, 6 Q. B. D. 300. The Wakefield Act does not make the finding of the magistrates final, and that finding is not a judgment in rem.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Compston, for the respondents.—The decision of the magistrates in 1898 is conclusive. The case of Reg. v. Hutchins does not apply. In 1898 the justices determined the status of this street. A decision on status is a judgment in rem. The case comes within the definition of status given in the first edition of Smith's Leading Cases, p. 439, and left unchanged by a long succession of editors.

They also referred to Reg. v. Hartington Middle Quarter, 3 W. R. 285, 4 E. & B. 780; Reg. v. Haughton, 1 W. R. 164, 1 E. & B. 501; and Reg. v. Blakemore, 2 Den. C. C. 410.

W. Senior replied.

The Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—Although I do not deny the local importance of this case, and indeed the importance of it generally, it seems to me that it lies within a comparatively short compass. I think that the matter becomes clear if we look at the corresponding section of the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 150, and observe what has been the question in doubt in some of the cases under that Act, and then compare it with the local Act with which your lordships are dealing here.

In the Public Health Act the mode in which the matter is dealt with is this: "All streets being or which at any time become highways repairable by the inhabitants at large," are by section 149 given to the jurisdiction of the urban authority. Then section 150 gives the urban authority jurisdiction in certain cases over "any street within any urban district (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large)." The urban authority is empowered to give notice to the owners of property in a private street which requires them to flag, channel, and so forth, to deal with the particular place which is under their authority by reason of section 150, and if the owner does not do what he is ordered to do by the urban authority they can do it themselves; whereupon the magistrates are empowered to enforce by a proper order the payment of those expenses. In Reg. v. Hutchins what happened was this: The magistrates before whom the question came as to whether or not a certain sum of money (£400 odd) had been incurred, thought proper to enter into the question of whether or not it was properly proved that this was not a public street, but a private road within section 150. I have looked to find some jurisdiction given to the magistrates to enter into that question, and I can find none. The only thing which I can suppose is that it was argued that, inasmuch as this power given under section 150 depends upon the question of the street with which they are dealing not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, that was one of the necessary facts to be proved to give the magistrates jurisdiction in order to issue their process and enforce the payment of those expenses. I must say, so far as that case is concerned, I entirely concur with the judgment. The magistrates had no such jurisdiction at all; they were not invested with any such power at all. The only thing which the Legislature confided to them was that they should issue process to compel payment of something which the urban authority had themselves paid by reason of the disobedience of persons upon whom the notice had been served. As to that case, I think it was quite rightly decided.

But let us turn for a moment to the statute which is before your lordships, and the distinction will be at once apparent. Instead of its being left to the determination of the local authority to give notice, and when that notice is disobeyed to do the work themselves, and thereupon when they have done the work themselves to sue for the amount against the person who disobeyed their order—instead of that, a whole machinery is created by which the question of whether or not the street is repairable by the parish shall be determined by a particular tribunal—a tribunal erected for this express purpose; and when we look to see what that particular forum erected for that purpose is to determine, it is sufficient to see the number of objections which can be made and what has to be determined: "(a) That an alleged street or part of a street is not or does not form part of a street within the meaning of this Act" (that is a question which relates to a different class of things that the urban authority have got to do). "(b) That a street or part of a street is (in whole or in part) a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large." So that, instead of being, as it is, under the Public Health Act, 1875, something removed from the jurisdiction of the justices, who have only power to issue process and enforce the payment of a sum of money payable under the circumstances stated in section 150 of that Act, in this Act, the very question whether or not a particular road is or is not a highway repairable by the parish is expressly remitted to that tribunal for the purpose of determination.

For my own part, I am wholly unable to see anything more in the nature of a judgment in rem than that; and although I desire not to be bound by it, because I think it unnecessary after what I have said to enter into that question, yet I must say that where you have a corporation on the one side and objectors capable of coming in, and receiving notice to come in, in respect of a particular matter, on the other side, it comes very near to showing that it is a proceeding between the same parties—an adjudication between the same parties.

For my own part, I am quite prepared to base my opinion upon the subject upon the hypothesis that it is a judgment in rem. It is a judgment as to the status of that street; and that judgment as to the status of that street is, it is said, subject to appeal. Counsel for the appellants, I think, told us that it was subject to appeal to quarter sessions. He has not pointed out to us where the appeal comes, and I have not found it; but whether it is subject to appeal or not seems to me to be immaterial. If there is no appeal, it is a final adjudication and determination. If there is an appeal, I presume, from what has happened, the question was in this case determined adversely to those who are at present the appellants against the judgment of the Court of Appeal. In any case it appears to me that this question has been finally and absolutely determined; and I must say that I rather concur with what has been suggested by Vaughan Williams, L.J., that the probability is that a section of this character or a statute of this character was introduced by reason of the difficulty that had arisen under the Public Health Act. If you look carefully into the matter you find that there is no one who has any power of litigating the question when once the local authority has thought proper to give the notices. There is no forum that I can see created by the statutes before whom that question can come, and all that is to be done is that they are to recover the expenses against any person who has disobeyed the order. Probably there must be some method of removing the order if made without jurisdiction—perhaps it might be moved by a certiorari to the King's Bench; but certainly no such proceeding is contemplated by the Public Health Act as is created by the Wakefield Act.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that it is an order made by the justices who are called on by the provisions of the statute to exercise that jurisdiction. They have exercised that jurisdiction. They have acted within their powers, and it seems to me that the adjudication which they have made is conclusive, and properly conclusive, getting rid of a great many awkward questions which might otherwise be raised. This appeal, therefore, ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely concur in what has been said by the Lord Chancellor. I desire only specially to add that I think that Vaughan Williams and Mathew, L.JJ., have stated clearly the distinction which exists between this case and the case of Reg. v. Hutchins, which deprives that case of any authority in the present case.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion. The point on which I differ from the judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., may be put very shortly, and it is this: He seems to have thought that the primary jurisdiction of the justices under section 31 of the Act of 1887 was either to quash or to amend the proceedings, and that the power to determine the matter of the objection was merely incidental and leading up to that jurisdiction. I take a wholly different view of the construction of that section. I think that their primary jurisdiction is to proceed to hear and determine the matter of all the objections—that is their first and their main duty; and then, as consequential upon that, they may, but they are not bound to do so, on the application either of the objectors or the corporation, proceed either to quash in whole or in part or to amend the resolutions, &c., which form the subject of the proceeding.

This view shows the distinction between this case and Reg. v. Hutchins, which the Lord Chief Justice thought governed this case. I cannot put the distinction between this case and that more clearly than it has been put by Vaughan Williams, L.J. Shortly stated, it is, in my opinion, this—that in Reg. v. Hutchins Lord Selborne, L.C., and the learned judges who sat with him thought that the matter on which the decision of the magistrates was said to be res judicata was one which they had no jurisdiction to entertain per se—that they had no jurisdiction whatever to decide whether a road was or was not a highway; they had jurisdiction to decide whether a sum of money was due from a particular individual to the corporation, and for the purpose of determining that question it might be necessary for them incidentally to express an opinion upon the question of whether a road was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large or not; but, supposing that to be so, that would not make an incidental determination of that kind res judicata in a subsequent proceeding in which that question came into prominence. But I doubt very much indeed whether the justices had any jurisdiction at all even to deal incidentally in that way with the question whether or not it was repairable by the inhabitants at large, or whether they ought not merely to have ordered a sum of money—the contribution—to be paid. However, that question is not before your lordships, and it is unnecessary to express an opinion upon it.

I agree with Vaughan Williams, L.J., also that this decision of the magistrates, if not in form a judgment in rem, was at all events in all its essentials a judgment in rem. And I also agree that if it be not strictly a judgment in rem so as to make it conclusive upon all the world, all persons who were called by being served with notice of the proceedings and had an opportunity of attending and supporting or opposing the objection, must be bound by the decision of the magistrates, and none the less because they did not think fit to attend, but left the objection to be fought by other people.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I was at first inclined to share the doubts of Stirling, L.J., but the argument of counsel for the respondents has satisfied me that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right. The question is whether the local Act has given the justices jurisdiction to determine whether the street in dispute is a highway repairable by the inhabitants, as a substantive issue in rem, or merely as a medium concludendi of the liability or non-liability of the objectors. If the former be the true view, then a decision on that issue, raised by one of the class interested, is good against all the rest. There is nothing contrary to principle, and much convenience, in a local tribunal being so authorized to adjudicate on a local matter with full notice to all concerned, and the question is merely whether in this instance that has been done by the Legislature. On the whole, I have come to think that it has, and that the appeal therefore fails.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It appears to me that the question turns entirely on the fact which occurs in this case, and did not occur in Reg. v. Hutchins, that the objection raised for the purpose of being decided in accordance with the Act, and the question which was decided in accordance with the Act, was whether Sludge-lane was a street repairable by the inhabitants at large or not. If there had been no such matter raised, Reg. v. Hutchins would have had an important bearing on the present case; but as it is, I have not the slightest doubt that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, Barham, & Lawford, for C. J. Hudson, Wakefield; S. F. Taylor, for J. B. Cooke, Wakefield.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 16.

GRIFFIN v. HOULDER LINE (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Dock—Ship in dock—Sailor—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7), s. 104.

A sailor who meets with an accidental injury while engaged in clearing out the hold of a ship lying in dock is entitled to the benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Per Collins, M.R., and Cozens-Hardy, L.J., Mathew, L.J., dissenting.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the City of London County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The question was whether a sailor working on board a ship lying in a dock is entitled to the benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The following statement of facts was agreed upon by the parties: "The applicant, Elizabeth Ann Griffin, is the widow and administratrix of Edward Latimer Griffin, deceased. The said deceased was an able seaman, and on the 21st of November, 1902, he signed articles at Liverpool to serve on board the respondents' steamship Royston Grange as an able seaman upon a voyage from Liverpool, where the ship was then lying, to the River Plate and back to this country. The said deceased duly joined the ship pursuant to the said articles on or about the 22nd of November, 1902, and sailed in her from Liverpool to Newport, Monmouth, at which port the vessel called to take in her bunker coal for the voyage. The vessel arrived in the Alexandra Dock, Newport, on the 24th of November, 1902, and at midnight on the 28th of November she had finished receiving her bunker coal and was moved out to the buoys in the docks preparatory to proceeding to sea on the following morning. While engaged clearing up the No. 5 hold on the 29th of November a piece of dunnage wood known as a 'tom,' and used for the purpose of supporting a deck beam when heavy weights were stowed above, was knocked down by a fellow-servant of the deceased and fell across his ankle and instep, causing a fracture of the ankle and instep which necessitated an operation. The wages of the deceased were 18s. 10d. per week. The said voyage upon which the deceased signed articles ended upon the vessel's arrival in London on the 3rd of March, 1903. In addition to the aforesaid wages the deceased was entitled to be fed whilst he was on board the steamer, and the cost to the respondents of so maintaining him would have amounted to above 10s. per week."

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the hearing of the arbitration the county court judge found that the deceased died on the 10th of March, 1903, and that his death was due to the accident which happened on the 29th of November, 1902. The main question was whether the employment of the deceased was an employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applied. The county court judge was of opinion that the Act was not intended to apply to a sailor working as a sailor. If the ship had been alongside a wharf and the sailors had been working as stevedores, then, in his opinion, they would not have been working as sailors, and the Act would have applied. But in this case he thought that the deceased was working as a sailor and nothing else. He therefore held that the case did not come within the Act.

The applicant appealed.

Robson, K.C., and G. A. Scott, for the applicant.

Carver, K.C., and Dawson Miller, for the respondents.

Feb. 16.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: I agree with the judgment about to be read by Cozens-Hardy, L.J., but as we are not unanimous, I will state my opinion in my own words. The question is whether a sailor who met with an accident while engaged in clearing out the hold preparatory to receiving cargo in a ship which was lying at anchor in a dock can take proceedings against the owners of the ship under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The county court judge has decided that he cannot, on the broad ground that the Act does not apply to sailors. It is not contended that there is any provision expressly excluding sailors from the Act. The question, therefore, must be, Do they come within the class of persons to whom the Act gives a remedy?

Section 1 of the Act provides as follows: "If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this Act." Therefore the applicant must be a workman, and the employment must be one to which the Act applies. By section 7, sub-section 2, "workman" is defined as including "every person who is engaged in an employment to which the Act applies, whether by way of manual labour or otherwise, and whether his agreement is one of service or apprenticeship or otherwise, and is expressed or implied, is oral or in writing." By sub-section 1 of section 7, "this Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on or in or about a . . . factory." And by sub-section 2 "undertaker" in the case of a factory means the occupier; and by the Factory Act, 1901, s. 104, "the person having the actual use or occupation of a dock . . . or of any premises within the same or forming part thereof . . . shall be deemed to be the occupier of a factory.

It was once thought that, as the Act does not in terms constitute a ship a factory, employment in a ship in a dock was not employment in a factory, and the inference was also drawn that, as ships were not made factories, the Act was not intended to include sailors. The House of Lords, however, held in Raine v. Jobson, 49 W. R. 705, [1901] A. C. 404, that a workman employed in a ship which was in a dock was employed in a factory. The fact that he was employed in a ship did not negative his being employed in a factory. Therefore, if the exclusion of sailors from the Act is rested on the fact that employment in a ship cannot be employment in a factory, the foundation for such contention is destroyed by that case. This court has applied the principle of Raine v. Jobson to more than one case where workmen sent by their employers to do painter's or joiner's work in a ship in a dock have been held to be within the Act and to be entitled to compensation against their employers as the undertakers—i.e., the users or occupiers of a dock within the above definition. Unless, therefore, there be some special exclusion of sailors from the Act, a sailor clearing out a hold in a ship in dock is precisely in the same position to claim compensation against his employer as he would be if instead of being a sailor he had been a coal-heaver in a coal bunker and his master had been a coal merchant instead of the owner of a ship. But there is no such exclusion to be found in the Act. The foundation for such suggestion, as I have pointed out, fails; and a sailor when employed as a workman in a ship in a dock is just as much drawn within the Act as any handicraftsman under the same circumstances. His position, of course, while at sea is quite different; he must get himself physically into a factory before he can get the benefit of the Act. The difference of his position at sea is pointed out by Lords Halsbury and Shand in the case cited. It seems to me, therefore, that the authority of Raine v. Jobson concludes this case, and that the appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: I regret to be unable to deal with this appeal from the point of view of my learned colleagues. I think Judge Rentoul was right in his decision that the appellant was not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the loss of her husband, Edward Latimer Griffin.

The material facts are these: The deceased man had joined the respondents' ship, The Royston Grange, at Liverpool under signed articles which bound him to serve the respondents as an able seaman on a round voyage to the River Plate and back to a home port. The vessel went from Liverpool to the Alexandra Dock, Newport, to take in her bunker coal, and, when the coaling was completed, she was moved out to buoys in the dock preparatory to proceeding to sea. While there the deceased man was employed in what was admitted to be the ordinary duty of a seaman—viz., in clearing up No. 5 hold for the reception of cargo. The accident to which his death was due occurred while he was so engaged. The learned county court judge came to the conclusion that Griffin was not protected by the Act, and that the claim of his widow for compensation failed.

Upon the argument of the appeal it was not disputed that, if the accident had occurred while the ship was at sea, the widow could not have maintained her right to compensation. But it was argued that the legislation embodied in the Factory Act, 1901, had altered the status of seamen on board when the vessel was not at sea and was lying in dock. The ship, it was said, while in dock was occupying part of a factory, and the sailors therefore were employed in a factory and were protected by the Workmen's Compensation Act. In support of this contention reliance was placed on the provisions of the Factory Act, 1901, and the judgment of the House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson. But I am unable to discover either in the statute or in the decision of the House of Lords any indication of an intention to extend the Workmen's Compensation Act to a class which had not been previously included in that statute. Full effect may be given to the Factory Act and the decision, if both are treated as applicable to the class of workmen with which the Workmen's Compensation Act was clearly intended to deal—viz., workmen as distinguished from seamen. The argument for the appellant would lead to this extraordinary and, as it seems to me, unreasonable result—that a seaman while at sea would be outside the operation of the Act, but would become entitled to protection when in a position of comparative safety. I can see no reason for thinking that such a result could have been intended as the consequence of the application of the provisions of the Act of 1901 to the Workmen's Compensation Act. Further, I consider it unlikely that any change would have been made in the law which would affect existing as well as future contracts with seamen without a clear intimation to shipowners of their altered position. I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the following judgment: The applicant is the administratrix of Edward Latimer Griffin, an able seaman on board the respondents' steamship Royston Grange. On her voyage from Liverpool to the River Plate the vessel proceeded to Newport to take in bunker coal. She arrived in the Alexandra Dock on the 24th of November, and at midnight on the 28th of November she had finished receiving her bunker coal and was moved out to the buoys in the dock preparatory to proceeding to sea on the following morning. While there, in the discharge of his duties as a seaman, Griffin met with an accident which resulted in his death. His Honour Judge Rentoul has held that as the deceased was a sailor, working as a sailor, he is not within the Act.

By section 7 of the Act the term "workman" includes every person who is engaged in the employments to which this Act applies, whether by manual labour or otherwise. The Act applies only to employment by undertakers as defined in the Act, including, inter alia, employment in or on or about a factory, and "factory" includes a dock, and the undertaker of a factory is the occupier thereof.

Now, it is clear that a ship, as such, is not a factory within the meaning of the Act, but I think it must be admitted, since the decision in the House of Lords of Raine v. Jobson, and the decision in this court of Bartell v. Gray & Co., 50 W. R. 310, [1902] 1 K. B. 225, that a ship occupying a berth in a dock occupies part of a factory, with the result that the vessel in question was within the operation of the Act, and the shipowners were undertakers within the Act at the time when the accident happened. Unless, therefore, there are some words to be found expressly excluding seamen as such from the benefit of the Act, I think that the applicant must succeed. I can find nothing to put seamen in a worse position than would be any carpenter, painter, or other mechanic on board a ship while in dock. The observations of Lord Halsbury and of Lord Shand in Raine v. Jobson, to the effect that it was not within the contemplation of the statute to deal with the relations between shipowners and sailors when engaged in their occupation of sailing upon the seas, do not seem to apply where the vessel is not at sea, but where, within the meaning of the statute, it is lying in and occupying part of a factory. In my opinion, this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Burn & Berridge.

Solicitors for the respondents, W. A. Crump & Son.

From K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J.) Jan. 22.

PRICE & CO. v. UNION LIGHTERAGE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Contract—Carrier—Exemption—Negligence of servants—"Loss of goods which can be covered by insurance."

Goods were shipped at a jetty on the River Thames in the defendants' barge for carriage by them to a place higher up the river. The carriage was subject to the following clause: "The rates charged by us are for conveyance only, and we will not be liable for any loss of or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance. The terms of the marine or other policy should stipulate that insurance is effected without recourse to lighterman." After shipment the goods were lost, owing to the negligence of the defendants' servants.

Held, that, though the loss was one which would be covered by an ordinary marine policy on goods, the clause did not in sufficiently clear and unambiguous terms exempt the defendants from liability for loss arising from the negligence of their servants.

Judgment of Walton, J. (51 W. R. 477, [1903] 1 K. B. 750), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Walton, J., in favour of the plaintiffs (reported in 51 W. R. 477, [1903] 1 K. B. 750).

The plaintiffs claimed damages for the loss of a quantity of oil belonging to them which was shipped at a jetty at Thames Haven in a barge belonging to the defendants, under a contract by which the defendants agreed to receive and lighter the oil for the plaintiffs to Belvedere, up the River Thames. The contract was not contained in any written document, but it was admitted that by the course of dealing between the parties the lighterage was subject to the terms of a clause which was printed on the forms of stationery used by the defendants in their business, and was as follows: "The rates charged by us are for conveyance only, and we will not be liable for any loss or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance. The terms of the marine or other policy should stipulate that insurance is effected without recourse to lighterman. We will not be responsible for any consequences arising from strikes or other labour disturbances."

The oil, which was not covered by insurance, was shipped about high water, early in the afternoon of the 31st of October, 902, and the barge when loaded was allowed to remain moored to the jetty until after low water. As the barge rose with the rising tide its gunwale caught under a projecting part of the face of the jetty, against which it was lying, and as the tide rose the barge was held down, and so was submerged and sunk, and the oil was lost.

Walton, J., found that the loss was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants in leaving the barge unattended alongside the jetty while the tide rose. Upon the question whether the above clause exempted the defendants from liability for a loss caused by the negligence of their servants, he said that such a loss as occurred in this case would be covered by an ordinary marine policy. But there was a well-established rule of construction that if the carrier wished to exempt himself from liability for the negligence of himself or his servants he must do so in express, plain, and unambiguous language. An exemption in general words, not expressly relating to negligence, even though the words were wide enough to include loss by the negligence or default of the carriers' servants, must be construed as limiting the liability of the carrier as insurer, and not as relieving him from the duty of exercising reasonable skill and care. If the carrier desired to relieve himself from the duty of using by himself and his servants reasonable skill and care in the carriage of goods, he must do so in plain language and explicitly, and not by general words; in other words, if a carrier wished to exempt himself from negligence, he must insert in his contract a negligence clause. The clause in this case must be read as meaning, "I will use reasonable skill and care in the conveyance of the goods, but I will not undertake any liability as insurer for loss or damage which can be covered by insurance with underwriters." He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £370 3s. 7d.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants appealed.

Carver, K.C., and A. M. Talbot (Loehnis with them), for the defendants.—The exemption clause is wide enough to include loss arising from the negligence of the carriers' servants. If the loss would be covered by an ordinary marine policy on goods, the exemption clause applies. A loss arising from the negligence of the carriers' servants would be covered by an ordinary marine policy. Every loss would not be covered by such a policy. For instance, loss caused by mishandling of goods, bad stowage, and misdelivery would not be so covered. It is not necessary that the carrier should exempt himself in express terms from liability for loss by negligence. It is sufficient if the words used are clear and unambiguous, and include an exemption of negligence. The rule of construction has been laid down in many cases, such as Phillips v. Clark, 5 W. R. 582, 2 C. B. N. S. 156; Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co., 16 W. R. 796, L. R. 3 C. P. 476; Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Co., 22 W. R. 752, L. R. 9 Q. B. 546; Steinman v. Angier Line, 39 W. R. 392, [1891] 1 Q. B. 619; Burton v. English, 32 W. R., at p. 656, 12 Q. B. D., at p. 223. In Taubman v. Pacific Steam Navigation Co., 26 L. T. 704, the exception was for loss "under any circumstances whatsoever," and it was held to include loss caused by the gross negligence or wilful default of the defendants' servants. The words in the present exemption clause are plain and capable of only one meaning when read in the ordinary commercial or business sense. In Sutton & Co. v. Ciceri & Co., 15 App. Cas. 144, 38 W. R. Dig. 28, the exception of "insurance risks" was held not to cover breakage of the goods. But breakage is not a risk that would be covered by an ordinary marine policy on goods. The decision in Mitchell v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 23 W. R. 853, L. R. 10 Q. B. 256, upon which Walton, J., relied, is not consistent, upon the question as to the construction of the agreement, with Ashenden v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., 28 W. R. 511, 5 Ex. D. 190.

They also referred to Thomas v. Brown, 4 Com. Cas. 186.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Bailhache, for the plaintiffs.—There is a well-established rule of construction in these cases, which has been laid down in the series of cases which have been referred to—namely, that a carrier, to exempt himself from liability for loss arising from the negligence of himself or his servants, must express that exemption in clear and unambiguous terms. A lighterman is, as regards conveyance of goods on the river, a common carrier: Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson, L. R. 9 Ex. 338, 23 W. R. Dig. 39. It is against his general liability as an insurer of the goods he carries that this exemption clause relieves him, and not against loss caused by negligence. If the goods owner insured the goods with another person, that other person, upon payment, would have recourse to the carrier. The words in the clause, "without recourse to lighterman," refer to recourse in respect of the general liability of the lighterman as an insurer of the goods. Sutton & Co. v. Ciceri & Co. is conclusive to show that this exemption clause does not apply.

A. M. Talbot replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion the judgment of Walton, J., is right and must be affirmed. A principle of construction in cases of this kind is now well-established, and it appears in different forms in various cases. Where an exemption clause in a contract is capable of two constructions, one of which will relieve the carrier from liability for loss provided there is no negligence on his part, and the other will relieve him from liability for loss even though caused by negligence on his part, the court will construe the contract as not exempting the carrier from liability for negligence. To exclude liability for negligence express words must be used. That is the principle upon which Walton, J., acted, and it is a principle to be derived from the reasoning in the various cases, one instance of which is Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Co. That being so, we have to consider what the construction of this particular exemption clause is. I agree that we must construe the words in their ordinary commercial or business sense. We have not to consider an exemption clause in respect of loss "under any circumstances whatsoever," which was the clause in Taubman v. Pacific Steam Navigation Co., a case which it is not necessary for us to consider now, but which may some day have to be discussed. The contract here runs as follows: "The rates charged by us are for conveyance only, and we will not be liable for any loss of or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance. The terms of the marine or other policy should stipulate that insurance is effected without recourse to lighterman. We will not be responsible for any consequences arising from strikes or other labour disturbances." Are those words sufficiently clear and unambiguous to exempt the carrier from liability for loss caused by the negligence of himself or his servants? It is quite possible to construe the words themselves as excluding every loss no matter how caused, because every loss can now be covered by insurance. That, however, is not the decisive element. In such a contract as this relating to a common carrier do the words include an exemption from liability for loss by negligence? One has only to look at the cases which are conveniently collected under section 105 in Carver on Carriage by Sea, as, for instance, Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Co. and Sutton & Co. v. Ciceri & Co., to see that the courts have always held that the words include only those losses which are not caused by the negligence of the carrier or his servants. There are many cases to which the exemption clause in the contract of carriage can apply independently of those cases in which the loss is caused by the negligence of the carrier. This is a class of contract where the words have received a business construction, and they are not sufficiently explicit to exclude the liability of the carrier for negligence. The defendants are therefore liable, and the appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion. I have carefully read the judgment of Walton, J., and I so entirely agree with it that I am unable to add anything to it.

ROMER, L.J.—I am also of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, J. A. & H. E. Farnfield.

Solicitor for the defendants, C. E. Harvey.

From Chan. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) Dec. 15, 16.

In re WELSBACH INCANDESCENT GAS LIGHT CO. (LIMITED AND REDUCED). (a.)

Company—Memorandum of association—Different classes of shareholders—Rights of shareholders defined by memorandum—Power in memorandum to modify rights—Validity of power.

A provision in a memorandum of association of a limited company, which memorandum provides for the division of the capital into different classes of shares and prescribes for the rights and privileges of the different classes of shareholders inter se, that the rights thus attached to the different classes of shares may from time to time be modified as provided by the articles of association, is valid; and consequently a scheme for the reduction of the capital of the company, which involves such a modification, will be sanctioned by the court, provided that it involves no unfairness to the shareholders whose rights are thereby affected.

This was an appeal from an order of Buckley, J., confirming a special resolution for the reduction of the capital of the company.

The company was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1893, with limited liability on the 9th of December, 1897.

The memorandum of association, after stating the objects of the company, which were (inter alia) "to acquire and take over as going concerns and amalgamate the undertakings" of four then existing companies, "and all or any of the assets and liabilities of any of" those companies, provided by clause 5 that "the capital of the company is £3,500,000 divided into 300,000 preference shares of £5 each, 1,350,000 ordinary shares of £1, and 650,000 deferred shares of £1 each." By clause 6, "The rights following shall be attached to the aforesaid shares inter se, subject as hereinafter provided—namely: (a) The said preference shares shall confer the right to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the capital for the time being paid up thereon respectively, and shall rank both as regards such dividend and as to capital in priority to all other shares in the original capital, but shall not confer any further right to participate in profits or assets; (b) subject as aforesaid, the ordinary shares shall confer on the holders the right to a fixed cumulative dividend at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on the capital for the time being paid up thereon respectively, and shall rank both as regards such dividend and as to capital next after the said preference shares; (c) subject as aforesaid, the said deferred shares shall confer the right to a fixed cumulative dividend at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on the capital for the time being paid up thereon respectively, and shall rank both as regards such dividend and capital next after the ordinary shares; (d) subject as aforesaid, any profits which it may at any time be determined to distribute amongst the members, and in the winding up any surplus assets after repayment of capital shall be divided as to one-half between the holders of the ordinary shares aforesaid in proportion to the ordinary shares held by them respectively, and as to the other half among the holders of the deferred shares aforesaid in proportion to the deferred shares held by them respectively; (f) the rights for the time being attached to the said several classes of shares respectively may be modified or dealt with in the manner mentioned in clause 52 of the accompanying articles of association, but not otherwise, and that clause and also clauses 157 and 159 of the said articles shall be deemed to be incorporated herein and have effect accordingly."

Clauses 157 and 159 applied in the event of a winding up of the company.

By clause 50 of the articles the company was empowered from time to time by special resolution to reduce its capital in the manner provided by section 3 of the Companies Act, 1877.

By clause 52: "Whilst the capital is divided into different classes of shares, all or any of the rights and privileges attached to such class may be modified by agreement between the company and any person purporting to contract on behalf of that class, provided that such agreement (1) is ratified in writing by the holders of at least two-thirds of the issued shares of that class, or (2) is ratified by an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate general meeting of the holders of the shares of that class, and all the provisions hereinafter contained as to general meetings shall, mutatis mutandis, apply to every such meeting, but so that the quorum thereof shall be members holding or representing by proxy two-thirds of the issued shares of the class." The articles also provided that all the provisions therein contained should, so far as circumstances would admit, apply to stock as well as to shares.

By clause 122: "The profits of the company, which in respect of each year or other period it shall be determined to distribute among the members shall be applied according to their rights and interests."

By clause 123: "The company in general meeting may declare a dividend to be paid to the members according to their rights and interests in the profits."

By clause 124: "No larger dividend shall be declared than is recommended by the directors; but the company in general meeting may declare a smaller dividend."

By clause 125: "The declaration of the directors as to the amount of the profits of the company shall be conclusive."

All the preference and all the ordinary shares were issued and paid up in full. Of the deferred shares only 629,539 were issued, and they were paid up in full.

The preference shares were afterwards converted into preference stock, and the ordinary shares into ordinary stock. Both were afterwards reconverted into £1 shares.

In December, 1901, an advisory committee appointed by the shareholders reported that in their opinion the company had been largely over-capitalized, and recommended that the capital should be largely reduced and readjusted.

On the 7th of May, 1903, three agreements were entered into between the company and three persons respectively purporting to act on behalf of the three classes of stockholders respectively. Each of these agreements contained recitals to the effect that the company's paid-up capital was to a large extent unrepresented by available assets, and that a scheme for the reduction of capital and modification of class rights had been prepared and embodied in a series of resolutions which it was proposed to pass as special resolutions in the terms indicated in an annexed form of notice, and that the proposed special resolutions involved modifications of the rights and privileges attached to the preference and ordinary stock and deferred shares respectively. And it was agreed (1) that so soon as the agreement should be ratified as below mentioned the company should be at liberty to pass special resolutions in the terms indicated in the annexed form of notice and to apply to the court for an order confirming the reduction of capital as by such resolutions was provided for; (2) the rights and privileges attached to (a) the preference stock, (b) the ordinary stock, and (c) the deferred shares should be modified so far as to allow the said special resolutions to be passed and have effect; (3) the company was to convene the requisite meetings for passing the said special resolutions and to use its best endeavours to procure the passing thereof. Each agreement was conditional on its being ratified in one of the modes prescribed by clause 52 of the articles. The above-mentioned annexed notices of meetings which were to be held set forth the resolutions which it was proposed to pass.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

These agreements were on the 20th of May, 1903, respectively ratified at meetings of the preference stockholders, the ordinary stockholders, and the deferred shareholders respectively in accordance with clause 52 of the articles. On the same day an extraordinary general meeting of the company was held at which the following special resolutions were (inter alia) duly passed, and they were afterwards duly confirmed on the 11th of June, 1903: "(4) That the £1,500,000 preference stock of the company be, and the same is, hereby reconverted and divided into 1,500,000 preference shares of £1 each, and that the £1,350,000 ordinary stock of the company be, and the same is, hereby reconverted and divided into 1,350,000 ordinary shares of £1 each. (5) That the capital of the company be reduced to £1,345,000, divided into 1,500,000 preference shares of 13s., and 1,350,000 ordinary shares of 5s. each, and 650,000 deferred shares of 1s., and that such reduction be effected as follows: (1) By cancelling paid-up capital which is unrepresented by available assets to the extent of 7s. in respect of each of the preference shares, and by reducing the nominal amount of such preference shares accordingly to 13s. each; (2) by cancelling paid-up capital which is unrepresented by available assets to the extent of 15s. in respect of each of the ordinary shares of the company, and by reducing the nominal amount of such ordinary shares to 5s. per share; (3) by cancelling paid-up capital which is unrepresented by available assets to the extent of 19s. in respect of each of the outstanding deferred shares of the company, and by reducing the nominal amount of such deferred shares and of the unissued deferred shares to 1s. per share." Another special resolution was also passed that the articles of association of the company be altered by adding at the end thereof the following additional provisions—namely, clause 163, to the effect that immediately after the confirmation by the court and the registration of the order and a minute approved by the court in accordance with section 15 of the Companies Act, 1867, the directors should by resolution consolidate the preference shares into preference stock and the ordinary shares into ordinary stock, and should thereupon by resolution divide each holding of preference stock into two sections—namely, one of 6 per cent. cumulative preference stock and the other of ordinary stock, such sections bearing the same ratio to each other as forty to twenty-five, and the directors should by resolution reconvert the said stock of each class into shares of £1 each, and should thereupon by resolution convert the deferred shares, if any, into ordinary stock, and upon such conversion should reconvert such ordinary stock into ordinary shares of £1 each to the extent that the capital might consist in part of 600,000 6 per cent. cumulative preference shares of £1 each and in part of ordinary shares of £1 each conferring the rights next specified—namely, "As from the time when the said order and minute shall have been registered as aforesaid the profits of the company from time to time available for dividend shall be applicable as follows: (1) To the payment of the cumulative dividend on the preference shares or stock as from the registration aforesaid; (2) to the payment of the dividend on the ordinary shares or stock as from the time when the said order and minute shall have been registered as aforesaid, the surplus assets available for distribution amongst the members in a winding up shall be applicable, first, to the payment off of the preference shares or stock at the rate of £150 for every £100 of such stock; and secondly, the surplus shall be divided amongst the holders of the ordinary shares or stock rateably in proportion to the amount of such shares or stock held by them respectively. The provisions hereby made in regard to the rights of the members of each class as regards dividends and distribution of assets in a winding up shall take effect by way of modifications of the rights originally attached thereto, and accordingly such members shall not be entitled to any rights inconsistent therewith, and in particular all arrears of undeclared dividends up to the time when the said order and minute shall be registered shall be extinguished."

Before the meetings were held the directors sent to the shareholders a circular in which they said that if the proposed scheme were not adopted the payment of dividends would have to be indefinitely postponed.

These resolution having been passed, the company presented a petition for the confirmation by the court of the resolutions for the reduction of the capital.

The petition alleged that previously to the passing of the resolutions paid-up capital to an amount exceeding £2,134,039 had been lost, or was unrepresented by available assets, and particulars of the alleged loss were stated.

The petition also stated that "no dividends have been paid on the preference stock and shares in the capital of the company since March, 1900. On the ordinary shares a dividend of 7 per cent. until the 31st of March, 1899, and an interim dividend of 2½ per cent. on account of the year ending the 31st of March, 1900. Nothing has since been paid. The deferred shares received a dividend at the rate of 7 per cent. for a period of about three months to the 31st of March, 1898, and nothing has since been paid."

It was also alleged that the proposed reduction of capital "does not involve either the diminution of any liability in respect of any unpaid capital or the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital."

Evidence was adduced to prove the alleged loss of capital.

The petition was opposed by the United States Debenture Corporation, who were holders of preference stock.

Buckley, J., held that the alleged loss had been proved, that the proposed reduction was in accordance with the legal rights of the shareholders having regard to clause 52 of the articles, and that the proposed reduction was fair and equitable. He accordingly made an order confirming the resolution.

The corporation appealed.

Younger, K.C., and Kirby, for the appellants.—The rights of the preference shareholders are defined by the memorandum of association. They are therefore conditions which cannot be altered.

Ashbury v. Watson, 33 W. R. 882; Collins v. Birming- ham Breweries, 15 Times L. R. 180; Andrews v. Gas Meter Co., 45 W. R. 321, [1897] 1 Ch. 361; Underwood v. London Music Hall (Limited), 49 W. R. 507, [1901] 2 Ch. 309; Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, 48 W. R. 452, [1900] 1 Ch. 656; British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399; In re Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co., [1900] 2 Ch. 846, 49 W. R. Dig. 84, were referred to in the course of the argument.

Eve, K.C., and Martelli, for the company.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment this appeal fails. I do not know that there is really much to be said, so far as I am concerned, except that I entirely agree with the judgment of Buckley, J., and the reasons which he gave for it.

There are only two points for consideration. The first is the proof of the alleged loss of capital. If you go through the figures, and deal with them as Buckley, J., has done, there cannot, in my opinion, be any doubt that the loss has been proved.

Now, assuming the loss be proved, there is very little else to be said. If the memorandum of association gave to a class of shareholders certain privileges and rights unconditionally, then I agree fully that Ashbury v. Watson is conclusive to show that the company could not alter or modify the privileges thus unconditionally given by the memorandum. But that is not the case here. Far from the privileges being given unconditionally, it is obvious that they are given conditionally, as is shown by clause 6 (f) of the memorandum of association. [His lordship read the clause, and continued:] The result is that these privileges are not unconditional, but conditional; and it seems to me that all the proper steps have been taken to bring about the modification of rights and privileges of the preference shareholders.

Under these circumstances I see no reason why the sanction of the court to this scheme should be refused upon the ground that it in any way modifies the rights of the preference shareholders. The rights of the preference shareholders, as was pointed out by Buckley, J., are now those which have been brought about by the modification; and under these circumstances the scheme is in no way inconsistent with those rights.

That being so, the only matter left to consider is whether the scheme is unfair. I entirely agree with Buckley, J., that, whether a scheme does or does not accord exactly with the legal rights of the shareholders, the court may always consider whether it is a fair or an unfair scheme. In my judgment this is a fair scheme. I cannot help saying, although this is in no way conclusive upon the question of fairness, that the court always does take into consideration the wishes of the shareholders who are affected by the scheme; and in this case the majorities which have been obtained, to my mind, go far to show that the shareholders, and in particular the preference shareholders, regarded this as a fair scheme. And, after all, these modifications might have been brought about and have bound the preference shareholders, even though there had been no scheme for the reduction of capital.

I think, under these circumstances, we ought to affirm the judgment of Buckley, J., and with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree that this appeal must be dismissed. The only point really in the case was that the provision in clause 6 (f) of the memorandum was invalid. In my opinion that is a perfectly good provision. The rights and privileges of the different classes of shares inter se constitute a matter not specially provided for by the Legislature. There is no reason why those rights and privileges should not be altered from time to time, or why the alteration should not be duly provided for. Such a provision is not like one concerning the object of the company or the total amount of its capital. Those matters, as is provided by section 8 of the Companies Act, 1862, must be fixed by the memorandum of association. They must be specified in the memorandum of association, and cannot afterwards be changed at the will of the company; but there is no legislative provision as to the rights and privileges of the different classes of shareholders inter se, and the company may properly provide for any modification of those rights and privileges by either the articles or the memorandum. A fallacious argument was adduced on behalf of the appellants, that the rights and privileges of the preference shareholders were fixed by the memorandum of association, clause 6, paragraphs (a) to (d) inclusive, and that those paragraphs constituted a condition of the memorandum which could not be altered. The answer to that argument is perfectly clear. The condition as to the rights and privileges of the preference and ordinary shares inter se contained in the memorandum is not that which is expressed by the paragraphs (a) to (d), but that which is expressed by those paragraphs plus paragraph (f). I have no doubt that the provision contained in paragraph (f) is perfectly valid, and that being so the whole argument for the appellants in substance goes by the board, and I think the appeal must fail.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The main argument in this court has been upon a point which, as I understand, was not made before Buckley, J., and certainly is not dealt with in his judgment—namely, that paragraph (f) of clause 6 of the memorandum of association was beyond the powers of the company. [His lordship read clauses 5 and 6 of the memorandum, and clause 52 of the articles, and continued:] It was decided by this court in Ashbury v. Watson that when the memorandum of association of a company stated that the holders of a portion of its shares were to have a right to receive a preferential dividend, and there was no power to modify that provision contained in the memorandum, it was a condition which could not be altered by the company, regard being had to the provisions of section 12 of the Companies Act, 1862. By that decision I am bound, and I have no desire to depart from it. But how does it apply to the present case? It is said that these paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) of clause 6 define the rights of the shareholders and constitute "conditions" within the meaning of the decision in Ashbury v. Watson, and so they do. Then it is said that effect is not to be given to paragraph (f) in the same clause. There I part company with the argument. Clause 6 provides that the rights mentioned shall be attached to the shares "subject as hereinafter provided," and if paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) are conditions within the meaning of the decision in Ashbury v. Watson, paragraph (f) is equally a condition within the meaning of that decision and of section 12 of the Companies Act, 1862. The same document which confers a preference on one class of shares contains also provisions which make the rights and privileges of the preference shareholders capable of alteration, and unless it can be established that such a stipulation is forbidden by law, effect must be given to it as well as to the conditions contained in paragraphs (a), (b), and (c).

Then how is it made out that this provision contained in paragraph (f) is forbidden by law? There is certainly no decision to that effect. No provision has been pointed out in the Companies Act which says that that shall not be done. But it is said that you could not insert such a clause with reference to the objects for which the company is to be established.

I agree that in that case such a clause would be invalid, but why? Section 8 of the Act of 1862 specifically provides that the memorandum of association shall contain certain things, and, amongst others, the objects for which the company is to be established. That is a provision of the Act which must be complied with in substance and not merely in form. A memorandum which contained a provision that the object of the company should be such as the company might from time to time in general meeting determine, would not be a compliance with section 8. Again, if the memorandum provided that the objects of the company should be specified objects numbered (a), (b), (c), and so on on to the end of the alphabet, and then wound up with a general clause, "and such other objects as the company may in general meeting determine," that, as it seems to me, would equally fail to comply with the requirements of the statute, and for that reason would be invalid. But the Legislature has not thought fit to require that the company shall in its memorandum state definitely anything as to the priorities of the different classes of shares into which the capital may be divided. All that section 8 requires to be stated with regard to the capital is the amount of capital with which the company proposes to be registered divided into shares of a certain fixed amount, and that requirement is satisfied by clause 5 of the memorandum in the present case.

In these circumstances it seems to me that there is nothing which entitles the court to say that such a clause as paragraph (f) of clause 6 is forbidden by law, and in fact I think that if we were so to hold we should be departing from what was laid down by this court in Andrews v. Gas Meter Co. There the memorandum stated that the nominal capital of the company was "£60,000, divided into 600 shares of £100 each, every share being sub-divisible into fifths, with power to increase the capital as provided by the articles of association." The company issued preference shares in accordance with the articles of association, which were altered for that purpose, and it was held that that was valid. Lindley, L.J., in giving the judgment of the court after referring to Harrison v. Mexican Railway Co., 23 W. R. 403, L. R. 19 Eq. 358, before Jessel, M.R., and In re South Durham Brewery Co., 34 W. R. 126, 31 Ch. D. 261, and In re Bridgwater Navigation Co., 36 W. R. 769, 39 Ch. D. 1, both before the Court of Appeal, said: "These decisions turned upon the principle that although by section 8 of the Act the memorandum is to state the amount of the original capital and the number of shares into which it is to be divided, yet in other respects the rights of the shareholders in respect of their shares, and the terms on which additional capital may be raised, are matters to be regulated by the articles of association rather than by the memorandum, and are therefore matters which (unless provided for by the memorandum as in Ashbury v. Watson) may be determined by the company from time to time by special resolutions pursuant to section 50 of the Act."

Now, that principle seems to me to apply here, for the rights of the various classes of shareholders are by the memorandum of association made subject to alteration by reference to the articles of association. On these grounds I think that the point which was raised for the appellants ought not to prevail; and in other respects I agree with the judgment of Buckley, J.

The only point which strikes me with regard to the fairness of the arrangement is this, that at first sight it does seem as if the rights of the preference shareholders had been somewhat seriously trenched upon. But when we find such a clause in the articles of association as clause 52, and moreover, that these alterations in the rights of the various classes of shareholders have been considered first of all by a committee consisting of business men chosen by the shareholders themselves, and that they have subsequently been sanctioned by large majorities at the various meetings of shareholders which have been held, it would require a very strong case to induce this court to interfere. I entirely agree with what has been said both by Buckley, J., and by this court on the present occasion that in all these cases the court is not under an obligation to confirm any scheme for reduction by whatever majorities it may be sanctioned, but has a discretion which it is bound to exercise in a proper case, but at the same time, in exercising that discretion, when we find that the determination of such matters as variations in the rights attached to different classes of shareholders has by the constitution of the company been left to the decision of the shareholders themselves, the court ought to be very careful how it interferes with the bonâ fide judgment of business men on a matter of business in which they themselves are largely interested. It has been suggested that the shareholders voted under the influence of a statement made in a circular issued by the directors, that if this course were not adopted the payment of dividends would be indefinitely postponed. But when we find that by clause 123 of the articles of association it is left to the committee to determine what amount shall be distributed amongst the members by way of dividend, and that by clause 124 no larger dividend shall be declared than is recommended by the directors, and we also find that the directors have taken the view that in the present state of the authorities it would be unwise for them to act upon some cases—such as Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Co., 37 W. R. 321, 41 Ch. D. 1, and Verner v. General and Commercial Trust, [1894] 2 Ch. 239, which, though they are binding on this court, have not received finally the sanction of the House of Lords, and, as appears from what was said in Dovey v. Cory, 50 W. R. 65, [1901] A. C. 477, may in any event require great care in their application—it seems to me impossible to say that that statement in the circular was such a departure from the law as to compel us to hold that the sanction of the shareholders was obtained unfairly. I think it was a matter which might reasonably and properly be taken into consideration by those to whom the circular was addressed. I agree with what was said by Buckley, J., and I think, therefore, that the appeal fails.

Solicitors, Ashurst, Morris, Crisp, & Co; Francis & Johnson.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. | Byrne, J. | Jan. 26.

In re ARTIZANS LAND AND MORTGAGE CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Arrears of dividends—Sums due as return of capital in pursuance of reduction of capital—Statute of Limitations—Specialty or simple contract debts.

The right of a shareholder in a limited company to sue for dividends on ordinary shares in arrear for more than six years, but less than twenty years, is not barred by the Statute of Limitations, as such arrears are in the nature of specialty, and not simple contract, debts. The same principle applies to sums due for capital returnable to the shareholders in pursuance of a resolution for reduction of capital sanctioned by the court.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a summons by the liquidators in the voluntary winding up of the above company for the direction of the court as to matters arising in the distribution of the assets of the company.

The company was incorporated in 1892 under the Companies Acts as a limited company, with a capital of £187,500 divided into 187,500 shares of £1 each.

By special resolution passed in May, and confirmed in June, 1893, it was resolved that the capital should be reduced from the above amount to £93,750, divided into 187,500 shares of 10s. each, and that the reduction should be effected by making a return to the shareholders of 10s. per share. This resolution was confirmed by order of the court in August, 1893.

In pursuance of this resolution the directors of the company in June and July, 1893, forwarded circulars to the shareholders informing them of the order of the court for the reduction of capital, and that the amount of capital which they were entitled to have returned would be paid to them upon their lodging their share certificates with the company.

A second number of circulars was issued in October and November of the same year calling the attention of the shareholders to the former circular, and asking them to lodge their certificates with the company.

All the shareholders who communicated with the company in response to these circulars had the 10s. in respect of each of their shares returned to them. A considerable number, however, did not send in any claims either then or later.

A special resolution was passed in April, and confirmed in May, 1903, to wind up the company voluntarily, and three persons were appointed joint liquidators.

The unreturned money to which the shareholders would have been entitled if they had lodged their certificates amounted to £940.

The liquidators took out this summons in the winding up for a declaration that the claims to the return of 10s. per share of the shareholders who had not been paid were barred by the Statute of Limitations; and also that the claims of all persons in whose favour dividend warrants upon the shares were issued more than six years before the commencement of the winding up were barred in the same way.

The respondent Lamb had been appointed by an order of the court to represent the former class of shareholders, the respondent Gill the latter class.

Whinney, for the liquidators.—The return of the capital was sanctioned under the authority of the British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399, 414. Immediately upon the resolution of June, 1893, being sanctioned the shareholders became entitled to sue for the capital which was to be returned to them: Dalton v. The Midland Counties Railway Co., 13 Com. Bench 474; Moore v. Garwood, 4 Exch. 681; Johnson v. Goslett, 4 W. R. 655, 25 L. J. C. P. 274. The shareholders having omitted to sue for more than six years are barred by the statute. This is settled law as regards dividends where more than twenty years have run: In re The Severn and Wye and Severn Bridge Railway Co., 44 W. R. 347, [1896] 1 Ch. 559. The capital sums due to be returned, but unpaid, stand upon the same footing. These are simple contract and not specialty debts. The special resolution is not under seal. Section 16 of the Companies Act, 1862, only makes these articles of association binding as a deed upon the members, not upon the company. The company are not bound by any trust as regards these sums which would prevent the time running under the statute: Moseley v. Cressey's Co., 14 W. R. 246. L. R. 1 Eq. 405, Christian, L J., in Smith v. The Cork and Bandon Railway Co., Irish Reps., 5 Eq. 65. That case, however, and also In re The Drogheda Steam Packet Co. (Limited), L. R. Ir., [1903] 1 Ch. D. 512, are distinguishable from this case as regards the length of time during which the shareholder can sue, as in those cases there were certificates issued under the seals of the companies.

H. Greenwood, for the respondents.—The resolution and the circulars to the shareholders constituted an appropriation for the shareholders of the moneys to be returned, and created a trust to which the Statute of Limitations does not apply. A company is a statutory partnership, and the statute does not apply during its continuance: Kay, J., in Barton v. The North Staffordshire Railway Co., 36 W. R. 754, 38 Ch. D., p. 463. In Dalton v. The Midland Counties Railway Co. and Smith v. The Cork and Bandon Railway Co. the right of the shareholder arose out of a contractual relation. Here the question is really one of administration of the assets of the company. The shareholders represented by Mr. Lamb have paid 20s. for their shares and received nothing back, and they must be dealt with on that footing in the distribution of assets: In re The Wakefield Rolling Stock Co., 40 W. R. 700, [1892] 3 Ch. 165. As regards the unpaid dividends, the case of In re The Severn and Wye and Severn Bridge Railway Co. is not the same as this case, as there was in that case no notice given to the shareholders of part of the assets being set aside for them. In any case, the claims of the shareholders are specialty rights, and are therefore not barred: In re The Drogheda Steam Packet Co. (Limited) and In re The Cornwall Minerals Railway Co., 46 W. R. 5, [1897] 2 Ch. 74.

BYRNE, J.—I will first consider the question of the unclaimed dividends. I think that the authorities are clear that as regards them the statutory period is twenty years, and that consequently there is no right to deal with these dividends now otherwise than by paying them to the persons in whose favour they have been declared. Amongst other cases I have been referred to, the case in the Irish Court of Appeal of Smith v. The Cork and Bandon Railway Co., where the company had declared a dividend in favour of its shareholders without providing for its preference shareholders whose dividends were more than six years in arrear. Two points were dealt with, one as to the statutory period of limitation, the other as to whether the company were in the position of trustees so as to prevent the statutory time running. The opinion of the court was that there was no such relationship between the company and its shareholders. Incidentally also it was stated that the period of limitation was twenty years. In In re The Severn and Wye and Severn Bridge Railway Co., Romer, J., dealing with a case of a declaration of dividends upon ordinary shares, held that upon the declaration a debt became payable to each shareholder in respect of his dividend for which he could sue at law. Here again the learned judge had not to decide, and did not decide, whether the statutory period was or not twenty years, but he did decide that the company was not a trustee. The latest case to which I have been referred is the Irish case of In re Drogheda Steam Packet Co., where dividends on ordinary shares had been declared more than six and less than twenty years before they were claimed by the shareholders, and it was held that the share certificates constituted a specialty debt recoverable after six years. The Master of the Rolls, after referring to Smith v. The Cork and Bandon Railway Co., says (L. R. Ir., [1903] 1 Ch. D., p. 516), "Then is there a distinction in the case of an ordinary shareholder? The dividends in each case are payable out of the same fund but the preference shareholders come first." These cases, although not in strictness binding upon me, are guiding authorities upon the question. The only distinction that can be suggested between those cases and the one before me is that whereas in the case of preference shareholders there is usually a statement on the share certificates that the shareholders are entitled to a certain dividend, and whereas in Smith v. The Cork and Bandon Railway Co. there was upon the certificate a statement to that effect, in the case of ordinary shareholders the certificates only refer to the rules and regulations of the company. That distinction cannot be relied upon.

I now come to the question of the return of the capital. I cannot distinguish between this fund and that of the undrawn dividends in respect of the statutory period. They stand upon the same footing. In each case the claims depend upon rights arising out of the articles which are referred to in certificates under the seal of the company. I think that the same principle which applies to the unpaid dividends, applies also to the unpaid returns of capital, and that consequently the statutory period in each case is twenty years. This conclusion renders it unnecessary for me to consider whether or not the company holds the unpaid returns of capital as a trust fund for the shareholders who have not claimed. In any case this fund is not distributable now.

Solicitors, E. C. Rawlings & Butt.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Dec. 5.

In re GENERAL ACCIDENT ASSURANCE CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Mortgage security—Dissolution of company—Purchaser of assets—Vesting order—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 26, sub-section (ii.); s. 35, sub-section 1, clause (ii.) (c); and s. 36.

Where a company entitled to a mortgage debt and to leasehold premises comprised in the mortgage has been dissolved under section 143 of the Companies Act, 1862, a purchaser from the company can, under the Trustee Act, 1893, obtain an order vesting in him the right to sue and recover the mortgage debt, and vesting in him the leasehold premises comprised in the mortgage.

Petition.

This was a petition by the General Accident Assurance Corporation (Limited), asking that an order might be made under sections 26 and 35 of the Trustee Act, 1893, vesting in them a mortgage debt and certain leasehold premises.

On the 13th of April, 1899, McPherson assigned certain premises in Cable-road, Hoylake, by way of mortgage to the Scottish General Fire Insurance Corporation (Limited) (hereafter called the corporation), for the unexpired residue of a term of ninety-nine years, to secure the repayment with interest of a sum of £300.

By an agreement dated the 10th of May, 1900, it was agreed that the General Accident Corporation (Limited) (hereinafter called the purchasing company) should take over the business, property, and assets of the corporation as a going concern. The contract provided that the corporation should go into voluntary liquidation with the object of carrying the sale into effect, that the corporation or its liquidator should execute and deliver to the purchasing company all such deeds, transfers, and assurances as should be required for vesting in the purchasing company the business, property, and assets, and that until such vesting was completed the corporation should stand possessed of the same in trust for the purchasing company.

In May, 1900, the corporation went into voluntary liquidation, and all the business, property, and assets of the corporation, including the mortgage of the 13th of April, 1899, were made over to the purchasing company.

On the 13th of December, 1901, the final accounts and report of the liquidator were filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, and the corporation was dissolved on the 13th of March, 1902, in accordance with section 143 of the Companies Act, 1862.

No deed transferring the mortgage of the 13th of April, 1899, to the purchasing company was ever executed.

The petition of the purchasing company asked that an order might be made under sections 26 and 35 of the Trustee Act, 1893, vesting in them the mortgage debt and premises comprised in the deed of the 13th of April, 1899, for all the estate of the corporation therein.

The Trustee Act, 1893, provides: Section 26. "In any of the following cases—namely, . . . (ii.) Where a trustee entitled to or possessed of any land, or entitled to a contingent right therein, either solely or jointly with any other person . . . (c) cannot be found . . . the High Court may make an order (in this Act called a vesting order) vesting the land in any such person in any such manner and for any such estate as the court may direct, or releasing or disposing of the contingent right to such person as the court may direct."

Section 35, sub-section 1. "In any of the following cases—namely, (ii.) Where a trustee entitled, alone or jointly with another person, to a chose in action . . . (c) cannot be found . . . the High Court may make an order vesting the right to . . . sue for or recover a chose in action in any such person as the court may appoint."

G. Cave, for the petitioner, contended that this was a case where the "trustee cannot be found" within the meaning of sub-section (ii.) (c) of section 26 and section 35 of the Trustee Act, 1893, and that under section 36 of the Act any party interested in a mortgage can apply for a vesting order.

T. B. Napier, for the mortgagor, supported the application.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: I think the case falls within the purview of the sections, and I will make an order vesting in the petitioners the right to sue for and recover the mortgage debt, and also vesting in them the leasehold premises comprised in the mortgage of the 13th of April, 1899, for such estate and interest as was vested in the corporation at the date of its dissolution.

Solicitors, Smiles & Co., for H. G. C. Day, Liverpool.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } Dec. 9, 10.

CAVENDISH v. STRUTT. (a.).

Practice—Costs—Taxation—Party and party—Refresher fees—Discretion—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, rr. 8, 27 (29) (48).

In a taxation of costs between party and party the taxing-master has a discretion to allow the payment of refresher fees in excess of those prescribed by ord. 65, r. 27 (48).

In re Ermen, 51 W. R. 475, [1903] 2 Ch. 156, and Stewart & Co. v. Weber, 19 Times L. R. 722, followed.

Summons to review taxation.

The plaintiff brought an action to set aside a voluntary settlement made by him, of which the defendants Charles Henry Strutt and Alfred Washington Ranger were the trustees.

After a long hearing Byrne, J., set aside the settlement, and ordered the defendants Strutt and Ranger to pay to the plaintiff and to certain other defendants their costs of the action, such costs to be taxed by the taxing-master.

The taxing-master having taxed off certain items, the plaintiff carried in objections to the taxation under three heads, two of which were not pressed at the hearing of the present summons.

The third related to the disallowance of the amount by which the refresher fees actually paid to counsel exceeded the maxima set forth in ord. 65, r. 27 (48). The objection was that, having regard to the length of the trial, and the peculiar circumstances of the case, these maxima were wholly inadequate. The taxing-master, however, while agreeing with this contention on its merits, considered that he had no discretion to allow larger fees, and disallowed the objection.

The plaintiff took out a summons to review this decision.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Mark Romer, for the plaintiff.—Ord. 65, r. 8, provides that solicitors shall be allowed the fees in App. N, "and no higher fees shall be allowed in any case, except such as are by this order otherwise provided for." Rule 27 (48) of the same order lays down certain maximum fees for refreshers which are to be adhered to in all cases of party and party taxation. Rule 27 (29), which came into operation in January, 1902, provides that, on every taxation, the master shall allow all costs necessary for defending the rights of any party, except where the costs are incurred through over-caution, negligence, or mistake, or by payment of special fees to counsel, or special charges or expenses to witnesses or other persons, or by other unusual expenses. That sub-rule has been held to create a general exception within rule 8, and to make all allowances in App. N. discretionary: McIver v. Tate Steamers (Limited), 50 W. R. 642, [1902] 2 K. B. 184; In re Ermen, 51 W. R. 475, [1903] 2 Ch. 156. By parity of reasoning, the master has a discretion to exceed the maxima for refresher fees provided by rule 27 (48). Kennedy, J., decided the exact point in our favour in Stewart & Co. v. Weber, 19 Times L. R. 722.

Sargant, for the defendants Strutt and Ranger.—On the construction of rule 27 (48) it is clear, from the decision in In re Harrison, 33 Ch. D. 52, and the proviso at the end of the sub-rule, which was inserted in consequence of that decision, that, in a party and party taxation, the master has no discretion to allow refreshers exceeding the maxima there laid down. The Rules of the Supreme Court are to be construed like statutes, and the principle of Seward v. Vera Cruz, 33 W. R. 477, 10 A. C. 59, 68, that subsequent general legislation does not necessarily repeal antecedent special legislation, is to be applied. Rule 8 is general legislation, applying to the bulk of taxable items. Rule 27 (48) is special legislation, applying only to refreshers. Rule 27 (29), being subsequent general legislation, applies only to the general matters dealt with in rule 8, and does not touch rule 27 (48). This construction is aided by the circumstance that the wording of rule 27 (29) is inapplicable to refreshers; for it cannot be said that refreshers in excess of the maxima set forth in rule 27 (48) are "necessary or proper for the attainment of justice, or for defending the rights of any party." McIver v. Tate Steamers (Limited) and In re Ermen are inapplicable to the present case. Even if rule 27 (29) does apply to refreshers, it leaves the matter where it stood before; for refreshers in excess of the maxima are unusual fees: In re Harrison. They are, therefore, special fees within the negative words of rule 27 (29), and cannot be allowed. These considerations were not presented to the court in Stewart & Co. v. Weber, and that decision ought not to be followed.

BUCKLEY, J., after referring to the two objections which were not argued, continued: The question I have to decide is whether on a taxation of costs between party and party, the taxing-master has under the rules as they now stand, a discretion to allow a refresher fee in excess of the maximum fee allowed by ord. 65, r. 27 (48). The language of that sub-rule is that the taxing officer "may allow" fees of certain amounts. The rule has no negative words; it does not provide that he shall not allow more. On its true construction, however, I think that to be its effect. In In re Harrison (at p. 69), Cotton, L.J., after expressing a doubt, said that the rule must be read as restricting the fees. That case was decided before the proviso now at the end of the sub-rule was inserted. The history of that proviso is as follows. In In re Harrison the question was raised whether in a taxation between solicitor and client the limit imposed by sub-rule 48 applied. The Court of Appeal held that it did apply. The proviso was introduced to give the taxing-master a discretion to allow a larger taxation as between solicitor and client. The discretion was not then extended to taxation as between party and party.

I start, therefore, with the proposition that sub-rule 48 is to be read as if it provided that in a party and party taxation the taxing-master may allow by way of refresher so much and no more. The question then arises whether the new sub-rule 29 has given the taxing master a further discretion to go beyond the limits of sub-rule 48, in a taxation between party and party. In my opinion it has. It was decided in the Court of Appeal in McIver & Co. (Limited) v. Tate Steamers (Limited) that where the case is one to which ord. 65, r. 8 applies the master has a discretion to make an allowance in respect of a solicitor's attendance in excess of the maximum allowance for such attendance specified in Appendix N to order 65, No. 147. Rule 8 does, whereas sub-rule 48 does not, contain negative words—"and no higher fees shall be allowed in any case." These words are controlled by the exception—"except such as are by this order otherwise provided for." The Court of Appeal rested their decision, not on the words of the exception, but on the conclusion they arrived at, that sub-rule 29 gave the taxing-master on every taxation a discretion to allow such costs as appeared to him to be necessary or proper within the language of the sub-rule. Sub-rule 48 does not contain negative words of prohibition of a higher fee than the maximum, with a qualification superimposed upon those words; but except on this ground the present case is not distinguishable from McIver & Co. (Limited) v. Tate Steamers (Limited).

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In construing the rules. I must read them as a whole. So reading them. I find that sub-rule 29 qualifies sub-rule 48, and gives the taxing-master a discretion as to allowing fees under sub-rule 48 which he did not previously possess. The old sub-rule 29 applied to party and party taxation, and was in a negative form. It said that, "as to costs to be paid or borne by another party, no costs are to be allowed which do not appear to the taxing officer to have been necessary or proper"; whereas the new sub-rule 29 applies to every case of taxation, and is in an affirmative form. The Rule Committee struck out the old rule and substituted the new one. I am bound to hold that they did that deliberately, with a view to adding to the power of the taxing-master. The taxing-master says that if this construction of the rule is adopted, it will tend to abolish the distinction between solicitor and client and party and party costs. I do not think so. Sub-rule 29 consists of two parts. The first sentence, which is general, applies to every taxation; the taxing-master is to allow "all such costs, charges, and expenses, as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party." The second part applies only to taxation as between party and party: it says, "but, save as against the party who incurred the same, no costs shall be allowed which appear to the taxing-master to have been incurred or increased through overcaution, negligence, or mistake, or by payment of special fees to counsel, or special charges or expenses to witnesses or other persons, or by other unusual expenses." That is to say, as against the party who incurred the same, costs are to be treated as between solicitor and client, and then considerations would apply different from those which obtain in a case where the taxation is between party and party. The result is that in party and party taxations there is created a new discretion in the taxing-master, limited by the language used in sub-rule 29; by that I mean this limitation is imposed on him, that he must find the higher amount which he allows to be necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party. If the taxation is between solicitor and client, he is not thus bound. He may then allow "costs incurred or increased by payment of special fees to counsel, or special charges or expenses to witnesses," which he is not to allow in a taxation as between party and party. The latter part of the sub-rule includes what is called a "special fee" paid to counsel who only undertook to appear on being paid fees larger than they were usually paid, but it is not limited to that. "Special fees" are equivalent to extraordinary or unduly generous fees, which would not be allowed in a taxation as between solicitor and client paid to a particular counsel, which owing to his position are large. The discrimination was not between the fees which were mentioned in Appendix N and the refresher fees which were mentioned in sub-rule 48, but between fees which are necessary or proper in the one case and fees which are unusual, extraordinary, or due to the eminence of counsel in the other.

Mr. Sargant has pressed this argument upon me, that I ought to regard this as a case where there has been special legislation in detail, and subsequent general legislation, and as one which falls within the principle laid down in Seward v. Vera Cruz, "that where there are general words in a later Act capable of reasonable and sensible application without extending them to subjects specially dealt with by earlier legislation, you are not to hold that earlier and special legislation indirectly repealed, altered, or derogated from, merely by force of such general words." That is not a proper principle to apply to this class of case. These rules have introduced into them from time to time alterations and variations. Each time the rules are altered it is the recasting of a general body of rules, in the construction of which, when altered, you have to make up your mind as to what is the effect of the rules considered as a whole.

The second argument of Mr. Sargant is that, assuming sub-rule 29 to apply to sub-rule 48, it leaves the question of refresher fees where it stood before. He says that sub-rule 48 gives the maxima which may be allowed as refresher fees, and sub-rule 29 provides at the end that in a party and party taxation special fees shall not be allowed. I have already dealt with that question. The special fee there mentioned is an unusual or extraordinary fee, and is not a larger fee than would otherwise be given for the attainment of justice. Sub-rule 29 empowers the taxing-master to go beyond the maximum stated in sub-rule 48, for the purpose, not of enabling him in a party and party taxation to allow refreshers which would be unusual or extraordinary, but only such as would be "necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of a party." Having regard to the counsel employed, it is for the master to consider what is a reasonable fee. In In re Ermen, Farwell, J., and in Stewart v. Weber & Co., Kennedy, J., decided the question in the same way as I have done. The latter case is indeed on all fours with the present case, and I might have followed it without adding anything; but, having regard to the importance of the question, I have thought it best to give my own reasons. I allow the objection, and send back the matter to the taxing-master to exercise his discretion as to what are reasonable fees to be allowed to the plaintiff's counsel as refreshers.

Solicitors, Ranger & Co.; Charles Everett.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Feb. 4.

In re WIMBORNE (BARON) AND THE VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT, 1874. (a.)

Settled land—Settlement by will—Power to jointure and raise portions—Re-settlement—Life estate assigned—Compound settlement—Sale by tenant for life under original settlement—Power of trustees of original settlement to give discharge for purchase-money—Settled Land Acts, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 50, and 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 4.

Where, in consequence of re-settlement, lands are subject to a compound settlement, but the original settlement is still subsisting, a tenant for life who has parted with his beneficial interest and whose life estate under the original settlement has not been restored, can exercise his statutory power of sale under the original settlement, and the trustees thereof can give a valid discharge for the purchase-money.

In re Cornwallis-West and Munro's Contract, 51 W. R. 602, [1903] 2 Ch. 150, distinguished.

This was a summons by a purchaser for the determination of a question arising under the following circumstances:

Under the will of Sir Josiah Guest, who died in 1852, certain freeholds, and amongst them the Fifehead estate, in the county of Dorset, which had been purchased out of residuary personalty, according to directions in the will, stood limited to the use of the testator's eldest son, now Lord Wimborne, for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons in tail male; and the will gave to Lord Wimborne powers of jointuring and of raising portions for his younger children.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A re-settlement of the Fifehead estate (inter alia) was made by two deeds respectively dated the 17th and 19th of January, 1895, and executed by Lord Wimborne and his eldest son, the Hon. Ivor Guest. By this re-settlement the Fifehead estate was assured, discharged from the estate tail of the son, but subject to the said jointure and portions charges, to such uses as Lord Wimborne and Mr. Guest should appoint, and in default of and until such appointment to certain uses to secure a rent-charge of £1,500 to Mr. Guest, and subject thereto to the use of Lord Wimborne during his life in restoration and confirmation of the estate for life limited to him by the said will, and from and after his death to certain uses for raising money to pay estate duties, and subject thereto to the use of Mr. Guest for life with remainders over in strict settlement.

By a deed of the 20th of July, 1895, Mr. Guest released his rent-charge of £1,500, and Lord Wimborne, as to his life estate, granted the Fifehead estate to the use of Mr. Guest, his heirs and assigns.

By a deed dated the 20th of March, 1899, Lord Wimborne and Mr. Guest, in exercise of the power contained in the deed of the 19th of January, 1895, appointed the Fifehead estate to such uses as would be subsisting under the re-settlement if Lord Wimborne were then dead.

Lord Wimborne subsequently entered into a contract, with the concurrence of the Hon. Ivor Guest, for the sale of the Fifehead estate to the present purchaser, and gave notice of the sale to the present trustees of Sir Josiah Guest's will, to whom it was proposed that the purchase-money should be paid.

The purchaser objected that the trustees, even if they were trustees of the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, could not give a valid discharge for the purchase-money, since they were not trustees of the compound settlement, consisting of the will, the re-settlement, and the other indentures above mentioned; and he took out this summons to determine the question.

Vernon Smith, K.C., and G. J. Duncan, for the applicant, relied on In re Cornwallis-West and Munro's Contract, 51 W. R. 602, [1903] 2 Ch. 150, and also cited In re Du Cane and Nettlefold's Contract, 46 W. R. 523, [1898] 2 Ch. 96, and In re Mundy and Roper's Contract, 47 W. R. 226, [1899] 1 Ch. 275.

J. G. Wood, for the respondent.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The facts in this case are not in dispute. By the will of the original testator, Sir Josiah Guest, certain lands stood limited, in the events which have happened, to the use of the testator's eldest son, now Lord Wimborne, for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, and there was power to Lord Wimborne to jointure and raise portions for his younger children.

Lord Wimborne and his eldest son have since disentailed and re-settled the property and by two deeds dated respectively in 1895 and 1899 Lord Wimborne has parted with his life estate in favour of his son. The result of the re-settlement is that the lands still stand limited to persons in succession, and there are a jointure and portions which still remain to be raised.

The lands comprised in this contract were not part of the original estate of the testator, but were acquired out of his residuary estate and stood limited to the same uses as the land devised by his will, with one small exception not material to be mentioned.

The question is: Can the trustees of the original settlement created by the will give a good receipt for the purchase-money, or is it essential for trustees to be appointed of the compound settlement consisting of the will and re-settlement and other instruments.

Now it seems to me clear from the decisions in In re Mundy and Roper's Contract and In re Du Cane and Nettlefold's Contract that there may be subsisting side by side an original and a compound settlement, and the mere fact that a tenant for life has parted with the whole of the beneficial interest does not prevent his exercising his statutory powers as tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts.

It is quite clear that the original settlement created by the will is still subsisting by reason of the jointure and portions charges, and by the decision of the Court of Appeal the existence of those charges makes the land settled land as limited to persons in succession. If that were all, it seems to me clear from the two cases referred to that the trustees can give a valid discharge and Lord Wimborne can exercise the powers of sale of a tenant for life.

But then it is said that this is contrary to the decision of Farwell, J., in In re Cornwallis-West and Munro's Contract, and I think the contention is put in this way, that where there is a compound settlement no persons can give a valid discharge but trustees of that settlement, although there may be trustees of the original settlement.

Now I do not think that that contention is supported by the case last named, because in the present case Lord Wimborne has entirely parted with his life estate and it has not been restored as in In re Cornwallis-West and Munro's Contract. Farwell, J., said: "It is sufficient for me to say that in my opinion the old life estate in this case has been restored—that is to say, that the life estate created by the will of Mrs. Whitby is still the life estate that is now in existence. . . . Having once arrived at this opinion, it seems to me clear that in the present case 'the settlement' within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890—the only settlement, in short, under which the vendor is able to exercise his statutory power of sale—must be the compound settlement." He based his conclusion on the fact that the old life estate had been restored, and it will be sufficient, in order to distinguish that case, to say that that feature does not exist in the present settlement. Counsel for the respondent suggested that the judge's real meaning was that where a tenant for life purported to sell under a re-settlement, his life estate having been restored, it was necessary, in order to make a title in that way, that trustees of the compound settlement should be appointed, and that he did not intend to decide that a title could not also be made under the original settlement. But, however that may be, it is immaterial for the present purpose, because Lord Wimborne has parted with his life estate but his statutory powers of a tenant for life still remain exerciseable.

Therefore I say that Lord Wimborne can still sell, and that the trustees of the original settlement created by the will can give a valid discharge for the purchase-money.

A question, however, has arisen as to whether they are trustees of the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts in respect of the Fifehead estate, and so it may be better to re-appoint them as such—the summons being amended by intituling it in the matter of the Settled Land Acts as well as of the Vendor and Purchaser Act.

Solicitors, Thrupp, Chidell, & Sharp; Bircham & Co.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Buckley, J.) — Feb. 29.

In re ROWE.
Ex parte DERENBURG & CO. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Withdrawal—Substitution of fresh proof—Payment by stranger—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), Schedule II., r. 22—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 225-229.

A creditor who has tendered a proof is entitled to withdraw it without leave of the court, so long as it has not been adjudicated upon by the trustee, and to substitute a fresh proof in its place. A creditor who has received a voluntary payment from a stranger in consideration of the fact that the creditor has sustained a loss by the acts of the bankrupt, is not obliged to give credit for the amount so received when proving his debt in the bankruptcy.

Appeal by creditors from the rejection of their proof by the trustee in bankruptcy.

The creditors, Messrs. Derenburg & Co., were stockbrokers, who had had large dealings with the bankrupt Rowe, and in January, 1903, at the date of the receiving order, they had lent to Rowe the sum of £20,368 upon the security of share certificates which were subsequently discovered to have been forged by him.

Rowe had been a partner in the firm of Bewick & Moreing, and that firm, though in no way liable for his criminal acts, sent Derenburg & Co. a cheque for £6 500 on the 3rd of June, 1903, accompanied by a letter in the following terms: "Although you admit that we are not liable, we have pleasure in sending you £6,500. This we understand will cover all the losses you have sustained except those for which you hold an insurance policy."

On the 3rd of July Derenburg & Co. presented a proof for £13,868 against Rowe's estate, giving credit for the £6,500 they had received from Bewick & Moreing. Some correspondence with the trustee ensued with reference to this proof, and it appeared from the file that it was not formally admitted until the 1st of December. Meanwhile, Derenburg & Co. were advised that Bewick & Moreing would find a difficulty in proving for the £6,500, but that they themselves were entitled to prove for the full amount of their debt without giving credit for that sum. They therefore on the 6th of November sent in a fresh proof for £20,368, and asked that it should be substituted for the earlier proof for £13,868.

On the 7th of November the trustee wrote refusing to consider their fresh proof, and he ultimately rejected it.

On the 1st of January, 1904, the trustee filed the earlier proof with a note upon it that he had admitted it in full upon the 1st of December, 1903.

The later proof was rejected on two grounds—firstly that the creditors were not entitled to withdraw the first proof and substitute another without leave of the court; secondly, that they were bound to give credit for the £6,500.

Derenburg & Co. appealed.

Reed, K.C., and Bannerman, for the appellants.—The trustee was wrong on both grounds of rejection. A creditor who has lodged a proof is entitled to withdraw it so long as it has not been adjudicated upon, and to substitute a fresh proof: In re Rhoades, Ex parte Rhoades. 47 W. R. 561, [1899] 1 K. B. 905; In re Mateo Clarke, Ex parte Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway Co., 49 W. R. 528, [1901] 1 K. B. 655. As to the second ground, the creditors are not obliged to give credit for a payment made by a stranger. A debtor cannot plead payment by a stranger unless made at his request and on his behalf, and the trustee in his bankruptcy is in no better position: Kemp v. Balls, 18 Ex. 607, 3 W. R. Dig. 146; James v. Isaacs, 12 C. B. 791; Lucas v. Wilkinson, 5 W. R. 197, 1 H. & N. 420. To justify a plea of payment by a stranger the payment must be for and on account of the debt, and must be subsequently ratified by the debtor: Belshaw v. Bush, 11 C. B. 191. Here there was a mere voluntary payment, not on account of the debt, nor ratified by the debtor.

Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee.—As to the first point, the trustee not having rejected the proof within the twenty-eight days limited for that purpose by rule 228 must be deemed to have admitted it, and the creditor should not be allowed to withdraw it without leave. A creditor has no inherent right to amend his proof. The court can always exercise its discretion to prevent his doing so: In re Safety Explosives (Limited), [1904] 1 Ch. 226; Ex parte Vaughan, In re Dodds, 39 W. R. 125, 25 Q. B. D. 529; Ex parte Seaton, In re Deerhurst (No. 2), 8 Morr. 258. As to the second point, if this payment was made on account of the loss expected to arise from the nature of the debt, it was a payment on account of the debt. The amount was in fact ascertained by reference to the amount of the debt. The case resembles Ex parte Holland, In re Rogers, 8 Morr. 243.

Reed, K.C., replied.

BUCKLEY, J.—In this case the first point taken by the trustee is that the first proof not having been rejected within the twenty-eight days limited by rule 228, it must be deemed to have been admitted, and could not be withdrawn without the leave of the court. Rule 229, however, seems to me to contemplate some notice of admission being given to the creditor, and I think that the creditors in this case, not having received any notice, were entitled to take the view that their first proof had not been adjudicated upon, as was the fact, and to withdraw it and present a fresh proof.

As to the second point, I do not think that this was the case of a stranger offering part of a debt; the payment in question was not tendered or accepted as part of the debt, it was made in consideration of the fact that the creditors had sustained loss by the acts of a person for whom Bewick & Moreing considered themselves to some extent morally responsible.

It was a voluntary payment made not on account of the debt, but in consideration of the debt turning out a loss in consequence of the debtor's estate being unable to meet it. The proof must therefore be admitted for the full amount of the debt.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, Cecil F. Dunn.

Solicitors for the trustee, Morley & Shirreff.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Dec. 18.

FITZSIMON v. MOSTYN. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Renewal of lease—"At the costs of the lessee"—Costs of arbitration to assess fine payable on renewal.

A lease contained a covenant by the lessor that he would at any time during the term "upon the request and at the costs of the lessee," and on payment of a fine calculated upon the number of years of the term which had expired and the full improved annual value of the premises at the time of the renewal (such value to be determined by the lessor's surveyor or at the option of the lessee by the award of two referees or their umpire), renew the term. The lessee required the lessor to renew the term, and gave notice of his desire to have the full improved annual value of the premises determined by the award of two referees or their umpire.

Held, that the costs of the reference and award must be paid by the lessee.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 257, [1903] 1 K. B. 349) affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of Wright, J., on a special case stated by an umpire under section 7 (b) of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

The facts are given at length in the court below. Shortly they are as follows:

The appellant was the assignee of two leases of land at Llandudno granted by the respondent's predecessors in title. The leases contained a covenant "that the lessors, their heirs or assigns, will at any time during the said term, upon the request, and at the costs of the lessee his executors and administrators or assigns, and on payment by him or them of a fine calculated according to the table hereunder written upon the number of years of the said term which have expired, and the full improved annual value of the premises at the time of such renewal (such value to be determined by the said surveyor, or at the option of the lessee, by the award of two referees or their umpire), renew. or cause to be renewed, the said term for a further term . . . at the like rent and subject to the like covenants and conditions as are herein reserved and contained, including this present covenant for renewal."

The appellant, in 1900, applied to Lord Mostyn for a renewal of the terms. Differences having arisen as to the amount of fines payable on renewal, the appellant gave notice to the respondent of his desire to have the full improved annual value of the premises determined by arbitration. Arbitrators and an umpire were appointed, and the question was raised before the umpire whether he had any power to deal with the costs of the reference and award.

The Court of Appeal held that the costs of renewal included the costs of the reference and award.

Haldane, K.C., and Marshall, K.C. (E. P. Hewitt with them), for the appellant.

Montague Lush, K.C., and J. C. W. Madden, for the respondent, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case I am satisfied that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is entirely right; but I must add that I am not quite satisfied with some of the observations which were made by the learned judges, because it appears to me that we must construe these words as they stand. I do not know that we have anything to do with the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the landlord or the tenant; the question is upon what terms is the tenant to have his lease renewed. He is entitled by the language of the covenant to have his lease renewed on certain terms. At the commencement of everything the stipulation is that it is to be "at the costs of the lessee"; and the whole question here is, what is to be included in that word "costs"? I should have thought that Stirling, L.J.'s, observation decided the whole question—namely, those things that are necessarily incurred by reason of the renewal. The landlord is to be at no cost. Whether the landlord was unreasonable or not, seems to me to be immaterial; no such question arises here, and I would rather deprecate the discussion of it, because everybody admits here that there is nothing to be imputed to either side.

The reason why I make my protest is that I do not think, where there are plain words used in an instrument of this sort, you can give a different interpretation according to the state of the facts to which they are applied. If these were costs at all—other questions might of course arise where it was suggested that they were not included within the costs at all—but if these were costs at all, and therefore the words apply to them, it appears to me that we have nothing to do with the merits of the two parties, whether they were reasonable or unreasonable towards each other; the only question is, what is the true construction of these words? I think the Court of Appeal have arrived at the true construction of these words according to their plain and ordinary meaning; and therefore I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right, and I move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed.

Lord SHAND.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think the question is one simply of construction—namely, what is the meaning of the clause contained in this lease in regard to the expenses of renewal? I also think that Stirling, L.J., has put it in a sentence when he says, "What is to be renewed is the term, and it seems to me the fair and ordinary meaning of the language is that the lessee is to bear all the costs which are necessarily and properly incurred by the lessee for the purposes of the renewal." In the course of the renewal one of the parties—the lessee—was entitled to say whether the value should be fixed by the surveyor or by arbitration. If he had taken the surveyor, there might have been less costs incurred; but if an arbitration became necessary in consequence of questions between the parties, I think the expenses of that arbitration are costs which have been incurred for the purposes of the renewal.

For my own part, I should add that if a case arose in which the conduct of the lessor clearly caused much greater cost than was necessary for the renewal of the lease, it may be that, to the extent of such greater and unnecessary cost under the construction of the contract, the lessee would not be liable for such costs. But nothing of the kind has arisen here.

We have here simply costs which the parties contemplated would be incurred when they entered into this agreement, and I am satisfied that the learned judges were right in holding that these costs must fall upon the tenant.

Lord DAVEY.—I agree, and I have nothing to add.

Lord ROBERTSON.—If the appellant's argument is good about the costs of arbitration, it must be good also about the surveyor's fee where the value is fixed in that way; for the one mode is alternative to the other and at the option of the lessee. The operation to be performed by the surveyor or by the referees is fixing the rent that is to be put into the lease. I cannot bring myself to see how this is not part of the process of renewing the term.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord LINDLEY.—I also am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the attempt to construe this as a covenant to renew at the expense of the lessee and to cut down these expenses to what are called the ordinary expenses of renewal, and then to construe the rest of the clause as a distinct covenant to pay the fine, is not in accordance with the words used. The bargain evidently is, if the lessee wants renewal he is to ask for it; he is to pay for it, and to pay whatever is necessary in order to obtain it. I think it is too clear for argument.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Belfrage & Co., for Chamberlain & Johnson, Llandudno.

Solicitors for the respondent, Hulberts, Hussey, & Metcalfe.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 12.

THE KING v. PINCKNEY. (a.)

Practice—Habeas corpus—Person to whom directed out of jurisdiction—Power to issue writ.

The Court has no jurisdiction to issue a writ of habeas corpus directed to a person who is at the time out of the jurisdiction.

Ex parte Wyatt, 5 Dowl. 389, explained and distinguished.

Appeal from an order of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) affirming an order of Walton, J., at chambers.

On the 29th of July, 1903, Walton, J., made an order, upon the application of Philip John Pinckney, for a writ of habeas corpus to issue, directed to the applicant's wife, to bring the child of the marriage, between three and four years of age, before the judge at chambers. Mrs. Pinckney and the child were at this date and remained ever since abroad, out of the jurisdiction.

On the 5th of August, 1903, Walton, J., ordered the above-mentioned writ of habeas corpus to be quashed, and that instead thereof a fresh writ of habeas corpus should issue directed to Mrs. Pinckney to bring the child before the judge at chambers, and he directed that the writ should lie in the office until Mrs. Pinckney came within the jurisdiction. Upon appeal the Divisional Court affirmed this order.

Mrs. Pinckney appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C., and A. S. Poyser, for Mrs. Pinckney.—The applicant for a writ of habeas corpus must show that the person to whom it is directed is at the time within the jurisdiction. The foundation of the writ is the right of the sovereign to be informed why someone is being restrained of his liberty within the realm: Richard Bourn's case, Cro. Jac. 543. It is not a question between subject and subject. Formerly writs of habeas corpus could issue out of England into any colony or dominion of the Crown, but by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 20 this was put an end to, section 1 of which provided that no writ of habeas corpus should issue out of England into any colony or foreign dominion of the Crown where her Majesty had a lawfully-established court of justice having authority to grant and issue the writ, and to ensure the execution thereof. Wilmot, C.J.'s, Opinions and Judgments, at p. 83, show the principles upon which a writ of habeas corpus is granted, and both there and in Rex v. Cowle, 2 Burr. 834, at p. 856, the writ is likened in some respects to a writ of mandamus. The Court of King's Bench never allowed a prerogative writ of mandamus to issue unless the prosecutor showed that it would be effective. It was therefore never issued when the person to whom it was directed was out of the jurisdiction. It is admitted that a writ of habeas corpus cannot be served out of the jurisdiction. It cannot in such a case be made immediately effective, and therefore the court has no jurisdiction to issue it. The fundamental principle of the writ is that it must be made immediately effective. Rule 232 of the Crown Office Rules requires that every writ of habeas corpus must be made returnable immediately. The writ in the present case is not being used to inform the sovereign that some one is being wrongfully detained within the realm. The writ cannot be made use of for the purpose of punishing a person for having wrongfully parted with the custody of a child: Barnardo v. Ford, Gossage's case, 41 W. R. 333, [1892] A. C. 326. There was, therefore, no jurisdiction to issue the writ.

They also referred to Hobhouse's case, 3 B. & A. 420.

Colefax, for the prosecutor.—It is clear that the question of domicil has nothing to do with the jurisdiction of the court to issue a writ of habeas corpus, though it may have some bearing upon the subsequent question as to the proper custody of the child. Nor is the fact that the child is being detained out of the jurisdiction material: Barnardo v. Ford. Must, then, the person detaining the child be within the jurisdiction? It is submitted not. In Ex parte Wyatt, 5 Dowl. 389, a writ of habeas corpus was issued directed to a person who was then in France and who had the custody of a child, and it was served in France through the French courts. [COLLINS, M.R.—In that case the point was not taken, and somehow or other a writ of habeas corpus was obtained and served in France. An application was then made for a rule absolute in the first instance for an attachment for contempt in not obeying the writ, but it was refused by Patteson, J., and as it turned out that the respondent to the writ was at that time a prisoner for debt in the Marshalsea of the court, the learned judge offered to grant a new writ of habeas corpus, and this was accepted, and a new writ was granted. The case therefore came to nothing.] The point that there was no jurisdiction to issue the writ because Mrs. Pinckney was out of the jurisdiction was not taken before Walton, J.

COLLINS, M.R.—It seems to me that this writ of habeas corpus has been issued under a misapprehension. Some difficulty seems to have arisen in connection with the first writ, and the learned judge quashed it and ordered another writ to issue. Upon the evidence it is clear that Mrs. Pinckney was out of the jurisdiction at the time, and in these circumstances it has not been very strenuously contended on behalf of the prosecutor that there is jurisdiction to issue a writ of habeas corpus directed to a person out of the jurisdiction. It was suggested by the learned counsel that the point was not taken at chambers. But, even if that were so, it would not give the court jurisdiction to issue the writ if otherwise the court has no jurisdiction. In my opinion there is no jurisdiction to issue a writ of habeas corpus directed to a person who at the time is out of the jurisdiction.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Divisional Court seemed to think that there was no objection to the writ lying in the office until Mrs. Pinckney came within the jurisdiction, as is sometimes done in the case of writs of attachment. I think that there was no jurisdiction to issue the writ at all. It would be contrary to the whole spirit of the legislation on the subject if any interval were allowed to elapse between the issue of the writ and its execution. As rule 232 of the Crown Office Rules says, the writ must be made returnable immediately. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree entirely with the first part of the order of Walton, J. —namely, that part where he quashed the first writ of habeas corpus. The learned judge no doubt quashed it because he thought that he ought not to have issued it. With regard to the second order, in my opinion the learned judge had no jurisdiction to issue the writ. A writ of habeas corpus must be served immediately. I have never heard of a writ of habeas corpus being ordered to lie in the office after being issued. I should be sorry to throw any doubt upon the right of the subject to have the writ served at once.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

COLLINS, M.R.—I ought to add that I think that the case of Ex parte Wyatt has been sufficiently distinguished during the argument.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Futvoye & Baker.

Solicitors for the prosecutor, Harries, Wilkinson, & Ratkes.

From Chan. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } Jan. 25; Feb. 8.

In re GEIPEL'S PATENT. (a.)

Patent—Disconformity—Order for revocation—Terms—Form of order—Discretion of judge—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 18, 19, 20—Costs.

Where a judge has exercised his discretion under section 19 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, by making an order to revoke letters patent unless the specification be amended by disclaiming part thereof, the Court of Appeal will not interfere to vary the terms he may have imposed in making such order.

Appeal and cross-appeal from a decision of Buckley, J., reported ante, p. 63, [1903] 2 Ch. 715.

The patent in question, No. 7,860 of 1893, was for certain improvements in steam traps or appliances for the automatic removal from pipes, cylinders, &c., of water accumulating therein through the condensation of steam.

The learned judge had held, on a petition for revocation, that certain modes of using the invention, which were distinguished in the complete specification as fig. 2 and fig. 6, were bad—the first for non-utility, and the second for disconformity with the provisional specification, as being based on the principle of controlled expansion instead of differential expansion, as relied on in the provisional specification; and, in exercise of the discretion conferred by section 19 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, he made an order, dated the 27th of June, 1903, for revocation of the letters patent, unless within three months or such further time as the court might allow the patentee should obtain leave to amend by disclaiming figs. 2 and 6. The order went on: "If the said specification be amended, no injunction shall be asked for in any action brought for infringement of the said letters patents, in respect of any steam traps made prior to the 27th of June, 1903, unless the patentee establishes to the satisfaction of the court that his original specification was framed in good faith and with reasonable skill and knowledge."

Against this latter part of the order the petitioners appealed, asking that it might be set aside and the following substituted: "If the said specification be amended, no action shall be brought or maintained for infringement of the said letters patent in respect of any steam traps or part of steam traps made prior to the 27th of June, 1903"—thus omitting the concluding words, besides adding those here printed in italics.

The patentee also appealed from the judgment so far as it related to the amendment by disclaimer of fig. 6, and asked that the order might be varied so as to apply only to amendment of fig. 2.

Bousfield, K.C., and A. J. Walter, for the patentee.

T. Terrell, K.C., Astbury, K.C., and J. H. Gray, for the petitioners.

The following cases were cited: Deeley v. Perkes, [1896] A. C. 496, 13 R. P. C. 581; In re Pitt's Patent, [1900] 1 Ch. 508, 17 R. P. C. 214; In re Allison's Patent, 17 R. P. C. 298, 513; In re Hearson's Patent, 1 R. P. C. 213; and (by the Court) Woolfe v. Automatic Picture Gallery (Limited), 51 W. R. 121, [1903] 1 Ch. 18.

THE COURT declined to interfere with the discretion exercised by Buckley, J., as to the form of the order made by him, and dismissed the petitioners' appeal with costs, reserving judgment on the appeal of the patentee.

Feb. 8.—STIRLING, L.J., delivered the judgment of the court, allowing the cross-appeal of the patentee with costs. His lordship said there was no disconformity in fig. 6, both the provisional and the complete specification being based on the principle of differential expansion, which was also in his opinion practically the principle of fig. 6—the terms differential expansion and controlled expansion not being mutually exclusive. The language of Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ., in Woodward v. Sansum, 4 R. P. C. 166, 175, 177, showed how far variations from the provisional specification were allowable in the complete specification.

It was ordered that £125 should be added to the costs of the patentee's cross-appeal in repayment of costs paid by him to the petitioners in the court below.

Solicitors, Faithfull & Owen; Frank Evelyn Jones, for W. T. Hill, Manchester.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) And K. B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) — Dec. 9; Feb. 3.

SMITH (Appellant) v. LEIGH UNION ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE (Respondents). (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Appeal to quarter sessions—Right of assessment committee to appear as respondents—Consent of guardians—Notice to guardians—Sufficiency of notice—Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), s. 2—Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 58), s. 12.

The consent of the guardians of a union, which is required by section 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864, before the assessment committee can appear as respondents to a rating appeal, is not such a consent in writing of a majority of the guardians of a union required under the Poor Law Acts as is mentioned in section 12 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1882, and it is not necessary that fourteen days' notice should be given to each guardian of the meeting at which the consent to such appearance is to be given.

Special case stated by the court of quarter sessions for the County Palatine of Lancaster upon an appeal heard and determined by the quarter sessions on the 27th of April, 1903, against a certain assessment to the poor rate.

When the appeal was called on for hearing, counsel claimed to appear and be heard on behalf of the assessment committee of the Leigh Union appearing in the name of the guardians of the union. The overseers of the township of Leigh (which is situated in the Leigh Union) did not appear either in person or by counsel.

Counsel appeared on behalf of the appellant, and called upon counsel who appeared on behalf of the assessment committee to prove that the said committee had duly obtained the consent of the guardians to their appearance as respondents to the appeal.

It was proved or admitted that the notice of appeal had been served upon the assessment committee on the 11th of March, 1903; that the next meeting of the guardians was held on the 25th of March; and that the clerk of the committee, on the 20th of March, sent to each of the guardians a notice dated Friday, the 20th of March, that at the next meeting the consent of the board to the appearance of the assessment committee as respondents in appeals to quarter sessions would be proposed.

On the 25th of March the next meeting of the guardians was held, and it was resolved: "That the board hereby consents to the assessment committee appearing as respondents in appeals to quarter sessions against the assessment of the property" of the appellant.

It was contended by counsel for the assessment committee that the consent of the guardians thus given was a sufficient compliance with section 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864, which enacts that the assessment committee may, with the consent of the guardians after notice shall have been sent to every guardian, appear as respondents to such appeals, but in the name of the guardians of such union; and that such consent need not be in writing.

It was contended by counsel on behalf of the appellant that the assessment committee and the guardians had not complied with the provisions of section 12 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1882, which enacts as follows: "Where under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, or any of the Acts amending the same, the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians of a union, or the managers of a school district, is required, it shall be a sufficient compliance with such requirement if a resolution giving consent is passed at a meeting of the guardians or managers, of which meeting, and of the business to be transacted thereat, not less than fourteen days' notice shall be given to each guardian or manager."

It was contended by counsel for the appellant that not less than fourteen days' notice should have been given to each guardian of the meeting at which consent to the appearance of the assessment committee as respondents was given, and that as only four clear days' notice was given of such meeting, including Saturday and Sunday, such notice was insufficient and such notice was invalid, and that the assessment committee had no right to appear and be heard on the appeal.

It was contended by counsel for the assessment committee that section 12 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1882, did not apply—(1) because it referred only to consents in writing, and section 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864, did not require a consent in writing; (2) because the Act of 1864 was not one of the Acts amending the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834; and (3) because section 12 of the Act of 1882 provided merely that a resolution passed at a meeting of which not less than fourteen days' notice had been given should be a sufficient compliance with the requirements of earlier Acts, but did not enact that a resolution passed without such notice should in no case be valid, and the words "fourteen days shall be sufficient" did not impose a minimum.

The quarter sessions held that the objection raised on behalf of the appellant must be sustained, and refused to hear counsel for the assessment committee on the merits of the appeal, but stated this case for the opinion of the High Court on the question whether the assessment committee were entitled to be heard.

Evidence was given on behalf of the appellant to show that he had duly served notice of appeal on the overseers of the parish and on the assessment committee, and had given notice of objection to the valuation list and had failed to obtain relief before the assessment committee.

The quarter sessions allowed the appeal with costs against the overseers, and reduced the appellant's assessment from £140 gross and £119 rateable value to £60 gross and £51 rateable value.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the quarter sessions were right in refusing to hear counsel for the assessment committee.

Section 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864, is as follows: "The assessment committee of such union may, with the consent of the guardians of such union after notice shall have been sent to every guardian, appear as respondents to such appeal, but in the name of the guardians of such union, in like manner and with the same incidents and subject to the same liabilities and entitled to the same remedies and rights as in the case of persons other than the overseers to whom notice of appeal may be given."

Ryde, for the assessment committee.

Boyle, K.C., and W. W. Mackenzie, for the appellant.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER and E. G. STILLWELL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It by no means follows that because a point is taken very late in the history of the poor law rating appeals it may not be a perfectly good point; therefore Mr. Mackenzie must not think I am at all deciding this case except upon the arguments that we have heard. But there are two lines of statutes in connection with these matters which I think are perfectly clear and definite. Prior to the Union Assessment Committee Act of 1862 and the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act of 1864, the parties to the poor law appeals were the direct parties, the appellant and the overseers, and it was only after the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864, came into force that, in order to give the assessment committee, who were responsible for the rating and who approved the valuation lists, a right to appear, this legislation enacted that they should be entitled to defend appeals or even to bring appeals. Accordingly, section 2 says that the assessment committee of such union may, with the consent of the guardians of the union after notice has been sent to every guardian, appear as respondents to the appeal, but in the name of the guardians of the union, in like manner and with the same incidents and subject to the same liabilities and entitled to the same remedies and rights as in the case of persons other than the overseers to whom notice of appeal may be given. Mr. Mackenzie is perfectly right in saying that that power to appear as respondents to an appeal is an important matter. It involves the guardians, or rather it involves the assessment committee in the name of the guardians, in the possible liability to costs, and therefore it is not a step that ought to be taken without a formal consent of the guardians. I quite agree, although there is no statement about it, that the consent of the guardians, not the consent of the assessment committee itself, must be given by resolution at a meeting, and, if the point taken in this appeal had been that no notice had been given to the guardians at all, and possibly that there was no consent of the guardians to the assessment committee appearing in their names as respondents, the objection would have been a very fatal one, and an objection which has to my knowledge prevailed in a great many cases. But that was not the point taken in this appeal. Notice having been given to all the guardians—and for this purpose it must be assumed the guardians have assented to the assessment committee appearing as respondents in pursuance of section 2—the counsel for the appellant at the sessions objected, not that the conditions of section 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864, had not been complied with, but that the notices given were not good notices, because they did not comply with section 12 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1882. Whatever may have been argued at the sessions, it is obviously suggested that this section required a fourteen days' notice, and Mr. Mackenzie has very properly contended that, in order to see whether that is so, one must look and see whether this Act of 1882 was intended to amend the practice which had existed and was known to exist under the Union Assessment Committee Acts of 1862 and 1864. The words are: "Where under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, or any of the Acts amending the same, the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians of a union or the managers of a school district is required" for this purpose; that is an entirely different thing to the written resolution either of the meeting of the assessment committee or of the meeting of the board of guardians, which is merely an ordinary majority. There were certain provisions in earlier statutes than the Act of 1834, some of which still remain, but one is enough for our purpose—namely, the one referred to in section 23 of the Act of 1834—that before guardians could consent to spend capital money either in erecting a workhouse or in hiring a workhouse, not the consent in writing of the guardians was to be obtained, but the consent in writing of the majority of the guardians of any union—that is to say, a majority of the whole body. I need scarcely point out that is an entirely different thing to the majority of those present at the meeting properly summoned. That would be the ordinary proceedings of both guardians and assessment committee. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the objection taken that notice under section 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864, must be notice under section 12 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1882, and therefore fourteen days' notice, is a bad point and one to which effect ought not to have been given. It is important that this should be pointed out, because what happened in this case is that, inasmuch as the practice is at these sessions, as in many other sessions in various other parts of the country (I do not know whether the practice has become universal since I was familiar with it), that the respondent begins, only the respondent to the appeal has been heard in this case, so the court had to proceed with regard to the value without hearing the assessment committee, who are responsible for having raised respondents to whatever figure they were put up to. Therefore the preliminary objection was a bad one, and the case must go back to the sessions to hear the appeal.

LAWRANCE and KENNEDY, JJ., agreed.

Case remitted to quarter sessions.

The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Feb. 3.—A. T. Lawrence, K.C., Boyle, K.C., and W. W. Mackenzie, for the appellant.

Ryde, for the assessment committee.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case we have to deal with a somewhat puzzling question on certain sections of the Poor Law Acts. But in my opinion the judgment of the Divisional Court is right, and the appeal fails. On an appeal by a ratepayer against an assessment to a poor rate the assessment committee of the union appeared as respondents. The question is whether they were empowered so to appear. If they had a right to appear, they acquired that right under section 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864. It was contended by the appellant that the assessment committee had not fulfilled the conditions of that section, which gives the assessment committee the right to appear "with the consent of the guardians of such union after notice shall have been sent to every guardian." It was contended that they had not obtained the necessary consent of the guardians. They had in fact obtained consent, but not, it was contended, proper consent. To make that contention good, the appellant referred to section 12 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1882, which, he said, governed the right of the assessment committee to say they had obtained the consent. That section is as follows: "Where under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, or any of the Acts amending the same, the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians of a union, or the managers of a school district, is required, it shall be a sufficient compliance with such requirement if a resolution giving consent is passed at a meeting of the guardians or managers, of which meeting and of the business to be transacted thereat not less than fourteen days' notice shall be given to each guardian or manager." That section, in its express terms, points to cases in which the consent in writing of the majority of the guardians of a union is necessary. But section 2 of the Act of 1864 does not say that the consent there mentioned need be in writing. That creates an initial difficulty in the way of the appellant. He has to make out that consent given at a meeting called on fourteen days' notice is a condition precedent, and that consent given at a meeting called on five days' notice, as happened in this case, is not sufficient. He therefore contends that the consent required by section 2 is a consent in writing. He is obliged to contend this in order to introduce section 12 of the Act of 1882 into the discussion at all. Section 12, as I have said, deals with cases in which the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians is necessary, and it substitutes a new machinery for the existing machinery applicable to such cases. The appellant refers to the statutory provisions by which guardians cannot act as guardians otherwise than at a meeting, and by which their proceedings at meetings are regulated, and to the practice under which everything that is done at meetings of guardians is recorded in writing, and on that ground he argues that the consent required by section 2 of the Act of 1864 must be taken to mean consent in writing. I am of opinion that that is a strained contention, and that it does not accord with the simplicity of the legislation on the subject. Section 23 of the Poor Law Act, 1834, gives power to the commissioners, with the consent in writing of the majority of the guardians of any union, to build or hire a workhouse. That was a special enactment, and the necessity for a consent in writing in that particular case was imposed as a special condition. There were also in the same Act other cases mentioned where a consent in writing was required, and the machinery for obtaining such consent varied. Co-existing with these provisions were other provisions in which consent was required for various purposes, but in which the consent was not expressly required to be in writing, but in which, the appellant contends, it must, in accordance with the poor law regulations, always necessarily be recorded in writing. Many of the sections expressly providing for written consent were from time to time repealed, and in 1882 the Legislature thought fit by section 12 of the Divided Parishes Act to substitute one uniform machinery applicable to all such cases, by providing that written consent should always be obtained, where it was required, at a meeting of which fourteen days' notice should be given. But that only points to specific enactments requiring consent in writing, and does not apply to cases where consent is as a mere matter of machinery recorded in writing. In my opinion, the appellant fails to show that section 2 of the Act of 1864 imposes as a condition precedent the necessity of obtaining written consent, and, therefore, section 12 of the Act of 1882 has no application to this case. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, F. Kinch, for A. H. Hayward, Leigh.

Solicitors for the assessment committee, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for Marsh, Son, & Calvert, Leigh.

From K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J.) } Jan. 20.

JACKSON v. MUMFORD. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Policy on machinery of torpedo-boat destroyer—"Trials."

A policy of marine insurance upon the machinery of a torpedo-boat destroyer, which was being built for the Admiralty, was expressed to cover the following perils: "Fire in shops and on board on stocks trials and all marine risks to completion and acceptance by the Admiralty," and also "of the seas men-of-war fire . . . and of all other perils losses and misfortunes." Attached to the policy was a clause which contained the following words: "With leave to go on trial trips." During a trial the connecting-rod of the starboard engine broke, causing great damage.

Held, that "trials" did not denote a period during which the assured were to be insured against fire, but specified a particular peril insured against—viz., peril of trials; and that the damage which had occurred was covered by the policy.

Judgment of Kennedy, J. (51 W. R. 91), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Kennedy, J., on the trial of an action without a jury (51 W. R. 91).

The action was brought on a policy of marine insurance upon the machinery of a torpedo-boat destroyer called The Bullfinch.

The plaintiff was the receiver and manager of Earle's Shipbuilding Co. (Limited), who were, at the time when the policy was effected, building The Bullfinch for the Admiralty.

The defendant, who was a member of Lloyd's, subscribed the policy to the extent of £100.

The perils insured against by the policy, which was a time policy, were—"fire in shops and on board on stocks trials and all marine risks to completion and acceptance by the Admiralty"; and also "of the seas men-of-war fire . . . and of all other perils losses and misfortunes."

At the foot of the policy was attached the following clause: "This insurance also specially to cover loss of or damage to hull or machinery through the negligence of master mariners engineers or pilots or through explosions bursting of boilers breakage of shafts or through any latent defect in the machinery boilers or hull. . . . With leave to go on trial trips."

During the currency of the policy, whilst The Bullfinch was on a trial, the connecting-rod of the starboard high-pressure engine broke. The jams of the connecting-rod split and then broke horizontally. The result was that the piston-rod flew up against the cover of the cylinder, and there was a large escape of steam under high pressure. Eight men were killed and four injured.

The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to recover under one or other of the three following heads of the perils insured against—(1) trials; (2) breakage of shafts: (3) latent defect in the machinery. The defence was that the loss was not a loss by the perils insured against within the meaning of the policy. The defendant's case with regard to the first head was that the word "trials" in the policy denoted a period during which the assured was insured against fire.

Kennedy, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff, on the ground that the word "trials" denoted a particular peril insured against—viz., peril of trials, and that the plaintiff had suffered a loss from such peril. He was of opinion that the plaintiff failed to make out his case under either of the other heads.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and F. W. Hollams, for the defendant.

Scrutton, K.C., and Ernest Pollock, for the plaintiff.

Lord ALVERSTONE, LC.J.—I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of Kennedy, J., on that point with regard to which the defendant has appealed is right. This policy is in the form of an ordinary Lloyd's policy with certain additions. The first addition is the insertion before the ordinary list of perils insured against of the following words: "fire in shops and on board on stocks trials and all marine risks to completion and acceptance by the Admiralty." I do not think this policy is open to the suggested construction that the word "trials" merely refers to a time during which the fire risk is to apply. If that is the meaning, the words do not read grammatically. Such a construction requires the insertion of the word "on" or the words "and on." There is also a further argument against the suggested construction. The policy starts with naming fire as one of the perils insured against, and then lower down in the policy is added this clause, "with leave to go on trial trips." This makes it unnecessary to include the risk of fire on trial trips by any special words. I have come to the conclusion that the word "trials" was put in to indicate one of the perils insured against. The clause indicates the risk of other perils besides fire. It covers all marine risks to completion and acceptance by the Admiralty. I think it is important to notice that the liability of the underwriters was to come to an end when the Admiralty took possession of the vessel. Taking into consideration the fact that the vessel was a torpedo boat destroyer, which the parties must have known would be put to very severe tests by trials, I think it is clear that the intention was that these trials should be the subject-matter of insurance. I am therefore of opinion that the policy covered a risk of break-down of the machinery occurring during a trial. As there appears to be no foundation for any suggestion that the damage was the result of inherent vice such as would necessarily result in a breakdown some time or other, I agree with Kennedy, J., that the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion. I think damage or mischief caused by trials is one of the risks insured against. Primâ facie, therefore, the damage which occurred falls within the policy. It is argued that the damage was not caused by the trial, but by the inherent vice of the machinery itself. There is, however, no foundation for that. The machinery was only insured for an interval, which interval included a period of trials. I think that one of the risks insured against was the risk during a trial of such a thing happening as in fact occurred here.

ROMER, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Cattarns & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Jan. 13.

In re CROXON (OTHERWISE CROXTON) (DECEASED). CROXON v. FERRERS. (a.)

Will—Name and arms clause—Direction to "lawfully assume" arms—Meaning of—Condition subsequent—Impossibility of performance.

A person cannot "lawfully assume" a coat of arms by mere user, or otherwise than by obtaining a grant of the arms in one or other of the ways recognized by the custom and usages of society with regard to arms—viz., by an Act of Parliament, a grant from the College of Heralds, or a Royal License.

As to the meaning of "assume" standing alone, quære.

A testator directed that every person becoming entitled under his will to his settled real estates should in certain events "lawfully assume" a coat of arms used by the testator (but being in fact the arms of a certain ancient family with which the testator could not be proved to be connected), and in default should (in effect) forfeit his estate. Upon evidence being given as to the impossibility of obtaining a grant of the arms from the Heralds' College to the plaintiff, who was devisee of the settled estates,

Held, that the direction in the will was void as a condition subsequent which was impossible of performance, and that the plaintiff's estate was not forfeited.

Adjourned summons.

By his will dated the 29th of June, 1898, B. J. Croxon (otherwise Croxton) devised certain real estate of which he was seised in fee to his second son, the plaintiff, for his life, with remainder to the defendant for life, with divers remainders over, and in his will was contained the following clause: "I direct that every person who shall become entitled under this my will to the hereditaments hereinbefore devised, and who shall not then bear my surname of Croxton and my coat of arms—to wit, on a ground sable a lion rampant argent debruised by a bend componee, or and gules, shall within twelve months after so becoming entitled lawfully assume such name and arms"; and the clause concluded with a provision that any person failing to comply with such direction should forthwith forfeit his estate.

The testator died on the 15th of October, 1902, and his will was duly proved.

The only material facts in evidence were as follows:

The surname of the testator and that of his father before him had been Croxon, and in birth, baptismal, and marriage certificates the testator's name had been registered in that form.

Some thirty years prior to his death the testator, conceiving that he was related to a Cheshire family of the name of Croxton, adopted the latter name for all ordinary purposes, and continued during the rest of his life to be known by it, although it was not known that he had ever done any legal operative act for the purpose of assuming it.

The name Croxton had also been adopted by some of the testator's relations at about the same date, and the plaintiff had also been commonly known by the name of Croxton. The testator had also adopted and used the coat of arms described in his will, and had had the same engraved upon certain oak furniture which was by the will bequeathed as heirlooms to accompany the settled real estate. The arms in question are in Ormerod's History of Cheshire, stated to have been formerly borne by members of the Cheshire family of Croxton.

(a.) Reported by ALAN C. NESBITT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By deed-poll dated the 7th of September, 1903, and enrolled in the central office, the plaintiff had assumed the name of Croxton. The plaintiff had made exhaustive inquiries as to the claim by the testator to relationship with the Croxton family, but had failed to trace any connection between them or to find any ground for the claim. Upon application to the College of Heralds for a grant of the arms, the plaintiff received a report of the Kings of Arms duly signed by Garter, Clarencieux, and Norroy to the effect (inter alia) that the arms described in the will could not be granted or exemplified to any person who could not prove male descent from one of the male persons who had an undoubted right to such arms (being in effect the male persons of the family of Croxton).

The plaintiff being unable to trace his pedigree, and therefore unable to obtain a grant of the arms from the college, took out this summons to determine (amongst other things) the question whether the clause above-mentioned in the will of the testator was valid and binding upon the plaintiff, and if so, what would constitute a sufficient compliance on the plaintiff's part with such clause.

Austen Cartmell, for the plaintiff.—This is a condition subsequent, and void for impossibility. The clause must mean that the arms are to be assumed by one or other of the ways recognized by the community and hallowed by custom, if not enforced by strict law. The law on the subject is meagre, but there have always been certain recognized methods, one of which must be intended here. Formerly offences against the law of arms had been cognizable by the Earl Marshal, and the heralds on their visitations had required strict proof by the claimants to arms of the right to bear them. Because these tribunals had become effete, there was no reason for saying that the hallowed and ancient means of assuming arms was not still the only proper and lawful means.

He cited Blount's case, (1737) 1 Atk. 295; Stubs v. Stubs, 1 H. & C. 257; Enc. Brit. (8th ed.), "Heraldry"; Austen v. Collins, 54 L. T. 903, 34 W. R. Dig. 91.

M. Romer, for the defendant, the remainderman.—"Lawfully" means "without violating any law" or "in manner not forbidden by law": see Century and Imperial Dictionaries. A person who takes arms without a grant or license violates no law, because there is no court in the realm which can prevent him. Even in old times when the Court of Chivalry existed, it had no means of enforcing its decrees by process; it was merely a court of honour, and if persons obeyed its findings with alacrity, it was not because they could be absolutely compelled to do so. Nowadays even that tribunal has disappeared, and there is no court exercising any jurisdiction in the matter of arms. The plaintiff, then, could "lawfully assume" the arms by merely taking and using them; this, however, he has not done within the year fixed by the will.

He cited Bevan v. Mahon-Hagan, 31 L. R. Ir. 342.

KEKEWICH, J.—The argument has taken us into many interesting questions, but I propose to restrict myself to the only question I have really to decide, although I am far from saying that what has been said is beside the mark. I am much indebted to counsel for assisting me in forming a conclusion upon the point. The difficulty arose upon a particular document, and the use by the testator of the words "lawfully assume." Striking out the word "lawfully," there would still be a difficult question—perhaps more difficult than the one I have to decide. There is some authority—in the shape of dicta—for saying that you cannot "assume arms" except by obtaining a proper grant of arms from the Heralds' College, by Royal Warrant, or by Act of Parliament. There are also dicta against that view—also the etymological meaning of the word "assume." If I was to decide that question I should want to look more closely into the cases, and also at precedents, to find out the real meaning attached in them to the use of the word "assume" in a name and arms clause. But the testator here has used the word "lawfully" as well, and I must take it for granted that by using the word "lawfully" he meant something more than a mere "assumption," whatever that term may mean. I do not impute to the testator a knowledge of the dicta I have mentioned, or an intention that his son should obtain a grant of arms from the Heralds' College. But, upon binding rules of construction, I must read the words used as, if not necessarily a qualification of the word "assume," yet importing something more than mere assumption. Unless one adopts that view the word "lawfully" is mere surplusage, and upon the ordinary rules of construction I have no right to regard the word as surplusage unless there is some very obvious reason for doing so. Now, in the will the testator certainly does recognize the fact of himself bearing this coat of arms which he had assumed without grant, and he speaks of "my" coat of arms. [His lordship read the clause in question.] If the son had in fact been bearing the coat of arms, no doubt he would have been outside the condition and untouched by it; but the testator does contemplate the contingency of the devisee not bearing the name and arms, and in that case he is to "lawfully assume" it. It does not follow, because a person actually bearing the arms, although without a grant, would be outside this condition, that therefore a person can "lawfully assume" the arms without a grant. To bring himself within the condition a person must be within the first part—i.e., as "not bearing" the arms—and also within the second part as "lawfully assuming." Then as to the word "lawfully": according to the dictionary, that word means "anything which is not forbidden by law," so that in that sense a man may "lawfully assume" the arms of a stranger, because he is not acting unlawfully, since no court at present in existence could restrain it unless he deceived somebody by the use of the arms. To my mind, however, the word "lawfully" has something other than a merely negative connotation; I think the testator must have meant that something should be done to give a legal colour—a legal title to the arms when assumed. Unless you give that meaning, I fail to see how you can give any additional meaning to the word "assume" by the insertion of the word "lawfully." It is true that an Act of Parliament might be passed to enable this gentleman to bear this coat of arms, but that is not a matter within his own cognizance at all: he has no control over Parliament, and I think he would probably petition Parliament in vain. With regard to the Royal License it comes to the same thing, because it is clear that nothing would be granted by the Crown without the exemplification of the arms with the consent of the Heralds' College. The result is that he cannot, in my opinion, "lawfully assume" these arms. It follows, therefore—this being a condition subsequent and impossible of performance—that the condition is void and not binding on the plaintiff, and there will be a declaration accordingly.

Solicitors for all parties, Patersons, Snow, Bloxam, & Kinder, for Longueville & Co., Oswestry.

Chan. Div.
Byrne, J. } Feb. 11.

In re DUNN.
BRINKLOW v. SINGLETON. (a.)

Administrator pendente lite—Receiver—Indemnity—Costs of defending action—Charges of personal misconduct—Defence of the action no benefit to the estate.

Although an adminstrator pendente lite and a receiver is entitled to an indemnity from the estate for his costs in an action brought against him as such administrator or receiver in respect of the estate, where he is defending the estate, yet he is not entitled to his costs incurred in defending a personal action in which he is charged with fraud and personal misconduct where his defence cannot result in any benefit to the estate.

S. was appointed administrator pendente lite, and subsequently receiver of an estate in an administration action. He had an action brought against him charging him with misconduct as such administrator and as such receiver. He applied as such receiver for leave to defend, but leave was not granted. The action was dismissed with costs, which, however, he did not obtain owing to the want of means of the plaintiff. Upon the administration action coming on for further consideration S. asked for indemnity from the estate for those costs.

Held, that as the action was brought against him personally, and as his defence could not have benefited the estate, S. was not entitled to such indemnity.

Further consideration.

On this cause coming on for further consideration, a question arose as to the claim of one of the defendants, who had been receiver and manager of the estate, to be indemnified out of the estate for certain costs incurred by him in defending an action brought against him by one of the beneficiaries. The testator in the cause, A. D. Dunn, died in April, 1897, and an action having been commenced in the Probate Division, the defendant, C. J. Singleton, was appointed administrator pendente lite. In July, 1897, an originating summons was taken out for administration of the estate by a creditor, and in the same month an administration order was made directing the usual accounts and inquiries. In April, 1898, probate of the testator's will was granted to the executors named therein, and in May, 1898, the defendant Singleton was appointed receiver and manager of the estate, which included certain businesses which were ordered to be carried on by Singleton until sale or being wound up. Singleton acted as such receiver and manager until July, 1902, when his accounts (which included, an already ascertained balance from his accounts as administrator pendente lite) were passed, his remuneration and costs were paid him, and he was discharged, and further proceedings in the present action against him were stayed. In August, 1902, the final certificate was made, and the estate was found insufficient.

In December, 1902, a beneficiary under the testator's will brought an action (Addison v. Singleton) against Singleton as administrator pendente lite and as receiver of the estate, charging him with having conspired with another person to bring about unnecessary litigation, and with mismanagement of the estate in these capacities, and claiming damages. This action was dismissed with costs, but the plaintiff being without sufficient means, Singleton was unable to obtain his costs in that action.

The defendant Singleton had previously taken out a summons in the present action for leave to defend the action brought against him, but no order had been made except that he might attend the further consideration of the present action at his own risk as to costs.

The cause having now come on for further consideration, the defendant Singleton claimed to be indemnified by the estate for his costs incurred in defending the above action.

Cann, for plaintiff.

Rowden, K.C., and P. S. Stokes, for the applicant.—The estate is still in the hands of the court, and it will not be parted with until the costs of the receiver in relation to it are fully paid. Receivers being officers of the court are, like trustees, entitled to be indemnified by the estate against the costs of defending an action brought against them for their conduct as such receivers: Bristowe v. Newham, 2 Ph. 190; Courand v. Hanmer, 9 Beav. 3; D'Oechsner v. Scott, 24 Beav. 239; and the observations of Jessel, M.R., in Walters v. Woodbridge, 26 W. R. 469, 7 Ch. D. 504, support this view. They are also entitled to all other costs and expenses incurred by them in connection with their duties: Morrison v. Morrison, 7 De G. M. & G. 214; Batten v. Wedgwood Coal and Iron Co., 33 W. R. 303, 28 Ch. D. 317; Strapp v. Bull & Co., 43 W. R. 641, [1895] 2 Ch. 1; Levy v. Davis, (1900) W. N. 174.

Levett, K.C., and W. A. Peck, for the executors.—A receiver is only entitled to be indemnified his costs either when defending the trust estate or when acting under the orders of the court (Hosegood v. Pedler, 66 L. J. Q. B. 18; Walters v. Woodbridge), and not when defending a personal action, as in the present case.

P. Wheeler appeared for a creditor.

BYRNE, J.—I will not go through the charges made in the action of Addison v. Singleton. I can only say that the action has been dismissed with costs, and I do not take a single word of it as having any foundation in fact. It appears to have been brought by the plaintiff as legal personal representative of her deceased husband, and she asked for £6,000 damages, which, if it had been recovered, would have gone in aid of the estate. She could not have retained the money if it had been recovered. In fact she purported to act as executrix. Now it is said on behalf of Mr. Singleton that under the well-known rule that a receiver, or an officer of the court such as an administrator pendente lite, is entitled to full indemnity from the estate for his acts done in that capacity, Mr. Singleton ought to be indemnified against the costs to which he had been put in the action of Addison v. Singleton, the plaintiff in that action being impecunious. I do not want to state exactly the nature and extent of the indemnity to which the receivers, officers of the court, and trustees are entitled. It has been treated in the argument—and I think reasonably so—that the indemnity given by the court to trustees is similiar to that given to its officers and receivers. Of the various authorities that have been referred to, the most useful in the present case is Walter v. Woodbridge. In that case an action had been brought against a trustee upon the ground that a compromise was improper, and was entered into by the personal fraud of the trustee. The action was dismissed with costs, which the trustee could not obtain, and he asked to be indemnified out of the estate. There was a remarkable similarity between the circumstances in that case and those in the case before me in respect of the application made for leave to defend. Lord Romilly there said: "A trustee may be allowed to institute or defend a suit at the cost of the estate where the suit has reference to the estate. Where, for instance, a claim is made upon the estate, the court allows the trustee his costs of resisting such claim, though his personal conduct is not called in question, but the court will not allow a trustee his costs of defending a suit solely for the purpose of repelling charges of personal conduct. I regret that the court cannot assist the trustee in cases where the plaintiff or next friend is a man of straw, and I wish that there was some rule of the court by which plaintiffs and next friends under circumstances like these might be required to give indemnity for costs." And he held that he had no power to grant the application. Upon appeal the Court of Appeal considered the action against the trustee as really one impeaching the compromise, and that the suit was defended by the trustee, not on his own behalf, but as trustee. He was accordingly held entitled to be indemnified. In the course of the judgment of Jessel, M.R., occurs the passage which was relied on on behalf of Mr. Singleton: "The principle that a trustee shall not make any profit from his office is rigidly enforced by the court, and the principle that while he acts in the due discharge of his duty he is to be indemnified against all loss ought to be enforced with equal strictness." James and Thesiger, L.JJ., were of the same opinion. I gather from these judgments that the principle acted upon by the court was that a trustee or receiver is not entitled to be indemnified against the costs of an action that may be brought charging fraud against him personally, and that he is not entitled unless part of his defence is as trustee or receiver in respect of the estate, and where he is defending the estate. I do not understand the court to have differed from Lord Romilly if his view of the facts of the case had been the correct one—namely, that the action ought to be treated as a separate action brought against the trustee for personal fraud or misconduct. Now, when I consider the nature of the action in the present case, I cannot help seeing that it was one the defence of which could not have resulted in any benefit to the estate. It is true that the charges brought against Mr. Singleton were for acts done while he was administrator pendente lite, and receiver, but they are charges of personal fraud, and however successful he might have been, and in fact was, in his defence of the action, that could result, and has resulted, in no benefit to the estate. I am not laying down any general rule because circumstances are various, but I do not at present see how any action, the defence of which could not be for the benefit of the estate, could be allowed to be defended at the expense of the estate. The case of Courand v. Hanmer appears to me to be an analogous case to one of opposition having been made to a receiver by parties entitled to appear on passing his accounts and seeking to disallow items in them. I think that it was natural that the receiver's costs should be allowed out of the estate as against the incumbrancer who took this security knowing that it would be subject to the proper costs to be incurred in an incumbrancer's suit, the receiver being appointed as much for their benefit as for that of the mortgagor. That, therefore, is not, I think, an authority for Mr. Singleton in the present case. The decision in Bristowe v. Needham is only that by not applying to the court for leave the receiver was not to be deprived of the indemnity to which, if he had applied for leave and obtained it, he would have been entitled in the case of an action which has resulted in a successful defence, and one which, as far as I know, was for the benefit of the estate. I regret that Mr. Singleton should suffer by the impecuniosity of the plaintiff in the action brought against him, but the line must be drawn somewhere, and a receiver cannot be entitled to be indemnified out of the estate for the costs of an action brought against him of a purely personal description, having no relation to the estate except that the acts complained of were done by him while acting as an officer of the court; and I must refuse his application with costs.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, S. J. Attenborough; Pownall & Co.; Crawford & Chester; A. F. V. Wild; J. B. Roberts & Wrightson.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Dec. 1.

In re SKINNER.
COOPER v. SKINNER. (a.)

Practice—Administration—Trustee—Neglect to account—Originating summons—Costs of taking and vouching account.

Where, owing to the gross neglect and indefensible refusal of trustees to render proper accounts, a summons has been taken out for an account and administration, the trustees can be made liable to bear the costs, including the costs of taking and vouching the accounts.

William E. Skinner by his will dated the 2nd of August, 1898, appointed his two sons, William H. Skinner and Edward Skinner, and Albert Neve, a solicitor, executors and trustees of his will. The will contained a power for Neve to charge for all business transacted by him in executing the trusts of the will.

The testator died on the 31st of March, 1899. The will and codicil were proved by the three executors on the 29th of June.

On the 24th of June, 1901, the testator's daughter, Mrs. Cooper, took out a summons asking for an account of the testator's estate under ord. 55, r. 3 (c), and that if and so far as might be necessary the testator's real and personal estate might be administered by the court.

The three trustees were made defendants.

A full administration order was made; and the question whether the costs up to and including the hearing ought to be paid by the defendants Neve and Edward Skinner was reserved.

The account was taken in chambers, and the master made his certificate dated the 16th of June, 1903.

The case came on for further consideration.

The defendant W. H. Skinner died and his executors were added as defendants.

It was admitted that there would be no residue of the testator's estate after paying debts and legacies.

Upjohn, K.C., and Cababé, for the plaintiffs, referred to Heugh v. Scard, 24 W. R. 51, 33 L. T. 659; Easton v. Landor, 62 L. J. Ch. 164, 41 W. R. Dig. 258.

Methold, for W. H. Skinner's executors.

Holman Gregory, for Neve, referred to Hewett v. Foster, 7 Beav. 348.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: In this case the testator died as long ago as the 31st of March, 1899. This proceeding for an account, and if and so far as necessary for the administration of the estate, was commenced by summons on the 24th of June, 1901. During all that time, in spite of repeated applications by the plaintiff for a proper account, no accounts had been rendered by the defendants to any of the beneficiaries except one cash account which no one suggests was proper or sufficient.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff is entitled to a legacy of £2,000, and to a share in the residue of the testator's estate. The will was proved by the three executors and trustees named therein, two of whom were the testator's sons, and the third was the defendant Neve, a solicitor who prepared the will, which contained a power for a solicitor-trustee to charge for his services. One of the sons seems to have been ill, and to have been excluded by the other two executors from acting in the administration of the estate.

The gist of the complaint against the defendants E. Skinner and Neve is that they would not, nor did not, render any proper accounts, though repeatedly requested to do so by the plaintiff and W. H. Skinner, their co-executor.

Now it is clear that in the case of a small estate like this it is very hard that the plaintiff should be obliged to have recourse to proceedings of this nature in order to get an account. I am always very unwilling to make trustees pay costs; but, on the other hand, beneficiaries have a right to expect the performance of their duty by executors, and not the less when one of them has power to make professional charges. In my opinion the conduct of these two defendants amounts to a gross neglect to account.

In Heugh v. Scard Sir George Jessel laid down the rule thus: "It is a matter of some importance that executors and trustees should understand my rule on the subject of costs. The question of costs being discretionary, it is impossible to lay down a rule binding on any other branch of the court. But it is nevertheless well that executors and trustees should understand what I think to be the proper rule. In certain cases of mere neglect or refusal to furnish accounts, when the neglect is very gross, or the refusal wholly indefensible, I reserve to myself the right of making the executor or trustee pay the costs of litigation caused by his neglect or refusal."

Now the present case does appear to me to be one where the neglect was very gross and the refusal wholly indefensible. The judge before whom the matter originally came reserved the costs down to and including the hearing to be dealt with on further consideration, and on that reservation I now have no hesitation in saying that they ought to be paid by the defendants Edward Skinner and Neve. Then comes the question of the costs of taking the account. I think that the view expressed by Lord Langdale in Hewett v. Foster, as explained by the Court of Appeal in Easton v. Landor, was a correct statement of the law applicable at the date of the case before him. Under the old practice, inasmuch as everyone interested in the estate had a right to have the accounts taken in court, the order for an account in an administration action went as a matter of course, and the costs of taking it came as a general rule out of the estate. But that is no longer the case now. Since the 24th of October, 1883, there is no longer any such general right to have an account taken, and it is by no means a matter of course that the costs of taking the account are paid out of the estate. The result is that I have to decide which of the two parties shall bear the costs of taking and vouching the accounts. I have come to the conclusion in the circumstances that I ought to make these two defendants pay them.

The remaining costs must be reserved. Some question may arise on the construction of the will, and I do not think I ought to order these two defendants to bear the whole of the costs. The houses remaining unrealized must be sold, and the plaintiff must conduct the sale.

Solicitors, G. W. Dampney; Charles H. W. Osborn; S. J. Spreat.

Chan. Div. } Jan. 20, 26.
Buckley, J. }

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ASHTON GAS CO. (a.)

Company—Gas company—Statutory maximum dividend—Payment free of income tax—Ashton Gas Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. clxxxvi.), ss. 16, 17—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), ss. 54, 60, Schedule A, Rule No. III. (3).

A gas company, which is precluded by statute from paying dividend in excess of a statutory maximum rate, cannot pay a dividend at that rate free of income tax.

This was an action brought by the Attorney-General, at the relation of the Corporation of Ashton-under-Lyne, and by the corporation, against the Ashton Gas Co. to obtain a declaration that the profits divisible in any year among the shareholders of the company ought to be calculated as inclusive, and not as exclusive, of the amount payable for that year in respect of income tax on the profits proposed to be divided, and for an injunction.

The defendant company was incorporated by the Ashton Gas Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. cci.), for the purpose of supplying gas to the town of Ashton-under-Lyne and the neighbourhood. It is now regulated by the provisions of that Act as amended by the Ashton Gas Act, 1877.

By section 16 of the Ashton Gas Act, 1877, it is enacted that, except as in that Act provided, "the profits of the company to be divided among the shareholders in any year shall not exceed" the rate of £10 per cent. per annum (referred to in the Act as "the standard rate of dividend") on the ordinary share capital or stock of the company authorized by Parliament and paid up.

By section 17 the standard price for gas supplied by the company is to be 3s. 8d. per 1,000 cubic feet, provided that the company may increase or diminish such standard price subject to a decrease or increase in the standard rate of dividend, to be calculated thus: For every penny charged in excess or diminution of such standard price in any year the standard rate of dividend for such year to be reduced or increased by 5s. in the £100 per annum.

Ever since 1847 the profits divisible for any year among the shareholders of the company have been calculated as exclusive of the amount payable for that year in respect of income tax on the annual profits and gains.

For many years past the company had made large profits, out of which it has in each year paid to its shareholders the maximum dividend payable under the sliding scale established by section 17. By paying these dividends free of income tax the company has, according to the corporation, who are large consumers of gas, in effect paid larger dividends than were lawful.

Danckwerts, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiffs, referred to Mason v. Ashton Gas Co., 54 L. T. 708; Last v. London Assurance Corporation, 34 W. R. 233, 10 A. C. 438; Gilbertson v. Ferguson, 7 Q. B. D. 562, 30 W. R. Dig. 97; and Partington v. Attorney-General, 4 E. & I. App. 100, 122.

H. Terrell, K.C., and W. M. Cann, for the defendants, referred to Mersey Docks v. Lucas, 32 W. R. 34, 8 A. C. 891, and London County Council v. Attorney-General, 49 W. R. 686, [1901] A. C. 26.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J.—By sections 16 and 17 of their special Act of 1877 the defendant company are precluded from paying dividend in excess of a certain rate fixed by a sliding scale dependent upon the price charged for gas. Their practice has been, and is, to pay dividend at the maximum rate thus fixed, but free of income tax. The whole question in the case is whether this was a payment in excess of that allowed by the Act. The point is the simplest possible, and, but for the fact that some provisions of the Income Tax Acts have to be considered, and that these Acts are not always easy of construction, I should have thought it incapable of the amount of argument which it has received. The obvious solution seems to be that when the company pays, say, 10 per cent. free of income tax, it gives the shareholder 10 per cent. and relieves him from liability to make any payment to the Revenue or allowance to the company out of it. In other words, he receives 10 per cent. and an indemnity against a liability to pay part of it to the Revenue, or allow a deduction by the company of such part as the company has paid to the Revenue for income tax. He thus gets more than a 10 per cent. dividend. Further, if he be a person of limited income entitled to remission or abatement of income tax, he will in fact receive 10 per cent. and the income tax, or so much of the income tax as he reclaims from the Revenue authorities. The argument addressed to me has been that, inasmuch as under the machinery of the Income Tax Acts the corporation is assessed under Schedule A, and pays income tax upon all its profits, the corporation has nothing out of which it can pay the corporator dividend beyond the balance which remains after the corporation has paid the income tax payable by the corporation; and that out of this fund it is entitled to give the shareholder not exceeding, say, 10 per cent. This argument, I think, rests upon a fallacy. The profits are not arrived at after deducting income tax. The income tax is a part of the profits—viz., such part as the Revenue is entitled to take out of the profits. A sum which is an expense which must be borne whether profits are earned or not must, no doubt, be deducted before arriving at profit. But a proportionate part of the profits payable to the Revenue is not a deduction before arriving at, but a part of, the profits themselves. I refer to Lord Blackburn's judgment in Last v. London Assurance Corporation. Under the Income Tax Acts all income has to pay the tax, but not to pay it twice over. If it has already been paid under Schedule A, it is not payable again under Schedule D. But that does not prove that the person who receives a distributive share of the fund does not bear income tax in respect of his ownership of shares in the company. The Act provides that he shall. The relevant machinery is that under section 40 of the Income Tax Act, 1842; the company is chargeable, and its officer has to do the necessary acts and make the necessary returns on its behalf. By section 54 he is to prepare a statement of the profits, and the estimate is to be made on the amount of the profits before any dividend shall have been made thereof to the member, and the member is to allow out of such dividend a proportionate deduction in respect of the duty so charged. The words which here command attention are that the member is to allow the duty out of the dividend. This particular company is governed by section 60, Schedule A, No. III. (3) of the Act of 1842. That section goes on to repeat or reproduce, but not very accurately, some part of the matter which had already been dealt with by section 54, and the words as to the allowance of the proportionate deduction of the duty are not identical with the words of section 54. For the words in section 54, "all such other persons and corporations or companies," section 60 substitutes the words "all such persons, corporations, companies, and societies," and for the words "out of such dividends" substitutes the words "out of such produce or value." An argument has been based upon this, the object of which is to show that the persons who are to make the allowance under section 60 are not the members of the corporation, but the corporation itself, and that the words are intended to provide that the corporation shall make the allowance to its treasurer. This may be so, but I do not think it is. It is true that the draughtsman has used a collection of nouns substantive which reproduce those used in the earlier part of the clause with reference to the corporation whose profits are being considered and not the collection of nouns substantive previously used as describing the members to whom distributive shares are to be paid. But, as matter of construction, I think the person to allow under section 60 is the same person as he who is to allow under section 54—viz., the member. But the question is not, I think, vital, for, even if the suggested construction of section 60 be right, the liability of the members to make the allowance would still, as it seems to me, be enforced by section 54. I refer also to section 102 of the Act of 1842 and section 40 of the Act of 1853. When this company declared and paid a dividend of 10 per cent., the member would be bound to allow the corporation to deduct the income tax upon his dividend, and he would receive a net sum of less than 10 per cent. When the corporation declared and paid a dividend of 10 per cent. free of income tax, the member received a sum larger by the amount of the income tax, which is not then to be deducted. The whole question is—Are the profits thus divided among the shareholders in excess of 10 per cent. on the capital? I think they are. It is exactly as if the company declared a dividend of 10 per cent. and the amount of the income tax, so that when the statutory deduction of the income tax is made the shareholder shall have a clear 10 per cent. In my judgment the plaintiffs are right.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, Barham, & Lawford, for F. W. Bromley, Ashton-under-Lyne; Burgess, Cosens, & Co., for Arthur Buckley, Manchester.

K. B. Div.
(Kennedy and Darling, JJ.) Nov. 17.

HOBBS v. MOREY. (a.)

Election law—Corporation—Nomination of disqualified person—Right of defeated candidate to claim seat—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 56, sub-section 2.

A candidate who has received a minority of the votes in an election under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, is not entitled to claim the seat when the successful candidate is disqualified for being elected, unless the disqualification was either apparent or such disqualification has been brought to the notice of the electors.

Special case stated under the Municipal Corporations Act.

The case set out the following facts:

At an election held on the 19th of June, 1903, to fill a casual vacancy in the office of councillor for the North Ward of the Borough of Newport, in the county of the Isle of Wight, the respondent and the petitioner were the only candidates.

The respondent was returned by a majority of votes over the petitioner. The respondent was at the time of his nomination as a candidate for the said office, and at the time the said election was held, a partner in the firm of Henry Morey & Son, a firm which at the time of the nomination and at the time of the election was a party to a contract for the supply of goods to the council of the said borough. The respondent at the time of the nomination and the election was disqualified by section 12, sub-section 1 (c), of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, for being elected and for being a councillor of the said borough by reason of his interest as a partner of the said firm in the said contract. On the 11th of June, 1903, notice in writing was given to the mayor of the above objection, but the mayor held that he could not adjudicate on the objection so raised and determined the nomination to be valid in form.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

After the close of the poll on the 19th of June, 1903, and before the returning officer declared the result of the election, the petitioner objected in writing to the declaration of the respondent as councillor for the said ward, and claimed to be declared himself elected to the office.

On the 8th of July, 1903, the petitioner presented a petition against the return of the respondent, praying that it might be declared that he was duly elected to the office.

On the 25th of July, 1903, the respondent gave notice to the petitioner that he did not propose to contest the allegation in the petition that he was disqualified by reason of his interest, but that he did intend to contest the petitioner's right to claim the seat.

The questions for the opinion of the court were, therefore: (1) Was the election of the respondent to the office of councillor for the said ward invalid? (2) Is the petitioner to be deemed elected to the office of councillor for the said ward?

R. Cunningham Glen, for the petitioner.—Section 56, sub-section 2, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, provides that when there is only one valid nomination, that nomination is to be deemed the person elected, and as the respondent is admittedly disqualified the petitioner is entitled to the seat.

He cited Drinkwater v. Deakin, L. R. 9 C. P. 626.

Corrie Grant, for the respondent.—To entitle the petitioner to the seat he must show either that the disqualification was evident, as in the case of a woman or a felon becoming candidate, or that notice was given to the electors of the disqualification, and that votes given to that candidate would be thrown away. Neither of these conditions is fulfilled in the present case.

He cited Hope v. Lady Sandhurst, 37 W. R. 548, 23 Q. B. D. 579; Pritchard v. Mayor of Bangor, 37 W. R. 103, 13 App. Cas. 246; Harford v. Lynsky, 47 W. R. 653, [1899] 1 Q. B. 852.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case the question before us is as to the right of the petitioner to the seat. The respondent admits, as I understand, that he is disqualified by reason of section 12, sub-section 1 (e), of the Act, and that he could not be elected or sit as a councillor. The petitioner claims, however, that, there being only two candidates for the seat, he is entitled to be declared elected. It is said that the disqualification which prevents the respondent from being elected prevents him also from being nominated, and the argument is that, there being only one valid nomination, section 56, sub-section 2, operates, and the person nominated (that is, the petitioner) is to be deemed to be elected.

That is, in other words, to say that the petitioner, who obtained the minority of the votes at the election, is to be declared elected, and the majority of votes—those given for the respondent—are to be altogether thrown away. I cannot assent to that view. It appears clear to me, both on the statute and on the authorities which have been referred to, that the expression "valid nomination" in section 56 has the meaning which was given to it by Lord Watson in Pritchard v. Mayor of Bangor. He then said: "If no objection is made or if objections are stated and repelled by the mayor, then the nomination becomes a valid nomination. I do not mean to suggest that it is final and conclusive upon questions of disqualification or other similar objections which may be taken to it, but I think it was intended to be conclusive to this effect, that the nomination paper so sustained as valid should form the basis of the election, and that the nominee in the paper should be treated as a person for whom votes could be given before the returning officer." The expression "valid nomination" therefore includes the case of a person who is disqualified in fact, but whose disqualification is not apparent on the nomination paper, and whose nomination has been sustained. That being so, the election must proceed, and the question—as has been pointed out in some of the cases—becomes, not a question between the two candidates, but between the successful candidate and the electorate. The election of such an unqualified person can be objected to only in one way—namely, by election petition to the court. The court, on the hearing of the petition, cannot, I think, declare that a candidate who has the minority of votes is elected, unless it has first decided that the votes given to the candidate who is returned at the head of the poll are votes thrown away. There are, I agree, cases in which the court has power so to decide. Alike in Parliamentary and in municipal elections, if a person is a candidate who is manifestly disqualified, then in such a case the votes given for him may be treated as having been thrown away, since they were perversely and wilfully given to a candidate whom the electors knew to be disqualified. In regard to the nomination itself, as Wright, J., says in Harford v. Linskey, "If the nomination paper is on the face of it a mere abuse of the right of nomination or an obvious unreality, as, for instance, if it purported to nominate a woman or a deceased sovereign, there can be no doubt that it ought to be rejected, and no petition could be maintained in respect of its rejection. If the election proceeds, then, in such a case, for instance, as Lady Sandhurst's Case, where the disqualification of the candidate was apparent, and the fact that she was a woman must have been known to everyone who voted for her, the votes given for her might be treated as nullities. But where the disqualification does not appear on the nomination paper and the election proceeds, then, unless on a scrutiny a sufficient number of votes given for the candidate can be struck off to give the petitioner a majority, I think he cannot successfully claim the seat, and the votes given to his opponent cannot be disregarded. That seems to me to be the true view, and in accordance with both authority and principle, and as here the disqualification was not apparent, and the petition does not allege that the voters knew of the respondent's disqualification (the only notices being notices to the mayor and opposing candidate), and the petitioner had only a minority of votes, I do not think he can successfully claim the seat. All we can do, therefore, on this petition is to declare the election of the respondent void.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me the question is really concluded by the judgment of Lord Watson in Pritchard v. Mayor, &c., of Bangor. We therefore answer the first question of this petition in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors for the petitioner, Sole, Turner, & Knight.

Solicitors for the respondent, Ley, Lake, & Co., for R. B. Pittis, Isle of Wight.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) Nov. 10.

MAYOR, &c., OF WESTMINSTER v. JOHNSON.
THE SAME v. FULLER. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Land tax—Public underground lavatories provided and maintained by sanitary authority —Land Tax Act, 1797 (38 Geo. 3, c. 5), s. 4—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 44, 45.

Public underground lavatories provided and maintained by a sanitary authority under the powers conferred upon them by the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, are not rateable in respect of land tax, as the sanitary authority does not acquire such rights of ownership in the lavatories as to render them liable to be charged, but only such an interest as is necessary to enable them to fulfil their public duties in respect of the lavatories.

Trial of actions before Wright, J., without a jury.

These were two actions brought for declarations that certain underground conveniences were exempt from land tax. The actions were tried together upon the following agreed statements of fact:

MAYOR, &c., OF WESTMINSTER v. JOHNSON.

Pursuant to the London Government Act, 1899, and the Borough of Westminster Order in Council dated the 15th of May, 1900, the Metropolitan Borough of Westminster was duly constituted. The borough includes the parish of St. James, Westminster, which was formerly the district of the vestry of St. James, Westminster, created by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855.

By charter dated the 29th day of October, 1900, there was granted and confirmed to the borough the title of city, and that the council should be styled the mayor, aldermen, and councillors of the city of Westminster. The appointed day as from which the Act and Order in Council took effect was the 9th of November, 1900.

The council of the city, pursuant to and in execution of and in accordance with the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, ss. 44 and 45, maintain in the city a number of public lavatories and public sanitary conveniences for the use and benefit of the public. The lavatories and conveniences, with one exception, are (though this is not admitted by the defendant to be material) each a source of expense to the council and a burden upon the city rates, and taking the whole of them together they are collectively a source of expense to the city and a burden upon the city rates. The lavatories and conveniences are all managed together as one enterprize and by one department of the city administration. Among the lavatories and conveniences are those hereinafter more particularly described which were constructed by the Vestry of St. James, Westminster, as hereinafter more particularly mentioned.

Upon the completion of the improvements authorized by the Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. ccxxxv.), the streets and paved portions of land (including the island) which formed Piccadilly-circus, and also the streets in and about the circus affected by or made under the Act, were handed over to and taken charge of by the Vestry of St. James, Westminster, in pursuance of section 18 of the said Act. The whole of the streets and paved portions (including the island) were within the parish of St. James, Westminster, and were partly under the Act and partly prior thereto dedicated to the public use.

During the years 1890-1 the vestry in pursuance of the statutory powers conferred by the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, constructed a public convenience in Piccadilly-circus which was under their statutory power conferred by the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, and the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, considerably altered and enlarged by the vestry during the year 1894. This is one of the conveniences hereinbefore mentioned.

The convenience consists substantially of an underground opening with brick walls eighteen inches thick, faced with enamel tiles and a floor of mosaic upon concrete, completely protected from the weather by a roof with pavement lights forming the floor of an island in the roadway substantially of the same area as the convenience. The convenience is lighted by electricity and gas. Its construction as enlarged cost about £5,090.

The convenience contained twenty water-closets, twenty-one urinals, and fourteen lavatories. The accommodation was for both sexes, but separate for each sex. It was constructed wholly underground, mainly under the island, but partly under the carriage-way, and had a skylight projecting above the pavement of the island. It was entered by means of two separate staircases, each opening on to the pavement of the island.

The city council placed two men and two women in charge for the purpose of keeping order and keeping the place clean and taking charge of the lavatories, urinals, and closets. A charge of 1d. was made for the use of the closets and 2d. for the use of the lavatories, including in the latter case, water, soap, towel, and brushes. The charge was made under section 45 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, for the purpose of aiding in meeting the expenditure on public conveniences and lavatories in the city, and was so applied, and with the object of placing some check on a too indiscriminate public user. The convenience was open for 7 a.m. to 1 a.m., at other times it was locked up. This convenience produced an income in excess of the expenses, but it was the only one which did. The city officials managed this and other conveniences. The charges were in no case made with a view to profit, but it was not admitted by the defendant that this was material. The convenience was assessed in the valuation list made in pursuance of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, and in force at the time of the assessment hereinafter mentioned, at £250 gross, and in the valuation list now in force is assessed at £200 gross.

The site of this convenience was in a situation formerly occupied partly by houses and partly by the street. The land tax in respect of No. 6, Piccadilly, had been redeemed prior to the Act. The land tax on the other houses had not been redeemed. From the date the Metropolitan Board of Works took possession, under the Act, of the houses no land tax whatever had been paid. The board paid the Crown the value of the freehold (which was Crown property) of the land covered by the houses, but no conveyance had been made by the Crown either to the board or their successors, the county council, or to anyone else. The whole of the space occupied by the convenience and its walls and foundations was "made ground," consisting of brick and other rubbish produced and placed there in the course of carrying out the improvements by the Act authorized and making the streets, island, &c., now there, the levels of the land having been considerably altered by the board's improvements.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In December, 1900, the city was assessed to the land tax in respect of the said convenience in the sum of £250 for the year ending the 25th of March, 1901. No previous assessment to such tax had ever been made in respect of the convenience but the houses which were formerly built upon the site had always been assessed.

The question which the parties agreed to be the question to be decided between them in this action was whether land tax could be assessed in respect of the convenience.

MAYOR, &c., OF WESTMINSTER v. FULLER.

In this case the lavatories and conveniences were those hereinafter more particularly described which were constructed by the Vestry of St. James, Westminster, under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891.

Among the conveniences were two conveniences, one in Great Marlborough-street, Regent-street, and another in Broad-street.

Each of the conveniences consists substantially of an underground opening with brick walls 18in. thick and the floor of Terazzo on concrete, completely protected from the weather by a roof with pavement lights forming the floor of an island in the roadway substantially of the same area as the conveniences. The conveniences were lighted by electricity and gas.

The Great Marlborough-street convenience, which cost about £1,700 to construct, contained six water-closets, six urinals, and four lavatories. The accommodation was for both sexes, but separate for each sex. It was constructed wholely underground, partly under the carriage-way of the street and partly under an island therein, and had a small skylight level with the pavement of the island. It was entered by means of two separate staircases, each opening on the pavement of the island. The convenience was constructed in "made ground," forming part of either the street or the foundation of the street.

The Broad-street convenience, the construction of which cost about £2,050, contained nine water-closets, nine urinals, and four lavatories. The accommodation was for both sexes, but separate for each sex. It was constructed wholly underground, partly under the carriage-way of the street and partly under an island therein, and had a small skylight level with the pavement of the island. It was entered by means of two separate staircases, each opening on to the pavement the island.

This convenience was constructed on the site of a convenience which was formerly there, but was situated wholly above ground.

The present convenience, and its walls and foundations, was wholly constructed in "made ground" forming part of either the street or the foundation thereof.

The city council placed two men and two women in charge of each of the conveniences for the purpose of keeping order and keeping the place clean and taking charge of the lavatories, urinals, and closets, and like charges were made as in Mayor, &c., of Westminster v. Johnson. Neither of these conveniences produced any income sufficient to meet the expenses thereof, and both were a burden on the city rates. The charges were not in either case made with a view to profit, but it was not admitted by the defendant that this was material.

In the case of two of the properties (20 and 21, Great Marlborough-street) opposite the Great Marlborough-street convenience the land tax had been redeemed. The land tax on the properties 23, 24, 36, and 37, Great Marlborough-street had not been redeemed. They were, and always have been, assessed to land tax.

In the case of six properties (46 and 52, Broad-street) which were opposite the Broad-street convenience the land tax had been redeemed. The land tax on the properties 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, Broad-street had not been redeemed. They were and always have been assessed to land tax. At the date of the redemption of land tax in this and the preceding paragraph mentioned the sites of streets surrounding the conveniences were streets substantially as at present.

Neither of the above two conveniences were entered in or assessed in the valuation list under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, in force at the time the assessment hereinafter mentioned was made, nor have they ever been entered or assessed in any such list. They were not rated to any rate in the metropolis.

In December, 1900, the City was assessed to the land tax for the year ending the 25th of March, 1901, in respect of the Great Marlborough-street convenience in the sum of £80, and in respect of the Broad-street convenience in the sum of £80. No previous assessment to such tax had ever been made in respect of either of the conveniences.

The question which the parties agreed to be the question to be decided between them in this action also was whether the land tax can be assessed in respect of the conveniences.

The Land Tax Act, 1797 (38 Geo. 3, c. 5), s. 4, provides that: "All and every manors, messuages, lands, and tenements . . . and all hereditaments of what nature or kind soever they be . . . and all and every person and persons, bodies politic and corporate, guilds, mysteries, fraternities, and brotherhoods, whether corporate or not corporate, having or holding any such manors, messuages, lands, tenements or hereditaments or other the premises in respect thereof shall be charged" with land tax.

The Public Health (London) Act, 1891, provides as follows:

Section 44, sub-section 1: "Every sanitary authority may provide and maintain public lavatories and ashpits and public sanitary conveniences other than privies, in situations where they deem the same to be required, and may supply such lavatories and sanitary conveniences with water, and may defray the expense of providing such lavatories, ashpits, and sanitary conveniences, and of any damage occasioned to any person by the erection or construction thereof, and the expense of keeping the same in good order, as if they were expenses of sewerage."

Sub-section 2: "For the purpose of such provision the subsoil of any road, exclusive of the footway adjoining any building, or the curtilage of a building, shall be vested in the sanitary authority."

Section 45, sub-section 1: "Where a sanitary authority provide and maintain any public lavatories, ashpits, or sanitary conveniences, such authority may—(b) Let the same for any term not exceeding three years at such rent and subject to such conditions as they may think fit; (c) charge such fees for the use of any lavatories or water-closets provided by them as they may think proper."

Danckwerts, K.C. (Mayer with him), for the plaintiffs.—These underground conveniences are exempt from land tax, as the plaintiffs do not have and hold them within the meaning of section 4 of the Land

Tax Act, 1797. Although the subsoil is by virtue of section 44, sub-section 2, of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, vested in the plaintiffs, they do not possess the fee simple in the soil; they only possess that kind of right which is necessary in order to enable them to exercise a control of the subsoil, the fee simple remaining in the owner. This class of tenement, therefore, is not such as is liable to land tax: Rolls v. Vestry of St. George, Southwark, 28 W. R. 867, 14 Ch. D. 785. In Tunbridge Wells Corporation v. Baird, [1896] A. C. 434, 45 W. R. Dig. 92, Lord Herschell says: "It seems to me that the vesting of the street vests in the urban authority such property and such property only as is necessary for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use. And Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J., in Bradford v. Eastbourne Corporation, [1896] 2 Q. B. 205, 44 W. R. Dig. 93, says: "It has been clearly held that the vesting is not a giving of the property in the sewer and in the soil surrounding it to the local authority, but giving such ownership and such rights only as are necessary for the purpose of carrying out the duties of a local authority with regard to the subject-matter."

He also referred to Finchley Electric Light Co. v. Finchley Urban Council, 51 W. R. 375, [1903] 1 Ch. 437.

Macmorran, K.C. (S. A. T. Rowlatt with him), for the defendants.—It is true that the vesting of the subsoil under the Public Health (London) Act. 1891, is only a vesting for the purpose of the Act, but the corporation are the owners of these conveniences, and as such are liable to land tax in respect of them. The plaintiffs have exclusive possession of the conveniences, opening and closing them at such times as they wish, and charging such sums for the use thereof as they think fit, and in the case of trespass have a right of action; they have therefore all the ordinary rights of ownership of an hereditament such as to render them liable to pay land tax: Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Fowler, 42 W. R. 270, [1893] A. C. 416.

Danckwerts, K.C., in reply, cited Hinde v. Charlton, 15 W. R. 226, L. R. 2 C. P. 104.

WRIGHT, J.—The Land Tax Act of 1797 provides, in substance, as far as is material for present purposes, that tenements or hereditaments had or held by persons should be liable to be assessed to the land tax. and the real question is whether the corporation of Westminster have or hold these conveniences as hereditaments within the meaning of that enactment. It seems to me tolerably plain that the enactments in the Land Tax Act, where it speaks of having or holding tenements or hereditaments, is using that language with reference to ordinary unqualified rights of property, and the question is whether a restricted qualified property which the sanitary authority has in places like this can properly be brought within the words of the Land Tax Act. The nature of the right which they have is, I think, best described in the language of Lord Herschell and Lord Halsbury in the case of Tunbridge Wells Corporation v. Baird. Taking Lord Herschell's words, he says: "It seems to me that the vesting of the street vests in the urban authority such property and such property only as is necessary for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use." Here, of course, the vesting under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, is a little different from that, because it is a vesting for the purpose of constructing and maintaining these conveniences; but the principle is the same. Then in the case of Bradford v. Mayor of Eastbourne Lord Russell of Killowen used similar language: "It has been clearly held that the vesting is not a giving of the property in the sewer and in the soil surrounding it to the local authority, but giving such ownership and such rights only as are necessary for the purpose of carrying out the duties of a local authority with regard to the subject-matter." Primâ facie it seems to me that the corporation when they appropriate a piece of land under one of their streets for a purpose of this kind do not acquire under the Public Health Act of 1891, or under any other statute by which they are authorized to do these works, anything equivalent to a general property. They acquire only such an interest as is necessary for the purpose of discharging their public duty. Then comes the question, which is one of some difficulty, when they actually construct a permanent building of this kind on or under the street, whether or not that ought to be regarded as a tenement or hereditament had or held by them. It seems to me no distinction can be drawn merely because a structure is more or less permanent; the construction of the structure is permitted to the authority simply for the purpose of and in discharge of their sanitary duties, and I cannot think these ought to be regarded as any more than what I may call a personal property of theirs merely because it is permanent or of a certain thickness or peculiar in construction. The principle is that they are allowed to put it down only for limited purposes and they are not owners in the ordinary sense. In the case of Metropolitan Railway v. Fowler the facts were entirely different, as has been pointed out. There there was the permanent appropriation of the soil for the purposes of the railway and I do not think there is anything in the language by the noble lords who gave judgment in that case which would in any way warrant me in holding that they would take the same view in respect to the entirely limited ownership of the sanitary authority, in that which is merely the soil of the streets. Mr. Danckwerts has pointed out, I think, the whole of these conveniences, or certainly the greater part of them are in made ground—that is to say, in soil, which is put there by the council merely in exercise of its duties or its powers in making up the level of the street—and therefore it seems to me it is reasonable to consider whatever occupies a part of that which is put there merely for the purpose of a street ought to be regarded and held on a similar title to the street itself, with this addition, no doubt, for it is also held here under the title of the Public Health Act, 1891, as a public convenience. It certainly is not immaterial, to my mind, to consider that there seems to be no precedent whatever for assessing streets or conveniences of this kind or anything of this nature to the land tax. I must therefore hold that the plaintiffs are not liable to be assessed to the land tax in respect of any of these conveniences.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Caprons, Hitchins, Brabant, & Hitchins.

Solicitors for the defendants, Miller, Vardon, & Miller.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Nov. 12.

MOREL BROS., COBBETT & SON v. WESTMORLAND (EARL). (a.)

Married woman—Authority of wife to pledge husband's credit—Necessaries—Husband and wife sued jointly—Presumption of agency — Alternative liability of husband—Election—Rules of Supreme Court, ord. 14, r. 5.

The relationship of husband and wife gives rise to no presumption of joint liability for goods supplied to the domestic establishment on the order of the wife. Should husband and wife be sued jointly for goods supplied to the wife, and judgment obtained against her, then, in the absence of joint liability, there is no alternative remedy against the husband, nor does ord. 14, r. 5, alter this.

When it is established that a sufficient allowance has been paid by the husband to his wife, and she has been directed not to go beyond it, the presumption of the agency of the wife for the usual domestic purposes of the joint establishment and other necessaries will be rebutted.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 290, [1903] 1 K. B. 64) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.).

The plaintiffs, who were wine merchants and provision dealers, brought the action against Lord and Lady Westmorland jointly for £455, balance of an account for provisions and wines supplied between May, 1897, and September, 1901. Of these goods, £196 worth were supplied before the end of July, 1899, and the remaining £235 after that date.

On an application under order 14 leave was given to sign final judgment against Lady Westmorland. Judgment was signed accordingly, but not satisfied.

Lord Westmorland, in his defence, alleged that he never authorized any person to order, purchase, or take delivery of any of the goods in question, or to pledge his credit in respect thereof; and, in his amended defence, that if any order was given on his behalf, such order was given by the countess, and that, by suing and recovering judgment against her, the plaintiffs had elected to look to her alone as the contracting party, and were not entitled to recover from him.

All the goods were in fact ordered by the countess, and her name was entered in the books of the plaintiffs. The name of the earl was never entered in the plaintiffs' books. The greater part of the goods were supplied by the plaintiffs to Apethorpe Hall, Northamptonshire, where the defendants resided. Accounts were sent in periodically by the plaintiffs to the countess, in which the goods were uniformly debited to her.

There was no affirmative evidence of authority given to the countess to pledge the joint credit of the earl and of herself, or that she had in fact pledged their joint credit. Phillimore, J., declined to withdraw the case from the jury. On behalf of Lord Westmorland evidence was given that in June, 1899, his net annual income was £2,500, while the countess had an annual income of £400 in her own right, and that it was agreed that out of his net income the earl should pay into a separate account the sum of £2,000 annually, upon which either the earl or countess might draw for payment of household expenses only, and the countess was told that this was the utmost sum which could be allowed. The annual sum of £2,000 was regularly paid as agreed. The following questions were left to the jury: First, Is defendant liable for goods supplied before July, 1899?—Answer: Yes. Secondly, As to goods supplied to Apethorpe since July, 1899: (a) Were they necessaries suitable for the station of the defendant?—Answer: Yes. (b) Did the defendant give his wife a sufficient allowance for household expenses?—Answer: On income named, Yes. (c) Did he prohibit his wife from incurring any household expenditure except out of his allowance?—Answer: Yes. (d) Did the wife, when ordering goods from the plaintiffs, act as agent for the defendant and herself, or for the defendant only, or for herself only?—Answer: For defendant and herself jointly. (e) To whom did the plaintiffs give credit?—Answer: To the earl in the name of the countess. Thirdly, Is defendant liable for goods sent after July, 1899, to other places than Apethorpe?—Answer: No. On further consideration Phillimore, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs against Lord Westmorland for £411 and costs. This was reversed by the Court of Appeal, who entered judgment for Lord Westmorland.

Shearman, K.C., and Hills, for the appellants.

Debenham v. Mellon, 29 W. R. 141, 6 App. Cas. 24; Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504; and Scarf v. Jardine, 30 W. R. 893, 7 App. Cas. 345, were cited or referred to.

Gore-Brown, K.C., and Bonner, for the respondent, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—The plaintiffs might have sued either the agent or the principal. I prefer keeping to those terms, because it gets rid of the confusion which arises from the peculiar relation of these parties to each other. The result was that the plaintiffs obtained judgment against the agent. They cannot get judgment against the principal also. It is an alternative remedy; it cannot be made available against the two.

I think the authorities upon which the judgment is founded—one of the principal authorities being a decision of this House—render it absolutely impossible to go back upon the course of decision upon this subject. I am myself satisfied that the question was rightly decided both in this House and in the Court of Appeal.

With reference to the rule upon which reliance has been placed (ord. 14, r. 5), I think it is accurately stated in the Yearly Practice of the Supreme Court, edited by Mr. Muir Mackenzie, Mr. Chitty, and others, that "the rule does not apply to the case of alternative liability. Therefore, if the claim is against two defendants as alternatively liable, and judgment is signed against one, this rule does not enable the plaintiff to proceed against the other; and the doctrine of election established by Scarf v. Jardine applies." I concur with that, and move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND concurred.

Lord DAVEY.—With regard to the part of the claim which is subsequent to July, 1899, it appears from the evidence of the solicitor that an arrangement was made by which a sum was placed at the disposal of the countess by the earl out of his own money for the purpose of her continuing to manage the household and defray the household expenses. The learned Master of the Rolls in the court below has discussed the effect of that arrangement, which I agree with him meant that the countess was not to pledge the credit of the earl, but to pay the expenses of the household out of the annual sum which was placed at her disposal in a separate banking account for that purpose. The Master of the Rolls has illustrated the conclusions to which he came by the authorities bearing upon the subject. I do not desire to add anything to what he has said; I simply express my concurrence with his view as to the effect of that arrangement with regard to that part of the claim of the appellants. With regard to the earlier claim, for the period prior to July, 1899, I agree with what has been said. I am disposed to think that, if the proof had established a joint liability, the plaintiff would not have been prejudiced by signing judgment under order 14, against one of the joint debtors. I think he might then go on and show that the other debtor was also a joint debtor. But if the proof which he tendered at the trial shows not a joint debt by the two, but an alternative claim against one or the other, then I think that by signing judgment against one he has, on the principle of Scarf v. Jardine, elected to take his remedy against that one, and cannot afterwards sue the other, who is not jointly but alternatively liable. And I agree that the concluding words of ord. 14, r. 5, do not enable the plaintiff to pursue his remedy against the other defendant who has got leave to defend, if the proof should show that the claim against the two was not joint but alternative. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ROBERTSON.—It is enough to support this judgment that there was no evidence at all of joint liability.

The period before July, 1899, is bare of any evidence which would yield the legal inference of joint liability. The true theory of the case—namely, that the earl was principal during the earlier period, is not available to the appellants now that they have taken judgment in this suit against the lady who ex hypothesi was agent.

The period after July, 1899, is made much clearer, in a positive sense, for I hold the arrangement made to have deprived the lady of all power to pledge her husband's credit. The earl substituted this fund, which he placed at the lady's disposal, for any authority, express or implied, to pledge his credit at all, joint or several. This being the fact, the well-established law of Debenham v. Mellon protects the respondent.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, A. L. Rayner; Royds & Rawstone.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 11.

SAUNDERSON v. COLLINS. (a.)

Bailment—Bailor and bailee—Carriage lent to bailee—Negligence of bailee's servant—Scope of employment—Liability of bailee for damage caused to carriage by his servant.

The plaintiff, a coachbuilder, lent the defendant a dog-cart for use while he repaired the defendant's trap. The defendant's coachman, without his master's knowledge or permission, took out the dog-cart one night for a drive on his own account and damaged the dog-cart by negligently driving it into a tramcar.

Held, that the plaintiff could not recover damages from the defendant for the damage done to the dog-cart.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) (51 W. R. 558) reversed.

Coupé Carriage Co. v. Maddick, [1891] 2 Q. B. 413, 40 W. R. Dig. 11, discussed.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.), reversing the decision of the county court judge at the trial of the action at Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

The facts leading up to the appeal were shortly these:

The plaintiff Saunderson was a coachbuilder, and he brought the action in the county court to recover £22 18s. 6d. for damages done to a dog-cart which he had lent to the defendant Collins to use during the time that he was repairing another dog-cart, which was the property of the defendant. The evidence before the county court judge was to the effect that Mr. Collins had a servant named Langdon, who acted as his coachman, and that on the evening of the 20th of June, 1902, which was the day of the Coronation celebration in Newcastle, Langdon surreptitiously and without the knowledge or permission of his master, took out the dog-cart and with four friends went for a drive round the town. Some of them became drunk, and in the course of the drive Langdon drove into a tramcar and the dog-cart was damaged.

The county court judge found that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, and that the act of Langdon was a tortious act as regarded his master; the dog-cart was left in the coachhouse as usual that evening and the key was placed in the drawer in the hall of the defendant's house and it was taken from its place and the coachhouse unlocked after Mr. Collins had retired for the night. He held that if the case of the Coupé Co. v. Maddick, [1891] 2 Q. B. 413, 40 W. R. Dig. 11, could not be distinguished, he was bound by that decision to give judgment for the plaintiff; but he distinguished it from the present case on the ground that the defendant's servant in wrongfully taking the trap out of his master's coachhouse and damaging it was doing a tortious act in respect of which both the plaintiff and the defendant had a right of action against Langdon. He therefore entered judgment for the defendant.

The Divisional Court reversed that judgment; holding that the decision in the Coupé Co. v. Maddick covered this case, and that judgment should have been entered at the trial for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Manisty, K.C., and Meynell, for the defendant.—A master is not liable for the tortious act of his servant committed outside the scope of his employment and done in his own and not in his master's interest. The present case, for the reason stated by the learned county court judge, is distinguishable from the Coupé Co. v. Maddick, and therefore the Divisional Court was wrong in holding that that case was binding upon the county court judge and was binding on them. If it is not distinguishable, then we say that the law was not rightly laid down in the Coupé case with regard to the liability of a bailee.

Mitchell v. Crassweller, 13 C. B. 237; Storey v. Ashton, 17 W. R. 727, L. R. 4 Q. B. 476; and Mears v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 11 C. B. N. S. 850, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 17, were referred to.

Robert Wallace, K.C., and Mundahl, for the plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

—The distinction which the learned county court judge drew between the facts in this case and those of the Coupé Co. v. Maddick was rightly held by the judges in the Divisional Court to be one without substance. The defendant was liable as bailee for any damage the cart received while it was lent to him. The position of a bailee is made very clear, and the cases dealing with the subject are collected in judgments given in The Winkfield, 50 W. R. 246, [1902] P. 42. There was a lack of care here which rendered the defendant as bailee liable, for there was some obligation with regard to the acts of the servant in whose control or custody the thing bailed was placed by the defendant. If the plaintiff had sued the coachman, then the decision in Mears v. London and South-Western Railway Co. would have been an authority in his favour, but it is not necessary to consider that case here, because the Coupé Co's case decides that the bailor has a good cause of action against the master. To limit the master's liability to the acts of a servant within the scope of his employment would in effect eliminate entirely the contract of bailment. It was admitted here that Langdon was the defendant's coachman, and the defendant as bailee is liable for any damage caused by his coachman to the bailor's dog-cart, which the bailee gave into his coachman's care and keeping while it remained on the premises.

COLLINS, M.R.—This case no doubt at first presents some difficulty, but when the well-settled principles that govern the law of bailment are applied to the admitted facts, it becomes tolerably clear what our decision should be. The facts show that this was a bailment for mutual considerations, and it is perfectly well settled law what are the obligations of the bailee under such circumstances. First, a bailee must take reasonable care—that is, ordinary care, not extraordinary care—of the thing bailed. It is clear that the defendant's coachman, without his master's order, took out the cart purely and solely for his own use and for a frolic of his own, with the result that the cart was seriously damaged in a collision which was brought about by the coachman's negligence between the dog-cart and a tramcar. Under these circumstances the dog-cart was returned to the plaintiff in a damaged condition, and as Mr. Collins declined to be answerable and to make good the damage, the coachbuilder brought this action. The county court judge held in favour of the defendant. The plaintiff appealed to the Divisional Court, who reversed the decision of the county court judge on the ground that the decision in Coupé Co. v. Maddick was an authority directly in point, and therefore binding on the court. Before us it has been argued for the plaintiff that the acts of the servant of a bailee were the acts of the bailee, his master, who was therefore liable for the consequences of those acts. For the defendant it was contended, that as bailee he was not liable to make good injury to the thing bailed if the injury or damage was caused by the act of a person not his servant, and that the coachman here when acting outside the scope of his employment was for the time being not a servant of the defendant. It was admitted that if a burglar broke into the coachhouse of the bailee and stole the dog-cart, there being no evidence of the bailee having been guilty of negligence in leaving the door of the coachhouse open or otherwise, no liability would be placed on the bailee. The reason why the bailee in that case would not be liable is that the act of the burglar was not his act. In the present case it was not a burglar who took the cart, but the result was the same, as the act was done by a person for the acts of whom the master was not at the time responsible. The act of the coachman was an act done outside the master's control. It was not an act done under the mandate of the master. The servant had done that which broke his connection with his master, and the master was not liable for that act which was done outside the scope of the servant's employment and without the master's order. On these findings there was no breach of the defendant's duty as bailee of the dog-cart, and he is, in my opinion, entitled to judgment.

With regard to the decision of the Divisional Court that they were bound by the decision in Coupé Co. v. Maddick, I desire to express no opinion as to whether that case was or was not well decided. I leave that question open, because in my judgment that case is clearly distinguishable from the one we are now considering. In the Coupé Co.'s case the act was done by the servant admittedly within the scope of his employment. He had received orders from his master to drive a horse to a certain place, and it was held that the master was liable for the act of his servant while so driving the horse, although not driving by the proper route to the place to which he should have gone. But in so far as he was driving the horse he was acting on the mandate of his master, which is the essential circumstance which is entirely missing in the present case. I am not so sure whether the distinction I have drawn between the two cases is a sound distinction in law, but as I have said, I have not now to determine whether or not the decision of Cave and Charles, JJ., in the Coupé Co.'s case is one that, had it come before us, we should have affirmed, but it is certainly a sound distinction on the facts, and it is a distinction that, in my opinion, goes to the root of the decision in this case.

Therefore I am unable to agree with the decision of the Divisional Court, and consequently this appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I entirely agree, and were it not that the case is one of some interest from a legal point, I should not desire to add anything to what has already been said by the Master of the Rolls. Here on the facts it was admitted that no special contract was made with regard to the obligation of the defendant in respect of the dog-cart, and therefore the question which we have to decide is what were the obligations which are to be implied in the circumstances of the case. In my opinion there is no implied contract by the defendant to insure the chattels bailed. The case is one of ordinary bailment for mutual benefit simply, and the duty of the defendant in that case is well settled. The bailee is bound to take reasonable care of the chattel bailed, but he is not liable for loss of or injury to the chattel bailed, unless such loss is caused by his negligence or by the negligence of his servants acting for him. Here the county court judge found that the cart was injured through the negligence of the defendant's servant, but at a time when the servant was not acting as the defendant's servant. Therefore his wrongful act was not one that made his master liable. The defendant himself had not failed in his duty as bailee of the cart, and therefore the plaintiff cannot succeed in getting damages from him in an action based on a contract of bailment.

With regard to what has been said as to the decision in the Coupé Co.'s case, in my opinion that decision can only be supported by taking the view on the facts that the servant was acting within the scope of his employment. If and so far as that case determines that a bailee is liable for the acts of his servant in relation to the thing bailed when acting outside the scope of his employment, I must say that, speaking for myself, I do not think that decision could be supported; but, as the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, we are not called upon to decide that point now.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the facts found the servant here was guilty of an act of conversion. The parties to the contract of bailment did not contemplate that there would be an act of conversion, whether by a burglar or by anyone else. It follows, therefore, that the defendant is not liable for the conversion by his servant, there being no evidence here of any breach of duty on the defendant's part to take reasonable care of the cart so long as it remained in his keeping.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors for the defendant, E. A. Fuller, for Dickinson, Miller, & Dickinson, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Cree & Son, for Hugh Burns, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Jan. 13.

NEAGLE v. NIXON'S NAVIGATION CO. (LIMITED).
EDWARDS v. GUEST, KEEN, & NETTLEFOLDS (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Medical examination of workman—Refusal to submit to examination by medical referee—Stay of proceedings—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule I. (11).

Where a workman receiving weekly payments under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, has, on being required by his employer, submitted himself to examination by a medical man provided and paid by the employer, in accordance with clause 11 of the first schedule to the Act, it is optional with the workman whether he should submit himself to further examination by one of the medical referees appointed under the Act. His refusal to submit himself to such further examination is no ground for staying proceedings in an arbitration commenced by him under the Act.

Appeals from decisions under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The first appeal was from an order of the judge of the Merthyr Tydvil County Court staying certain proceedings which had been commenced under the Act.

The applicant for compensation was a workman employed by the respondent company at their colliery, who was accidentally injured by a fall of coal in the course of his employment. The accident happened on the 19th of March, 1903, and notice of the accident was served on the employers in due course. Without any proceedings for arbitration being taken under the Act, and without any memorandum of agreement being filed, the employers made weekly payments of compensation to the workman for six weeks, at the end of which time they required him to submit himself to medical examination.

On the 1st of May the workman submitted himself for examination by Dr. Downing, a medical practitioner provided and paid by the employers, in pursuance of clause 11 of the first schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act.

On the 7th of May the employers wrote to the workman informing him that Dr. Downing reported that he was now quite recovered and able to resume work, and enclosing Dr. Downing's certificate. At the same time they gave him notice that, if he was dissatisfied with the certificate, he might, under clause 11 of the first schedule to the Act, submit himself for examination to one of the medical practitioners appointed by the Secretary of State for the purposes of the Act, and that, if he failed to do so, the weekly payments would be suspended.

The workman refused to submit himself for examination by one of the medical practitioners appointed by the Secretary of State, and thereupon the employers discontinued the weekly payments as from the 1st of May.

On the 11th of July the workman commenced proceedings under the Act by filing a request for arbitration as to the amount of compensation payable to him.

The respondents thereupon gave the applicant notice of motion to stay proceedings, on the ground that, by clause 11 of the first schedule to the Act his right to receive any weekly payment was suspended until he had been examined by one of the medical referees.

Clause 11 is as follows: "Any workman receiving weekly payments under this Act shall, if so required by the employer, or by any person by whom the employer is entitled under this Act to be indemnified, from time to time submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by the employer or such other person; but if the workman objects to an examination by that medical practitioner, or is dissatisfied by the certificate of such practitioner upon his condition when communicated to him, he may submit himself for examination to one of the medical practitioners appointed for the purposes of this Act, as mentioned in the second schedule to this Act, and the certificate of that medical practitioner as to the condition of the workman at the time of the examination shall be given to the employer and workman, and shall be conclusive evidence of that condition. If the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to such weekly payments shall be suspended until such examination has taken place."

The respondents purported to give their notice of motion under rule 50 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, which is as follows: "In any case in which an arbitration is proceeding, or an award has been made or a memorandum recorded or a certificate given, and the employer or any person by whom the employer is entitled to be indemnified alleges that the workman who claims or has been awarded compensation refuses to submit himself for examination in accordance with paragraph 3 or paragraph 11 of the first schedule to the Act, or obstructs such examination, such employer or other person may apply to the judge or arbitrator to stay proceedings in the arbitration or to suspend the weekly payments awarded until such examination has taken place."

The county court judge, following the case of Davidson v. Summerlee and Mossend Iron and Steel Co. (Limited), 40 Scottish Law Reporter 764, was of opinion that the applicant's right to compensation was suspended so long as he declined to submit himself to official examination. He accordingly granted a stay of proceedings.

The applicant appealed.

S. T. Evans, K.C., Rhys Williams, and Sankey, for the applicant.—According to the true construction of clause 11 of the first schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, a workman receiving weekly payments is bound, if required by the employer, to submit himself to be examined by a doctor paid by the employer, or, if he objects to that, then to be examined by one of the medical referees. But when he has been examined by a doctor, paid by the employer, he is not bound to be further examined by a medical referee. Examination by a medical referee is a matter which is entirely at the option of the workman. The words at the end of the clause, "if the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination," do not refer to examination by a medical referee, but mean a refusal by the workman to submit himself to any examination under the clause. The Act itself and the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, show an intention to draw a distinction between a compulsory examination and a voluntary examination. In the case of a compulsory examination the fees and other expenses are paid by the employer, in the case of a voluntary examination the expenses, other than fees paid by the Treasury, are primarily payable by the workman himself: see clauses 3 and 11 of the first schedule, clause 13 of the second schedule, and rules 25 and 33 (4) and (5); see also the rules as to medical referees. The case of Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co. (Limited) v. McKay, 40 Scottish Law Reporter 798, is in the applicant's favour; as is also the dissenting judgment of Lord Young in Davidson v. Summerlee and Mossend Iron and Steel Co. (Limited). The county court judge was wrong in ordering a stay of proceedings.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Haldane, K.C., Ruegg, K.C., and A. Parsons, for the employers.—The natural construction of clause 11 is to make the words "such examination" refer to the examination last before mentioned, viz., examination by a medical referee. The county court judge was right in adopting the language used by the Lord Justice Clerk in Davidson v. Summerlee and Mossend Iron and Steel Co. (Limited).

The second appeal was from an order of the judge of the Pontypool County Court. The facts were similar to the facts of the first case, but the county court judge refused to stay proceedings.

The employers appealed.

Haldane, K.C., Ruegg, K.C., and A. Parsons, for the employers.

Asquith, K.C., and Sankey, for the applicant.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question we have to determine lies in a small compass and can be dealt with by a short judgment. A workman was accidentally injured in the course of his employment. By mutual agreement the employers paid him a weekly sum as compensation, and the payment of this weekly sum continued for some time. The employers then, believing that the workman had recovered, required him to submit himself to medical examination by a medical man appointed by them, in accordance with clause 11 of the first schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. He did this, and the medical man made a report to the employers that the workman was practically well. The employers gave the workmen notice of the effect of the report, and discontinued the weekly payments. The workman then instituted proceedings to have compensation assessed by arbitration under the Act, and thereupon the employers moved in the county court, under rule 50 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, for a stay of proceedings in the arbitration until the workman had submitted himself to examination by one of the medical referees appointed under the Act. The question is whether it is a condition precedent to the right of the workman to have compensation assessed under the Act that he should submit himself to examination not only by a medical man paid by and acting on behalf of the employers, but also by one of the official medical referees.

This question turns on the construction of clause 11 of the first schedule. I will, in the first place, refer to clause 3, which is as follows: "Where a workman has given notice of an accident, he shall, if so required by the employer, submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by the employer, and if he refuses to submit himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to compensation and any proceeding under this Act in relation to compensation shall be suspended until such examination takes place." That clause refers to the case where an injured workman has not yet received any weekly payment of compensation. Then we come to clause 11, which presupposes that the workman is in receipt of weekly payments, it may be by mere agreement, or in pursuance of a filed memorandum, or under an award. It provides as follows: "Any workman receiving weekly payments under this Act shall, if so required by the employer . . . from time to time submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by the employer." That is a compulsory enactment. As it stands, it imposes an obligation on the workman, if so required, to submit himself to examination by a medical man acting for the employer. But then comes a qualification to that obligation. The clause proceeds: "But if the workman objects to an examination by that medical practitioner, or is dissatisfied by the certificate of such practitioner upon his condition when communicated to him, he may submit himself for examination to one of the medical practitioners appointed for the purposes of this Act, . . . and the certificate of that medical practitioner as to the condition of the workman shall be given to the employer and workman, and shall be conclusive evidence of that condition." Then we come to what I may call the sanction of the enactment: "If the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to such weekly payments shall be suspended until such examination has taken place."

It was contended on the part of the employers before the county court judge that the words "such examination" ought to be referred to the last antecedent examination—viz., that by the official medical referee—and that, therefore, if the workman after being examined by the employer's medical man refused to submit himself to be examined by the medical referee, then what I have called the sanction took effect and the workman's right to receive any weekly payment was suspended. The county court judge adopted that view, and it is now challenged by the applicant. In my opinion the applicant is clearly right, and there does not seem to me to be any real difficulty in the question. The sanction of the enactment seems to be addressed to a person who has refused something which somebody else had a right to demand of him. The only right referred to in the clause which anyone is entitled to insist on as against the workman is the right to require him to submit himself for examination by a medical man provided and paid for by the employer. Submission to such an examination is the obligation to which the sanction applies. But then a locus pœnitentiæ is offered to the workman, an alternative is substituted for the sanction. If he does not like to be examined by the employer's medical man, or if after being examined by him he does not like his report, he is given this locus pœnitentiæ, he may go and be examined by one of the medical referees; but, if he chooses to do this, then the decision of the medical referee is to be binding on both parties. The effect of that is, that if the workman adopts the alternative course instead of submitting himself to be examined by the employer's medical man, he takes the risk of getting a report which will be binding upon him; but it is not compulsory on him to adopt that alternative course. In the present case the workman chose to submit himself to be examined by his employer's medical man. In my opinion, to hold that an examination by a medical referee is an examination the refusal of which would let in the penalty of having all weekly payments suspended, on the ground that "such," being a relative word, must refer to the last antecedent, would be to pay attention to a technical rule of construction rather than give the enactment its natural meaning. But it is not at all necessary to do this. The rule that a relative word refers to the last antecedent is only a guide to construction, and it is not true to say that a relative word need always be referred to the last antecedent. In the construction of this clause "such examination" must refer to an examination which some one had a right to call on the workman to undergo, and therefore it does not refer to an examination by a medical referee. In my opinion that is sufficient to decide these cases. Other parts of the Act and various rules of the Workmen's Compensation Rules have been referred to, and properly referred to, for the purpose of supporting the view which I hold to be the right view; but I do not think it necessary to go into them. The question has been dealt with in two Scotch cases. I agree with the dissenting judgment of Lord Young in Davidson v. Summerlee and Mossend Iron and Steel Co. (Limited), and with the judgment of Lord M'Laren in Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co. (Limited) v. McKay. The first appeal must be allowed, and the second appeal dismissed.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

First appeal allowed; second appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant in the first case, Riddell & Co., for Walter Morgan, Bruce, & Nicholas, Pontypridd.

Solicitors for the applicant in the second case, Metcalfe & Sharpe, for T. S. Edwards, Newport, Mon.

Solicitor for the employers in both cases, H. P. Becher, for Simons & Powell, Pontypridd.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 16.

McCABE v. JOPLING AND PALMER'S TRAVELLING CRADLE (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Undertaker—Sub-contractor—Repair of buildings—Sub-contract for supply of scaffolding—Indemnity—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 4.

J., having contracted to paint the outside of a building more than thirty feet in height, entered into a sub-contract with P., whereby P. undertook the supply, fixing, and subsequent removal of certain cradles to be used as scaffolding in the work of painting. A workman in the employment of P. was accidentally killed while engaged in the work of removing the cradles. The dependants of the deceased workman took proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, against both J. and P.

Held, that the applicants were entitled to an award of compensation against J., and that J. was entitled to be indemnified by P.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from an award of Judge Lumley Smith, K.C., of the City of London Court, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicants for compensation were the dependants of Andrew McCabe, a workman who met with his death through an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

The respondent Jopling, who was a builder, entered into a contract to paint the outside of two houses, which were more than thirty feet in height, for £159, and for the purpose of carrying out the contract he entered into a sub-contract with the other respondents, Palmer's Travelling Cradle (Limited) (hereinafter called Palmer's Co.), for the supply, fixing, and subsequent removal of four travelling cradles for the sum of £23.

The following is a description of the cradles and of the manner in which they were fixed: On the roofs of the houses were fixed timber structures consisting of jibs 6ft. long lashed with a ledger 22ft. long, and fastened with wire ropes to the building and also to weights of 56lb. Between the jibs was fixed a horizontal wire rope; from this wire rope the cradles, which were about 6ft. long and big enough to hold two men, were suspended. The cradles could be moved laterally by means of guy-ropes and vertically by pulleys and other ropes by the painters using the cradles.

The cradles were fixed and removed by men in the employment of Palmer's Co. The actual work of painting was done by men in the employment of Jopling. The painting work had been completed about a month before the cradles were removed. McCabe was in the employ of Palmer's Co. and took part in the work of removing the cradles. While engaged in lowering one of them from the roof to the street below for the purpose of removing it he fell to the ground and was killed. At the time of the accident there were five men engaged in removing the structures, ropes, and cradles.

The applicants took proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act against both Jopling and Palmer's Co. The judge of the City of London Court found that the houses were being repaired by means of a scaffolding, that the removal of the scaffolding was a substantial part of the process of repairing them, that this part had been undertaken by Palmer's Co., and that they were "undertakers" within the meaning of the Act. He made an award of compensation against Jopling as undertaker under section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and held that Jopling was entitled to be indemnified by Palmer's Co. under the proviso to that section.

Palmer's Co. appealed.

S. T. Evans and Minton-Senhouse, for Palmer's Co.—Jopling is not entitled to be indemnified by the company. The undertaking was the painting of a building, which, no doubt, is a work of "repair" within the meaning of section 7 of the Act. The undertaker of that work, within the meaning of that section, was Jopling. The company sub-contracted to supply cradles for the work of painting. But a sub-contractor is only liable to indemnify the undertaker under section 4 of the Act if the sub-contractor would himself have been liable apart from the section—that is to say, if he has undertaken a substantial part of the repair: Cooper and Crane v. Wright, 51 W. R. 12, [1902] A. C. 302. Supplying cradles for painting a house is not performing part of the work of painting: see Percival v. Garner, [1900] 2 Q. B. 406. Palmer's Co. did not undertake or carry out any part of the painting of these houses. At any rate they did not undertake or carry out a substantial part of it. In Frid v. Fenton, 16 Times L. R. 267, it was held that the construction of a building within the meaning of section 7 was not completed until the scaffolding had been removed. But there the same person who did the work of construction erected and removed the scaffolding.

They also cited Wagstaff v. Perks, 51 W. R. 210; and Mason v. A. R. Dean (Limited), 48 W. R. 353, [1900] 1 Q. B. 770.

Ruegg, K.C., and Douglas M. Hogg, for Jopling.—The work done by Palmer's Co—viz., the supply and erection and subsequent removal of the cradles, was a part, and a substantial part, of the work of painting the houses. The cradles constituted the scaffolding which brought the case within the Act. If Jopling himself had put up a scaffolding and removed it, it is clear that the removal of it would have been part of the work of repair: Frid v. Fenton. The fact that this was done by a sub-contractor cannot make any difference. The judge has found that this work was a substantial part of the work of repair, and there is ample evidence to support that finding.

Stuart Bevan, for the applicants.

COLLINS, M.R.—It cannot be disputed since the decision in Cooper and Crane v. Wright that a sub-contractor may be an "undertaker" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. If a sub-contractor is an undertaker, and the contractor who originally undertook the work is compelled to pay compensation under the Act to a workman in the employment of the sub-contractor, it is clear that under section 4 the contractor has a right of indemnity over against the sub-contractor. It was contended that, having regard to the nature of the particular work which Palmer's Co. contracted to do, they were not undertakers. The work which Jopling contracted to do was the painting of two houses. This court has decided that the painting of a building comes within the word "repair" in section 7 of the Act: Dredge v. Conway, Jones, & Co., 49 W. R. 518, [1901] 2 K. B. 42. Sub-section 2 of section 7 defines undertakers as meaning in the case of a building "the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition." Jopling therefore was an undertaker, and for the purpose of carrying out the work of repair he made a contract with Palmer's Co., whereby the latter for £23 undertook to provide, fix, and remove cradles to be used in the work of painting. The cradles were hung from the roof by means of poles fixed to the roof, and they could be moved laterally, and could be lowered and raised by means of ropes and pulleys. They were a substantial structure, and were a "scaffolding" within the Act. The painting work having been finished, the cradles remained where they were for some time. Then Palmer's Co., in accordance with their sub-contract, proceeded to remove them, and in the process of removing them the deceased man was killed.

The argument on the part on Palmer's Co. was that the process of removing the cradles and poles was no part of the process of repairing—that is to say, the process of painting—the houses, and that therefore Palmer's Co. were not "undertakers" within the Act, and therefore they were not liable to indemnify Jopling under section 4. It is clear that the deceased man was killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and that therefore Jopling had no defence to the claim to compensation under section 4. It would be strange if it could be successfully maintained by the sub-contractor that a workman who was entitled to compensation under the Act from the contractor upon the footing that he was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment of repairing a building was nevertheless not employed at the time of the accident in the repair of the building at all. Since the decision in the House of Lords Cooper and Crane v. Wright, it is clear that if the work comes within the Act the liability of the contractor and of the sub-contractor arises. Having regard to modern methods of carrying out work, it is, in my opinion, impossible to say that, where a person contributes to the carrying out of a work of repair as Palmer's Co. did here, that is not part of the work of repair. The work of repair in this case was carried out by means of a scaffolding, and could not have been carried out without it, and this court held in Frid v. Fenton that in such a case the work of construction or repair was not finished until the scaffolding was removed. The scaffolding, having been fixed there, had to be removed before the work of repair was complete. Can it be said that the fact that Palmer's Co, were sub-contractors prevents the removal of the scaffolding from being part of the work of repair? So far as this is a question of fact, the learned judge in the court below has decided it against Palmer's Co. It is said that it is a question of law, and it is contended that, as the work did not itself involve any part of the actual process of painting, it could not be part of the process of repair. It is, in my opinion, impossible to say that this work of Palmer's Co. was not part of the process of repair when it was something essential to the process of repair, and would, if it had been done by Jopling himself, undoubtedly have been part of that process. It might as well be said that a workman who was employed in keeping steady a ladder upon which a painter was engaged at work was not employed in the process of repair. Putting up, fixing, and removing these cradles formed as much part of the repair of these houses as the actual painting itself.

I desire to add an observation with regard to the argument which has been used to the effect that the work undertaken by the sub-contractor must be a substantial part of the work of construction, repair, or demolition. The word "substantial" does not occur in the Act, and Lord Davey in Cooper and Crane v. Wright points out that "it is quite immaterial for that purpose what the extent or nature of his employer's contract may be, provided the work on which the injured workman is employed is within the Act." The introduction of the word "substantial" into some of the judgments may have been caused by the last clause of section 4. It may be that "substantial" was used in contradistinction to "ancillary or incidental to." But that distinction has really no place in the discussion here, because the judge has found that the part of the work which was done by Palmer's Co. was a substantial part of the process of repair. I desire to say this in order to guard against the idea that work essential to repair is not part of the repair because it is not a substantial part of it. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for Palmer's Co., Wynne-Baxter & Keeble.

Solicitors for Jopling, Cooper & Bake.

Solicitors for the applicants, Sole, Turner & Knight.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 24, 25, 30; Dec. 7.
Kekewich, J. }

NORTH AMERICAN LAND AND TIMBER CO. (LIMITED) v. WATKINS. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Principal and agent—Fiduciary relation.

A company remitted money to its agent in America to be used in the purchase of lands. The agent bought land and sold it to the company at a profit without disclosing his interest in the transaction.

Held, that an express trust was created, and that the Statute of Limitations was no bar to an action for an account in order to recover the balance of the moneys remitted to him and not applied for the particular purpose.

Burdick v. Garrick, 18 W. R 387, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 233; Soar v. Ashwell, 42 W. R. 165, [1893] 2 Q. B. 390, followed.

The plaintiff company was an English company registered on the 7th of September, 1882, and formed for the purpose inter alia of purchasing, developing, selling, and otherwise dealing with timber and other lands in the United States of America.

The defendant was the promoter of the said company and prepared the first prospectus.

By an oral agreement between the plaintiff company and the defendant the defendant undertook to defray all the preliminary and legal expenses in America, including the conveyance of the land, in return for an allotment of one fully paid-up share for every 100 shares allotted to others.

The plaintiff company appointed the defendant to be its manager and agent in America, and he continued to act in that capacity from the date of its formation down to the 30th of July, 1897.

The defendant proceeded to America on the 14th of September, 1882, and the plaintiff company, on the 8th of March, 1883, sent a power of attorney to the defendant to act as their agent in the purchase and sale of lands and timber.

From time to time during the year 1883 the plaintiff company remitted to him large sums of money, amounting to over £78,000, to be employed by him in payment for the lands so purchased by him as their agent.

The plaintiffs alleged that during the years 1883 and 1884 the defendant as their agent purchased for them with the money remitted to him large tracts of land from the State of Louisiana and the Government of the United States amounting to 878,566 acres.

The defendant represented to the plaintiff company that he had paid therefor 388,113 dollars out of the moneys remitted to him, whereas he had actually paid for the said land only 239,547 dollars, converting to his own use the balance of the plaintiffs' money amounting to 148,566 dollars.

The plaintiff company did not find out that the defendant had made a secret profit of 148,566 dollars out of the business while acting as their agent, until April, 1901.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover from the defendant as moneys had and received by him to their use, and for moneys received by the defendant as trustee for them and retained by him or converted to his own use, or as and by way of secret profits 148,566 dollars, and also an account of all moneys received by the defendant as their trustee or agent in the years 1883 and 1884, and an inquiry as to what balance remained in the defendant's hands after giving him credit for all sums properly expended by him in the purchase of the said lands on behalf of the plaintiff company.

The defendant, by his defence, alleged that the plaintiff company was originally formed with the object of purchasing timber lands in East Texas and West Louisiana, but that when he went to America in September, 1882, he found that the best portions of such timber lands had been already acquired by other parties, and that consequently his position as agent for the plaintiffs was thereby put an end to. The defendant alleged that subsequently he acquired with his own moneys and on his own behalf about 1,200,000 acres of prairie land in Southern Louisiana, and that in March, 1883, the plaintiffs, after having been informed of such purchase, agreed to purchase a portion of such land at a uniform price of 35 cents. per acre. The defendant alleged that at the date of the said purchase he was not the agent or manager of the plaintiffs, and that he stood in no fiduciary relation to them.

The defendant said that he was only appointed the agent of the plaintiff company by the power of attorney dated the 8th of March, 1883, that the lands purchased before that date were purchased by him on his own behalf and out of his own money, and not as agent for the plaintiffs, and that he was entitled to make a profit out of any such transaction, and was not accountable to the plaintiffs in respect thereof. But that as regards any land purchased since the date when he became agent for the plaintiffs, there was no difference in the price paid by the plaintiffs and that at which the land was originally purchased from the vendors. He denied that he made a secret profit, and said that in July, 1884, the plaintiffs were fully informed of the true facts of the case, and that a portion of the lands transferred to the plaintiffs had been bought from the defendant and the prices which he paid for them. In addition to all other defences the defendant relied on the Statute of Limitations as a bar to plaintiffs' claim.

Upjohn, K.C., F. Gore-Browne, K.C., and Newton Crane, for the plaintiffs.—Upon the correspondence and evidence it is established that the defendant was the agent of the plaintiff company in the purchase of these lands.

Warrington, K.C, and Martelli, for the defendant.—The plaintiffs have not established that defendant was their agent to buy this land, he was acting as promoter, and was in that sense in a fiduciary relationship, and therefore could not sell his own property to the company without clearly disclosing the fact of his interest, and if he did not disclose the fact the company could have rescinded the contract, but they could not have made him account for his profits: In re Cape Breton Co., 33 W. R. 788, L. R. 29 Ch. D. 795. The Statute of Limitations is a complete bar to this action. The matter was thoroughly discussed in the case of Friend v. Young, 46 W. R. 139, [1897] 2 Ch. 421, where Stirling, J., held that the existence of the fiduciary relation of principal and agent did not prevent the defence of the Statute of Limitations being set up. The present case does not come within Burdick v. Garrick, 18 W. R. 387, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 233, which was a very special case, depending on the special nature of the power of attorney under which moneys were to be received and invested, and by which a distinct trust was created. In order to apply Burdick v. Garrick it is necessary to find some fiduciary relation, something qualifying the position of principal and agent.

They also referred to Watson v. Woodman, 24 W. R.

(a.) Reported by A. C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

47, L. R. 20 Eq. 721; In re Greaves, 30 W. R. 55, L. R. 18 Ch. D. 551; In re Tucker, [1894] 3 Ch. 429; and Buckley on Companies, pp. 661, 662.

Upjohn, K.C., in reply.—The cases draw a broad distinction between one who is a mere agent, who is more in the position of a banker than of any one else, and one who as agent receives money of his principal on a special trust. The present case comes exactly within the decision in Sheldon v. Weldman, 1 Ch. Cas. 26, where it was held that the fact that the moneys were delivered by the principal to the agent to be applied in a particular manner constituted a trust so as to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations. The leading modern case is Burdick v. Garrick, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 233, which has been referred to as being a special case, but all that is special about it is that the attorneys were constituted agents to receive money and to apply it in a special manner. Lord Hatherley said (p. 240): "In the present case we have an agent who is entrusted with those funds, not for the purpose of being remitted when received to the principal, but for the purpose of being employed in a particular manner in the purchase of land or stock; and which moneys the factor or agent is bound to keep totally distinct or separate from his own money; and in no way whatever to deal with or make use of them. How a person who is entrusted with funds under such circumstances differs from one in an ordinary fiduciary position I am unable to see." This case was followed in Gray v. Bateman, 21 W. R. 137, and Kay, J., made some important observations on it in Banner v. Berridge, 29 W. R. 844, 18 Ch. Div. 254. Other cases which show that the Statutes of Limitations do not apply to an action like the present are In re Bell, Lake v. Bell, 35 W. R. 212, 34 Ch. Div. 462; In re Sharpe, 40 W. R. 241, [1892] 1 Ch. 154; and Soar v. Ashwell, 42 W. R. 165, [1893] 2 Q. B. 390, where the doctrine was very fully considered by Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen, L.J., whose remarks are exactly in point in the present case. These cases clearly establish that if a person is acting as agent for another, and he receives from his principal a sum of money to be applied for a particular purpose, that money is not his property, but he is a trustee of it, with a duty to keep it separate from his own money, and to apply it in accordance with the principal's instructions. The principle of the decision in Friend v. Young, which is relied upon by the other side, is that although a factor occupies a fiduciary position, still by virtue of the express enactment of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act he can plead the Statute of Limitations. Watson v. Woodman, 24 W. R. 47, L. R. 20 Eq. 721, and In re Hindmarsh, 8 W. R. 203, 1 Dr. & Sm. 129, are distinguishable from Burdick v. Garrick, in that in those cases a solicitor received money on behalf of his client, but there were no directions given as to how he was to deal with it, therefore there could not be a distinct trust—it was a mere receipt for the benefit of his principal. In this case the Statute of Limitations does not apply, and the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed.

Warrington, K.C., in reply upon the fresh cases cited.—The distinction between those cases and Friend v. Young and Watson v. Woodman is this. If the purpose for which the money is entrusted to or received by the agent is one which involves the expenditure of the whole of it, then he is a trustee; but if, on the other hand, the purpose is one which does not exhaust the whole of it, and he is merely to remit the balance, or the whole of it, as the case may be, to the principal, then the case is within Friend v. Young, and the balance could be recovered by the common law action for money had and received, to which the Statute of Limitations would apply. The present case comes within the principle of Friend v. Young and Watson v. Woodman, and not within the principle of Burdick v. Garrick.

Dec. 7.—KEKEWICH, J., read the following judgment: The order of the 8th of May, 1903, on its face limits the questions to be decided at the trial, and having regard to the abandonment by the defendant's counsel of most of the points raised by the defence, it really limits those questions to two—viz., first, whether the defendant was the agent of the plaintiffs for the investment of their money in the purchase of prairie lands; and, secondly, whether the plaintiffs' title to an account is barred by the Statute of Limitations. I have no doubt that the agency has been proved. There is no occasion to dwell upon what took place before the incorporation of the company or on the part taken by the defendant in the settlement of the prospectuses. Suffice it to say that the defendant himself suggested investment in prairie instead of in timber lands, and having urged the company to remit him funds for the purposes of such investment, accepted the remittances, when made, for those purposes. It is impossible for him now to say that he was not the agent of the company for the employment of the money remitted to him for the purposes which he had recommended, and in connection with which he accepted the money remitted. It would be a useless expenditure of time and labour to refer again to the correspondence which was necessarily read at considerable length in the opening of the case, or to endeavour to cull out particular passages supporting the conclusion at which I have arrived. The defendant's letters are the letters of an agent reporting to his principal. But I must pause to notice one defence arising on the correspondence which was persisted in until the end of the trial. It is said that the letters themselves disclose the fact that the defendant had acquired the lands which were purchased by the plaintiffs, and that they must have known from those letters that they were acquiring those lands from him as vendor. There are many expressions in many of the letters consistent with the relation of vendor and purchaser, and if the plaintiffs had known, or indeed had otherwise reason to believe that he was acting as principal, they would have been bound to read his letters from that point of view. But an agent cannot be allowed to convert himself into a principal by a possible construction of his language. He must tell the truth plainly, and give his principal the opportunity of determining whether he is still willing to treat with the agent on that footing. Nothing of that kind was done, and the plaintiffs were well justified in reading the defendant's letters as merely written with reference to the relation originally existing between them.

The question arising on the Statute of Limitations is only more difficult because of some authorities which at first sight conflict with others laying down general rules for the guidance of the court in such cases as this. Nothing can be more precise than the language of Lord Hatherley, L.C., and Giffard, L.J., in Burdick v. Garrick, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 233, and that language must be held to govern this case unless it can be shown that it all depended on the terms of the deed by which the agency was constituted. There is nothing in the judgments to indicate that this was the intention of the learned judges who decided Burdick v. Garrick, and who expressed their views of the law in general terms; but in Watson v. Woodman, L. R. 20 Eq., at p. 731, Hall, V.C., distinctly said that in his opinion Burdick v. Garrick depended on the special nature of the deed under which moneys were to be received and invested and in Friend v. Young, [1897] 2 Ch., at p. 432, Stirling, J., quoted that opinion without comment but without disapproval. In Watson v. Woodman, in the passage already referred to, Hall, V.C., proceeded to quote In re Hindmarsh, 1 Dr. & Sm. 129, as an authority that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust does not ordinarily exist between solicitor and client, although the solicitor may have received moneys from or for the client, and inasmuch as the case before him was capable of being treated as one of that character, and as not depending on any special trust, I think that he must be taken to mean that Burdick v. Garrick, where there was a special trust, did not for that reason extend to it. The decision of Stirling, J., in Friend v. Young, [1897] 2 Ch., may also, I think, be properly understood as referring, not to agency in general, but to the particular relation existing in the case under his consideration—namely, that of merchant and factor. He does not thus limit his decision in words, but he takes some pains to review the legislation respecting merchant and factor as regards the application to it of the Statute of Limitations, and he concludes his judgment on that point by saying that the existence of a fiduciary relation did not prevent the defence of the statute being set up in the case before him. He certainly refers to Burdick v. Garrick and Watson v. Woodman, which were not concerned with the relation of merchant and factor, and as already mentioned, he quotes Hall, V.C.'s, criticism of the former case without disapproval, but I venture to think that he would have said more about Burdick v. Garrick but for the obvious distinction between that case and the one before him, which distinction is explained in the preceding part of his judgment. Of the other authorities cited there is only one which I think it necessary to notice, Soar v. Ashwell, [1893] 2 Q. B. 390. On this case Stirling, J., in Friend v. Young, remarked that the "plaintiff's claim was of such a nature as could only be asserted in a Court of Equity," and that this was "pointed out by the Master of the Rolls in the commencement of his judgment." The Master of the Rolls certainly did this, and there are other passages in his judgment which show that he was throughout determining how a Court of Equity would treat that claim; but I cannot think that the Master of the Rolls could have intended to mean more than that the case was one of trustee and cestui que trust to be decided according to the principles guiding the court which ordinarily takes cognizance of that relation. In the concluding sentence of his judgment he says that he is clearly convinced by the evidence that the defendant became, on receipt of the money, a trustee of it. I conceive the point of Stirling, J.'s, remark to be that he himself in Friend v. Young was not dealing with a case of that character, but with one quite different, involving fiduciary relation, but not that of trustee and cestui que trust, and which might therefore properly be the subject of a common law action. On the point that the case of Soar v. Ashwell was one of trustee and cestui que trust, and therefore outside the Statute of Limitations, the judgment of Bowen, L.J., is perfectly clear. Like the Master of the Rolls, he relies on Burdick v. Garrick, but before referring to that case he says (at p. 397): "It has been established beyond doubt by authority binding on this court that a person occupying a fiduciary relation, who has property deposited with him on the strength of such relation, is to be dealt with as an express and not merely a constructive trustee of such property. His possession of such property is never in virtue of any right of his own, but is coloured from the first by the trust and confidence in virtue of which he received it. He never can discharge himself except by restoring the property which he never has held otherwise than upon this confidence . . . and this confidence or trust imposes on him the liability of an express or direct trustee." These authorities, altogether consistent with others to which I have not thought it worth while here to refer, lead inevitably to the conclusion that in this case an express trust was constituted as between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and that as regards the moneys remitted by the former to the latter for investment the plea of the Statute of Limitations cannot prevail. The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to an account but the precise language in which that account must be directed requires consideration. It may usefully be preceded by a declaration and of course the declaratian and the account must be made to fit one another. The defendant must pay the costs up to and including the trial. The subsequent costs will be reserved.

Solicitors, Minchin & Co.; W. Webb.

Chan. Div.
Farwell, J. } Jan. 11, 12.

In re KECK'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Settled land—Tenant for life—Capital money—Improvements—Order of the court—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 21, 22, 25, 26, sub-section 2 (iii.).

A scheme for improvements had been approved by the trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts; the scheme had been carried out by the tenant for life, and capital money was in the hands of the trustees.

Held, that under section 22, sub-section (2) (iii.) of the Act of 1882, the court should exercise its discretion as to whether the scheme was a provident one before authorizing repayment by the trustees to the tenant for life.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by the tenant for life of settled estates asking that the trustees might be directed or authorized to pay to the applicant out of capital money in their hands certain sums in repayment of money paid by him in carrying out an improvement scheme for the development of the estate for building.

The scheme had been approved by the trustees, and the capital money was in their hands and not in court. The tenant for life in remainder objected to the scheme on the ground that it was improvident.

Upjohn, K.C., and Hewitt, for the tenant for life, contended that the money being in the hands of the trustees, and the trustees having approved the scheme, the court could only authorize the payment.

Danckwerts, K.C., and G. Henderson, for the tenant for life in remainder, contended that the court had discretion, and could refuse to make the order after hearing evidence as to the merits of the scheme.

Jenkins, K.C., and H. S. Preston, for the trustees.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said that the question raised by the case was whether it was enough for the tenant for life to come to the court and say "Here is a scheme approved by the trustees, proof that the money has been spent by the tenant for life on the scheme; make an order authorizing repayment by the trustees," on the ground that the court had no power of discretion and no need to be satisfied of the merits of the scheme. While not alleging mala fides, the tenant for life in remainder wanted to go into evidence to prove that the scheme was improvident, and that the general drift of the tenant for life's management of the estate was too hasty. If his contention was well founded, he claimed that the affidavits which had been put in were not sufficient, and that the witnesses must go in the box.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Act of 1882 had given tenants for life larger powers than they had previously possessed. On the other hand, the Act imposed certain restrictions. The tenant for life was not allowed to sell the mansion-house or heirlooms without the order of the court. He had also to have due regard to the interests of all parties, and was in the position of a trustee for the remaindermen. When settled land was sold, what was to be done with the purchase-money? Section 21 provided for that, and one of the modes of application was "in payment for any improvement authorized by this Act," and under section 25 one of the improvements authorized by the Act was the improvement embodied in the present scheme. By section 22 the investment or other application by the trustees of capital money arising under the Act was to be made according to the direction of the tenant for life, but in the case of payment for an improvement authorized by the Act the tenant for life must obtain the approval of the trustees of the settlement or of the court to a scheme for the execution of the improvement. Section 26 provided as follows: "(1) Where the tenant for life is desirous that capital money arising under this Act shall be applied in or towards payment for an improvement authorized by this Act, he may submit for approval to the trustees of the settlement, or to the court, as the case may require, a scheme for the execution of the improvement, showing the proposed expenditure thereon. (2) Where the capital money to be expended is in the hands of trustees, then, after a scheme is approved by them, the trustees may apply that money in or towards payment for the whole or part of any work or operation comprised in the improvement, on (i.) a certificate of the Land Commissioners certifying that the work or operation, or some specified part thereof, has been properly executed, and what amount is properly payable by the trustees in respect thereof, which certificate shall be conclusive in favour of the trustees as an authority and discharge for any payment made by them in pursuance hereof; or on (ii.) a like certificate of a competent engineer or able practical surveyor nominated by the trustees and approved by the commissioners, or by the court, which certificate shall be conclusive as aforesaid; or on (iii.) an order of the court directing or authorizing the trustees to so apply a specified portion of the capital money. (3) Where the capital money to be expended is in court, then, after a scheme is approved by the court, the court may, if it thinks fit, on a report or certificate of the commissioners, or of a competent engineer or able practical surveyor approved by the court, or on such other evidence as the court thinks sufficient, make such order and give such directions as it thinks fit for the application of that money, or any part thereof, in or towards payment for the whole or part of any work or operation comprised in the improvement."

In this case the money was in the hands of the trustees, and the scheme has been approved by them, so that sub-section 3 had no application. Sub-clauses (i.) and (ii.) of sub-section 2 dealt with matters of fact, and if the trustees complied with one or other of them they got a discharge. But sub-clause (iii.) raised the question which had been argued in the present case. I cannot think that it meant that there should be a mere formal application to the court nor can I resist the conclusion that it had been thought advisable that, though the trustees might have approved of a scheme, it should be competent for some one to bring the matter before the court, and that the court should then exercise its discretion.

What Byrne, J., had said in Duke of Norfolk v. Herries, 48 W. R. 328, [1900] 1 Ch., at p. 467, threw some light on the question: "The scheme of the Act is to give wide powers for the tenant for life, and to give power of consent to trustees, upon the footing that they will act fairly in the exercise of their respective powers, and that neither trustees nor the court will sanction schemes which are improvident, or which will unduly fetter any discretion which ought to be exercised at a later date, and there is always this safeguard, that tenants for life and trustees joining in improvident schemes, or not acting with due regard to the interests of the remaindermen, are running the risk of the possible establishment of a personal liability against themselves."

The conclusion at which I arrive is that I must be satisfied as to the merits of the scheme, and must have evidence in order to exercise a discretion in the matter.

HIS LORDSHIP, after hearing evidence, decided that the scheme was not an improvident one, but had due regard to the interests of all parties, and he accordingly authorized the payments asked for in the summons.

Solicitors, Stow, Preston, & Lyttelton, for Berridge & Sons, Leicester; R. S. Taylor, Son, & Humbert.

Chan. Div. } Jan. 14, 15, 16, 18, 23.
Buckley, J. }

BRINCKMAN v. MATLEY. (a.)

Foreshore—Public right of bathing—Dedication—Lawful access to the foreshore—Private ownership of foreshore.

Although the public have the right of passage over the sea, including that part of it which is above the foreshore, and have primâ facie the right of fishery therein, yet when the foreshore is uncovered by the sea the public have not a general common law right to go upon it or to cross it for all purposes, and in particular have not the right to do so for the purpose of bathing therefrom in the sea. Nor does the fact of a person having lawful access to the foreshore give him the right of using it or crossing it for the purpose of bathing in the sea. The public cannot acquire by dedication from the owner of the foreshore the right to wander at will over it and down to the brink of the sea.

In this case the question arose as to the right of the public to bathe from the foreshore, and in particular to a part of the foreshore in the Isle of Thanet, owned by the Marquis of Conyngham (who was under age), and his trustees, Sir Theodore Henry Brinckman and the Hon. Arthur William de Moleyns.

The part of the foreshore in question lay between ordinary high water-mark and ordinary low water-mark of the sea at a bay or curvature of the coast called Joss Bay, near Broadstairs, and was held by the marquis and his trustees, who were plaintiffs in the action, with the Manor of Minster. These plaintiffs were until recently the owners of a much larger extent of the foreshore, but had sold that which lies between Hackemdown Point (near the North Foreland) and Margate on the one side, and that which lies between Broadstairs and Ramsgate on the other, remaining owners of all that which lies between Hackemdown Point and Broadstairs. In this point of the foreshore lies Joss Bay.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The title of the marquis to this foreshore was derived under a grant by King James in the ninth year of his reign, whereby he granted the Manor of Minster and all lands theretofore overflown with the water of the sea which had been gained from the sea and reduced to dry ground, and lands there overflown with the water of the sea which should thereafter be gained and reduced to dry ground abutting on the manor, and lands subject to the inundation of the sea between the flowing and ebbing of the sea. There were entries in the court rolls of the manor from 1756 onwards in respect of fines for the groundage of vessels on the foreshore, of payments for permission to gather seaweed and sand, and for trespass to gather flints, and for taking up wreckage on the foreshore.

In 1889 the owners obtained injunctions restraining persons from digging shingle from the foreshore.

Joss Bay is approached from the land down a cutting made through the cliffs called Joss Gap. In Joss Gap, between the sides of the cutting, there had stood for many years either a bar between two posts or a single post in the middle of the roadway which could be let down at will so as to allow carts to pass. This post and the bar which succeeded it was locked. Persons on foot, however, could go through by passing either under the bar or between the posts and the cliff, and thus reach the foreshore. For many years down to about fifteen years before the action there were some four or five fishing-boats in the bay, which were owned by fishermen who lived near, and who drew up their boats there. Some carts were taken through the gap by persons to collect seaweed, the accumulation of which was a nuisance, without being interfered with, but not under any claim of right.

The defendant, Frank Robert Matley, was the head master of an elementary school in Poplar, and in July, 1903, he brought 200 boys belonging to the school down to a camp on the cliffs adjoining Joss Bay, with the permission of Mr. Harmsworth, the owner of the land, who also owned Joss Gap, holding as tenant upon the court rolls of a customary freehold of the manor at a quit rent.

Upon the steward of the manor finding that these boys were bathing in Joss Bay, he pointed out to the defendant that they were not entitled to do so as a matter of right.

The defendant, however, claimed that they had the right, and thereupon this action was brought claiming a declaration as to the right to the foreshore, and an injunction to restrain the defendant, his servants, agents, and workmen, from bathing from the foreshore in question, or any part thereof, and from wrongfully entering upon the foreshore for the purpose.

In addition to the marquis and his trustees, A. W. Turner, who had obtained liberty by a deed made in February, 1903, to place bathing machines and tents upon the foreshore, was a plaintiff.

In his defence the defendant alleged that Mr. Harmsworth and persons authorized by him were entitled, by forty years' user, to a right of way from Joss Farm to the foreshore, and a right on the foreshore to bathe in the sea; also, that there was an immemorial custom for the inhabitants of the parish of St. Peter, in which the land was situate, to go on the foreshore for the purpose of bathing, and, in the alternative, that all persons had the right of bathing in the sea adjoining the foreshore at Joss Bay, and for that purpose of going on foot on the foreshore there.

The alleged right by prescription was, however, given up at the trial, and his lordship found on the facts that no such custom as that alleged existed, as also that there had been no such dedication to the public as alleged.

Astbury, K.C., and L. Mossop, for the plaintiff.—The public have no general right of going on the foreshore for the purpose of bathing: Blundell v. Catterall, 5 B. & Ald. 268; Mace v. Philcox, 12 W. R. 670, 15 Com. Bench N. S. 681. Nor can the public acquire by dedication the right to wander over the foreshore and use it for bathing: Chapman v. Cripps, 2 Fos. & Fin. 864; Schwinge v. Dowell, 2 Fos. & Fin. 845; Maddock v. Wallasey Local Board, 55 L. J. Q. B. 267, 34 W. R. Dig. 80; and Llandudno Urban District Council v. Wood, 48 W. R. 43, [1899] 2 Ch. 705. There cannot be a highway to private property, as that would not be a terminus ad quem, and therefore there cannot be a highway to the foreshore of Joss Bay. Moreover, the courts will not construe acts of friendly indulgence by owners as acts of dedication: Chamber Colliery Co. v. Hopwood, 32 Ch. D. 549; and Blount v. Layard, [1891] 2 Ch. 681*n*.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Sheldon, for the defendant.—We must admit that Blundell v. Catterall is binding upon this court. But in that case the owner of the foreshore had a several right of fishery in the sea which is not proved here. Blundell v. Catterall only decides that the public have not a general right of using the foreshore for bathing. But the defendant here, and the boys with him, had lawful access to the foreshore by Joss Gap, and being able to reach the foreshore lawfully, were entitled to bathe from it. We rely on the observation of Erle, C.J., made during the argument in Mace v. Philcox, 15 Com. Bench N. S., at p. 611: "If you can lawfully get to the seashore, I apprehend that you may lawfully bathe there." The defendant and the boys also had a right to go by Joss Gap, and to bathe in Joss Bay as members of the public who have acquired that right by ancient usage.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 23.—BUCKLEY, J.—The question I have to try is simply whether the defendant and his boys are as of right entitled to go on the foreshore at Joss Bay, which is the private property of the plaintiffs, and bathe in the sea. The defendant contends that that which he is doing is justified by a common law right, which he says exists, to do the acts complained of. The proposition is put in two ways: First, that there is a common law right to go upon the foreshore, to pass and repass there at will, and further, being there, to bathe in the sea; and secondly, supposing there is not this common law right to go upon the foreshore, and pass and repass thereon at will, that if the defendant shows, as he says he does, that he has in some way a right of access, then, being there in exercise of such right of access, he and his boys are entitled to bathe. I deal with these two in order. As to the first, no facts are wanted beyond that which I have stated—that this foreshore is the private property of the plaintiffs. The defendant contends that he has a common law right to go upon this land, being private property of the plaintiffs, and to bathe therefrom, because it is the foreshore. I propose to state what I understand to be the law as to the right of a member of the public to go on the foreshore of a private owner. By the common law all the King's subjects have in general a right of passage over the sea with vessels for the purposes of navigation and have, primâ facie, a common law right of fishery there, and they have the same rights over that portion of the sea which lies over the foreshore at the times when the foreshore is covered with water. But when the sea recedes and the foreshore becomes dry there is not, as I understand the law, any general common law right in the public to pass over the foreshore. There are certain limited rights, and the fact that such limited rights exist goes to show that there cannot be a general right. For purposes of navigation there exists a common law right to cross the foreshore in case of peril or necessity. For the purpose of exercising the right of fishing it may be that there is—I do not say that there is—a right to cross the foreshore in order to launch a boat. In Broke's Abridgment, tit. Customs, pl. 46, all the judges agreed "that fishermen may justify going on the land adjoining the sea to fish in the sea, for this is for the good of the Commonwealth, affording sustenance to many persons, and is the common law." The right of navigation, it has been said, is for the general benefit of all the kingdom, and the right of fishing tends to the sustenance and beneficial enjoyment of individuals, and for these purposes it would seem that there are special rights to cross the foreshore. But it does not follow, and I think is not the law, that the public have the right to go upon or to cross the foreshore for all purposes. If there be such a general right by common law it must exist on every part of the foreshore; and the result would be that the erection of buildings, wharves, and quays so as to reach the water, the reclamation of additional land from the sea and its conversion to pasturage and tillage, the erection of stakes for nets upon the foreshore, and the digging of sand or stones which might leave dangerous openings in the foreshore, would all be indictable as being interferences with a right of highway over the foreshore. I have endeavoured thus to summarize the reasoning upon which, as it seems to me, in Blundell v. Catterall, it was, after citation of numerous passages from Lord Hale, de jure maris, decided that there is no common law right of going upon the foreshore with a view to bathing therefrom and exercising any supposed common law right of bathing. Holroyd, J. (5 B. & Ald. p. 301), puts the greater part of the matter in a small compass thus: "The public common law rights, too, with respect to the sea, &c., independently of usage, are rights upon the water, not upon the land, of passage and fishing on the sea and on the seashore when covered with water; and though, as incident thereto, the public must have the means of getting to and upon the water for those purposes, yet it will appear that it is by and from such places only as necessity or usage have appropriated to those purposes, and not a general right of lading, unlading, landing, or embarking where they please upon the seashore, or the land adjoining thereto, except in case of peril or necessity." In Blundell v. Catterall there was found to be a public right of way along the shore, but, looking at Holroyd, J.'s, judgment at p. 289 of the report, the existence of such highway in no way affected the decision. The point was that the acts committed were committed for other purposes than as a general public highway, and out of the highway, by the latter of which I understand that the public left so much of the foreshore as was a highway and crossed over the part which was not a highway down to the sea and there bathed. Blundell v. Catterall has been followed in Mace v. Philcox and Llandudno Urban District Council v. Woods. It is binding upon me. The defendant before me sought to distinguish Blundell v. Catterall from the present case by pointing out that the owner of the foreshore there had an exclusive right of fishing; but I cannot see that that fact formed any essential base of the judgment. The judgment seems to me to have been rested upon the general principles which I have endeavoured to state.

I pass to the second point. The defendant says that I ought to infer that the lord of the manor has dedicated to the public, who could reach the foot of Joss Gap, the right to go upon and pass over the foreshore. Thirdly, the defendant says that the tenant of Joss Farm, by unlocking the bar, and other farmers in the district, by going round from Broadstairs, and otherwise approaching the foreshore, have gone with carts and collected seaweed. From these circumstances he seeks to evolve a right in the public to have access to the foreshore, and then argues that, having access to it, they have a common law right to bathe. From none of the circumstances above mentioned can I find any right in the public to a way over the foreshore. As regards Joss Gap, there is no suggestion of a terminus a quo and a terminus ad quem. What is suggested is a dedication of a right to wander at will anywhere over the foreshore and a right to wander at will in any direction down to the brink of the sea. Such a dedication cannot, I think, be maintained: Chapman v. Cripps. As a separate and independent consideration altogether, it is, I think, impossible to infer a dedication from the mere fact that the owner of the foreshore has not objected to the public wandering at will over the sand from time to time uncovered by the sea, they doing no harm in so doing. I refer, without reading them at length, to two passages upon this—the one in the judgment of Abbott, C.J., in Blundell v. Catterall (p. 315), as to wandering at will in all directions over wastes and commons, as to which he says, "No one ever thought that any right existed in favour of this enjoyment," and the other in the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Blount v. Layard (the Mapledurham fishing case), where he uses these words: "Nothing worse can happen in a free country than to force people to be churlish about their rights for fear that their indulgence may be abused, and drive them to prevent the enjoyment of things which, although they are matters of private property, naturally give pleasure to many others besides the owners, under the fear that their good nature may be misunderstood. I can conceive nothing more unfortunate than that the owners of the right of fishing on large streams should be driven to prevent the successors and followers of Izaac Walton from dropping their lines for trout for fear that their doing so should crystallize into a right. It would be a most unfortunate thing for the public if that should ever happen, and I think that, however continuous, however lengthy the indulgence may have been, a jury ought to be warned against extracting out of it an inference unfavourable to the person who has granted the indulgence." I refer also to Chamber Colliery Co. v. Hopwood. I think, therefore, that there was no such right of access at Joss Gap as the defendant sets up, and I only add that, if there were, this would only bring the case to Blundell v. Catterall again, where there was a public right of way along some part of the foreshore. The facts as to the boats are still weaker, and what I have said as to a possible right of access for the purpose of fishing is to be borne in mind. If such a right exists (I do not say it does) it will not help the defendant. The alleged right or claim of access to get seaweed seems to me even further from having any bearing upon the question for decision.

The defendant sought at the outset to defend the case upon other two grounds upon which I will say a word. The first was that he endeavoured to set up against the lord a prescriptive right in Harmsworth of pasing from Joss Gap over the foreshore, and a user by the defendant and his boys of that prescriptive right by the leave and licence of Harmsworth. This was ultimately abandoned at the bar, for, as soon as it was shown that Harmsworth was a tenant of the manor and had been admitted tenant under services, it was of course impossible to contend that he could prescribe against the lord. Moreover, even if that had not been so, the considerations which I have suggested above as sufficient to defeat any claim of dedication to the public would, I think, defeat also any claim to prescription for an indefinite right to wander at will. The second was that it was attempted to set up a customary right in the inhabitants of the parish of St. Peter's to bathe at Joss Gap. I find that there is no such custom as alleged. The result of all this is that the defendant fails in establishing the right which he sets up. I declare that the plaintiffs, other than Turner, are entitled to the foreshore lying between ordinary high-water mark and ordinary low-water mark in Joss Bay, and I grant an injunction in the terms of paragraph 2 of the claim. The defendant must pay the costs of the action.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

Solicitors, Saltwell, Tryon, & Saltwell; Lewis & Lewis.

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) March 14.

ELLINGER & CO. AND SCHLESINGER v. MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. OF NEW YORK. (a.)

Insurance—Life—Undertaking not to commit suicide—Insurance for benefit of creditor—Executor suing as trustee for creditor.

An application for a policy was expressed to be "the basis and a part of a proposed" insurance contract, and the policy commenced by stating that "in consideration of the application . . . which is hereby made part of this contract," the company would insure the life subject to certain conditions. The application contained the following clause: "I also warrant and agree that I will not commit suicide, whether sane or insane, during the period of one year from the date of the said contract," which was signed by the person proposing to have his life insured. During the period of one year the assured committed suicide during a fit of temporary insanity.

Held, that the breach of the undertaking not to commit suicide rendered the policy void. The undertaking was a limitation of the defendants' liability, and not a personal undertaking the breach of which might give the defendants a claim against the estate of the deceased person.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

This was an action brought upon a policy of life insurance. The plaintiffs Ellinger & Co. were the creditors of one Max Firnberg, deceased. The plaintiff Schlesinger was Firnberg's executor, and sued as trustee for Ellinger & Co.

Firnberg, being indebted to Ellinger & Co., decided to insure his life for their benefit. Accordingly on the 23rd of May, 1902, he signed an application form for a policy with the defendant company.

The application was as follows: "This application made to the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York, is the basis and a part of a proposed contract for insurance . . . I hereby agree that all the following statements and answers . . . in continuation of this application are by me warranted to be true, and are offered to the company as a consideration of the contract, which I hereby agree to accept. . . ."

Then followed twenty statements, No. 9 of which was "The full name of the person to whom the insurance is payable is Ellinger & Co., Manchester."

No. 12 was "The insurable interest of the said beneficiary in the life proposed for insurance, other than that of family relationship, is to cover debt."

The application also contained the three following clauses:—

(i.) "I hereby warrant and agree that during the next two years following the date of issue of the contract of insurance for which application is hereby made, I will not travel or reside in any part of the Torrid Zone . . . and will not engage in any of the following extra-hazardous occupations or employments. . . ."

(ii.) "I further warrant and agree that I will not engage in any military or naval service in time of war, during the continuance of the said contract, without first obtaining written permission from this company."

(iii.) "I also warrant and agree that I will not commit suicide, whether sane or insane, during the period of one year from the date of the said contract."

The policy, which was dated the 24th of May, 1902, commenced as follows: "In consideration of the application for this policy which is hereby made part of this contract, the Mutual Life Assurance Co. of New York promises to pay . . . unto Ellinger & Co. . . . creditors of Max Firnberg, £4,000 . . . upon acceptance of satisfactory proofs of the death of the said Max Firnberg, provided such death takes place within the term of five years from the date hereof, during the continuance of this policy, upon the following condition and subject to the provisions . . . stated on the back of this policy . . . which are . . . made part hereof."

On the back of the policy was the following provision: "Military and naval service of any kind, the volunteer service of Great Britain and Ireland in the time of peace excepted . . . without permission in writing . . . is prohibited under this contract."

In November, 1902, and not till then, did Firnberg inform Ellinger & Co. of what he had done. On the 19th of February, 1903, Max Firnberg committed suicide in a fit of insanity.

The plaintiffs contended that the defendants were liable to pay upon the policy, that the breach of the undertaking not to commit suicide did not render the policy void. It was an independent promise by Firnberg, the breach of which might give the defendants a claim against the estate of the deceased. The act of suicide during temporary insanitary was merely an accident or misfortune.

The defendants contended that the breach of the undertaking made the policy void.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and Cababé, for the plaintiffs.

R. B. Haldane, K.C., and Rowlatt, for the defendants.

The following cases were referred to: Stoneham v. Ocean, Railway, and General Accident Insurance Co., 35 W. R. 716. 19 Q. B. D. 237; Hambrough v. The Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York, 72 L. T. 140; Fowkes v. The Manchester and London Life Assurance and Loan Association, 11 W. R. 622, 3 B. & S. 917, 32 L. J. Q. B. 153; Crawley v. National Employers' Accident and General Assurance Association, 1 T. L. Rep. 255, 1 Cababé & Ellis 597; Llanelly Railway and Dock Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 21 W. R. 889, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 942; and Barnard v. Faber, 41 W. R. 193, [1893] 1 Q. B. 340.

Cur. adv. vult.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

BIGHAM, J.—On the 23rd of May, 1902, Max Firnberg signed an application addressed to the defendant company for a policy of insurance for £4,000 for five years on his own life. The material parts of the document are as follows: "This application made to the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York is the basis and a part of a proposed contract for insurance. . . . I hereby agree that all the following statements and answers and all those that I make to the company's medical examiner in continuation of this application are by me warranted to be true, and are offered to the company as a consideration of the contract which I hereby agree to accept. . . ." Then follows twenty numbered statements, beginning with name of the applicant. The ninth statement is as follows: "The full name of the person to whom the insurance is payable is Ellinger & Co., Manchester." The twelfth statement is as follows: "The insurable interest of the said beneficiary in the life proposed for insurance other than that of family relationship is to cover debt." The words in italics are written. After these statements there are three clauses in the following words: "I hereby warrant and agree that during the next two years following the date of issue of the contract of insurance for which application is hereby made I will not travel or reside in any part of the torrid zone, or north of the parallel of 60° north latitude in the Western Hemisphere, or north of the parallel of 70° north latitude in the Eastern Hemisphere, and will not engage in any of the following extra hazardous occupations or employments—retailing intoxicating liquors, handling electric wires and dynamos, blasting, mining, submarine labour, aeronautic ascensions, the manufacture of highly explosive substances, service upon any railroad, train, or track, or in switching or in coupling cars, or on any steam or other vessel, unless written permission is expressly granted by the company. I further warrant and agree that I will not engage in any military or naval service in time of war during the continuance of the said contract without first obtaining written permission from this company. I also warrant and agree that I will not commit suicide, whether sane or insane, during the period of one year from the date of the said contract." The question in this case is as to the meaning and effect of the last of these three clauses, which refers to suicide. The policy was issued on the 24th of May, 1902. It commences with these words: "In consideration of the application for this policy, which is hereby made a part of this contract the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York promises to pay . . . unto Ellinger & Co. . . . creditors of Max Firnberg . . . their successors or assigns, £4,000 . . . upon . . . proofs of the death of the said Max Firnberg provided such death takes place within the term of five years from the date hereof . . . upon the following condition, and subject to the provisions, requirements, and benefits stated on the back of this policy, which are hereby referred to and made part hereof. The half annual premium of £56 16s. 8d. shall be paid in advance on the delivery of this policy and thereafter to the company at its principal agency in Great Britain on the 24th day of November and May in every year during the continuance of this contract until premiums for five full years shall have been duly paid to the said company." A number of provisions are printed on the back of the policy, only one of which need be referred to. It is as follows: "Military and naval service of any kind, the volunteer service of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace excepted, whether as combatant or non-combatant, without permission in writing, signed by one of the officers of the company, is prohibited under this contract." I have read the different so-called warranties and provisions because the plaintiffs relied upon them as showing in some way that the clause as to suicide was merely intended to operate as an independent promise and not as a limitation of the defendants' liability. It appears that when Firnberg took out this policy he owed money to Ellinger & Co. for some business debt. In November, 1902. Ellinger & Co. were pressing for payment of this debt, and then for the first time Firnberg told them that by way of securing the payment of their debt he had effected this policy. In February, 1903, Firnberg, during a fit of insanity, committed suicide. On the 25th of November, 1903, this action was brought upon the policy against the defendant company, the plaintiffs being Ellinger & Co., the creditors, and Richard Schlesinger, the executor of Firnberg's will, who is described as suing as trustee for Ellinger & Co. Firnberg died insolvent owing Ellinger & Co. £4,000 or more. The plaintiffs contend that the policy must be regarded as having been taken out by Firnberg on their behalf, and that they are therefore entitled to ratify and recover on it, and they say that the clause as to suicide amounts to nothing more than a personal undertaking by Firnberg, for the breach of which the defendants' remedy is limited to a claim against Firnberg's bankrupt estate. On the other hand, the defendants contend that the effect of the clause is to exclude liability on their part if death is due to suicide. I am of opinion that the defendants' contention is the right one. The policy was made by the defendants with Firnberg and with no one else. It is in no sense a contract with Ellinger & Co. Firnberg alone was responsible for the payment of the premiums. Neither subsequent notice to Ellinger & Co. of its existence nor ratification of it by them could alter or affect its original meaning. What, then, did the parties, Firnberg and the defendant company, intend when they inserted the warranty that Firnberg should not commit suicide? I think it is clear that they intended that in the event of suicide the company should not be liable on the policy. It does not matter, I think, whether the clause is called a warranty or not. It constitutes a limitation of the defendants' liability. Death within five years is the event upon the happening of which the defendants were to pay, but death by suicide within the first twelve months is excluded. Apt words have been used to express that intention, and it is, I think, impossible to read the clause as merely giving to the company a cross-claim against the estate of the deceased for damages.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitor for plaintiffs, G. Trenam, for Addleshaw & Co., Manchester.

Solicitors for defendants, Freshfields.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) — Dec. 11, 14.

REX v. GILLESPIE AND OTHERS. (a.)

Local government—Poor law—Rating—Part payment—Issue of distress warrant for balance—12 & 13 Vict. c. 14.

A ratepayer who was summoned for non-payment of a rate tendered a substantial portion of the rate in court, which tender was refused.

Held, that the magistrate was justified in refusing to issue a distress warrant except for the balance of the rate over and above the amount so tendered.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rule nisi for a mandamus to the stipendiary magistrate to issue a distress warrant.

The following facts appeared from the magistrate's affidavit: A complaint by John Kendall, an assistant overseer of the parish of West Ham, that Messrs. Boardman & Sons, being persons duly rated to the poor in a rate made on the 28th of April, 1903, in the sum of £441 8s. 9d. had not paid the said sum, but had refused and neglected to do so. A summons was then issued which was heard on the 22nd of July, 1903.

The assistant overseer produced the book containing the poor rate with the allowance by justices and the non-payment for seven days previous to the summons. He admitted in cross-examination that a tender of £416 had been made by Messrs. Boardman on account of the rate, but it had been returned to them. A similar tender made by Messrs. Boardman in court was refused. The magistrate refused to issue a distress warrant for more than £25 8s. 9d., being the balance of the rate. The magistrate was of opinion that it was contemplated by the statute that the ratepayers might tender and overseers might accept part payment of the rate. It was his duty to ensure payment to the overseers of the full amount of the rate, and he considered he did this by enabling them to take £416 in cash and granting them a distress warrant for £25 8s. 9d.

Robson, K.C. (Macmorran, K.C., and Artemus Jones with him), showed cause against the rule.—The Act contemplates that the magistrate should know whether the ratepayer has paid the rate or any part thereof before he issues his distress warrant, and here the ratepayer offered to pay the major portion of the rate. Non-payment of rates being a penal offence, the costs should not be unnecessarily increased against the ratepayer.

Danckwerts, K.C. (E. Morten and Sturges with him), in support of the rule.—The magistrate in these cases acts ministerially and not judicially. If he has proof that the rate is legal and that the defaulting ratepayer is liable, he must make the order. The rate is a debt, and the overseers as a creditor could say that they would not accept part payment.

He cited R. v. Price, 5 Q. B. D. 300; Newbould v. Coltman, 6 Ex. 189; Southwark Water Co. v. Hampton Urban District Council, 47 W. R. 177, [1899] 1 Q. B. 273; R. v. Handsley, 30 W. R. 368, 7 Q. B. D. 386; R. v. Blenkinsop, 40 W. R. 272, [1892] 1 Q. B. 43; Searles v. Sadgrave, 5 El. & B. 639; and Dixon v. Clark, 5 C. B. 306.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion this rule must be discharged. The question in this case we have to decide is, whether when an application is made to a magistrate under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, and the person against whom the application is made, who must be summoned, and who must be there, says, "Here is a part of the money; you can take it today," whether the magistrate is bound to issue a distress warrant for the whole amount. With the greater part of what has been said by counsel for the overseers I agree, and I also agree that the overseer is not bound to accept less than the full amount of the rate.

It is also the case that in general the duties of a magistrate on such an application are ministerial. The decisions show that where the rate has been legally made, and the magistrate is satisfied that the person summoned is the occupier and has not paid the rate, the grounds upon which he can refuse to issue a distress warrant are very limited. I do not think it necessary to go through those grounds or to give a complete catalogue of them, but I am not aware that there is any decision to justify the view that a magistrate is obliged to issue a distress warrant even if the defendant is prepared then and there to pay the whole amount, nor do I know of any authority which suggests that he must issue a distress warrant for the whole, if the overseers are offered then and there in cash a part of the amount due. I do not think that anyone can read 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14 without coming to the conclusion that the Legislature contemplated process being issued to enforce payment of part of the rate as well as the whole. It contemplates, on the one hand, that there may be an application for a warrant for less than the full amount, and it contemplates on the other that there may be an application for more than the full amount of the particular rate, because it orders the justices, in cases where applicable, to issue a distress warrant for the amount of the rate, and also of all arrears that may be due. It is perfectly true that the Act does not imperatively require the forms in the schedule to be followed, for it says in section 8 that forms to the same or like effect shall be sufficient in law, but still the wording of the forms in the schedule shows that it was intended that the Act might be put in force for the recovery of a part of the rate only. It has been urged upon us by counsel that the cases in which distress warrants have been issued for less than the full amount are all cases in which they have been so issued at the request of the overseers. That is probably true; but I think that, according to the principles of justice, seeing that the statute contemplates process going for a part of the rate when the magistrate is satisfied that a part of the money claimed is to be had in court for the asking, and the process of the court is only required to enforce payment of the balance, he has a right to refuse to issue his distress warrant for more than the balance. To hold otherwise would be to throw upon the recalcitrant ratepayer larger costs than is necessary, because the parties levying would be entitled to recover larger fees in respect of the larger amount.

LAWRANCE, J.—I agree.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether we are by this procedure in mandamus to compel a magistrate to issue a distress warrant in respect of the whole of a rate when on the hearing of the summons an actual tender of a large portion is made there and then in court before him. Primâ facie that would seem to be an unlikely course for the law to be compelled to sanction. Though it would involve no gain to the overseers, it would involve considerably greater cost to the ratepayer. And I see nothing in any previous decision which compels the court to hold that the mandamus ought to go. A ratepayer must, of course, pay the rate as ordered by law, and a magistrate, before whom the ratepayer is brought for non-payment of the rate, in issuing a distress warrant acts ministerally and not judicially, in this sense—that if it is a valid rate, and the ratepayer is in visible occupation of the property rated, the magistrate cannot go into any question except that of the rate being due and unpaid. In that sense his office is ministerial. But then arises the question, Is the magistrate, while accepting the amount of the rate as the amount for which he must put in force his powers under the Act, bound to disregard the fact that the person sought to be charged with the full amount offers to the overseers in court before him a less sum in part payment? I know of no authority obliging me to come to such a conclusion, and on the face of it, it seems most unreasonable to my mind. The cases cited by Mr. Danckwerts as to tender of a portion of the entire debt are beside the question, for no one suggests that any previous tender by a ratepeyer of a part of the debt would better his position. The magistrate is not there to try the question as to whether there has been a valid tender of the whole or part. But here the ratepayer actually offers cash in part payment in court, and what the magistrate has to look to is the amount which is actually unpaid. It could hardly be contended that if the ratepayer, having previously to the hearing refused to pay the rate, were to tender the whole amount of the rate in court, the overseers would be entitled to refuse the money and insist upon the distress warrant being issued. No doubt it might be the magistrate's duty to order the ratepayer in such a case to pay the costs incurred up to that point; it is quite another thing to say that he is bound to inflict upon him the heavier costs which the issue of a distress warrant would entail. While it is not the function of a magistrate to consider previous tenders, it seems to me that it would not be right to compel him to issue his warrant for the whole amount of a rate when either the whole or a part of it is actually offered in court before him.

Rule discharged.

Solicitors for overseers, Hillearys.

Solicitors for the respondents, Lloyd-George, Roberts & Co.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Nov. 13.

LAWRENCE & BULLEN v. AFLALO AND COOK. (a.)

Copyright — Literary copyright — Encyclopædia — Separate articles—Writer and publisher—Ownership of copyright—Separate publication—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), ss. 2, 18.

Where an author agrees with publishers to write for payment certain articles for an encyclopædia to be published and paid for by them, and the articles are published and paid for, then, there being no express agreement as to copyright, or evidence to the contrary, the natural and true inference of fact is that the copyright in the contributed articles belongs to the publishers.

Sweet v. Benning, 3 W. R. 519, 16 C. B. 459; Lamb v. Evans, 41 W. R. 405, [1893] 1 Ch. 218, approved.

Decision of Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 360, [1903] 1 Ch. 318) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Romer and Stirling, L.JJ., Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting) (51 W. R. 360, [1903] 1 Ch. 318), affirming a decision of Joyce, J. (50 W. R. 24, [1902] 1 Ch. 264).

In the year 1896 the respondent Aflalo submitted to the appellants, who are a firm of publishers, a scheme for the publication of a work to be called the Encyclopædia of Sport, with a view to their undertaking the publishing of it. The work was to consist of articles by well-known writers on various branches of sport. The appellants acquiesced, and by an agreement in writing dated the 10th of July, 1896, agreed to bear all the costs of publication, and to pay to Aflalo a fee of £500 for his editorial services, and he agreed to write, without further fee, seven thousand words of the special articles, and to contribute all the unsigned articles that might be required.

The encyclopædia was published in a series of parts, and was ultimately completed, under the part editorship of Aflalo, in 1899, and afterwards published in two volumes. The total cost of the producing of the encyclopædia to the publishers was about £19,000.

Aflalo contributed a signed article entitled "Sea Fishing," and a number of unsigned articles, and was duly paid by the defendants the agreed sum of £500. The respondent Cook agreed to write certain articles on specified terms and contributed three articles, entitled respectively "Coarse Fish," "Trout," and "Pike," and was paid for the same by the appellants at the agreed rate. Neither of the agreements contained any express stipulation as to the proprietorship of or copyright in any of the articles so contributed by them, and the respondents did not publish any of their articles separately or otherwise.

On the 27th of November, 1900, being the day before the issue of the writ in this action, the respondents respectively registered themselves in the book of registry as proprietors of the copyright in the four above-mentioned articles, all of which were published in the encyclopædia.

Early in 1900 the respondents published a book called the Young Sportsman, containing copies of each of these articles. This book was an abridged edition of the Encyclopædia of Sport. Subsequently the appellants called upon the respondents to discontinue the further sale and publication of this book, and to compensate them for the alleged infringement of their copyright; and upon their refusal to do so brought this action.

Joyce, J., decided in favour of the respondents, and this was upheld by a majority of Court of Appeal.

By section 2 of the Copyright Act, 1842, the word "book" is to mean and include "every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet," &c., "separately published." Section 3 enacts that the copyright in every "book" shall be the property of the author and his assigns. Section 18 enacts that when the proprietor of "any encyclopædia, review, magazine, periodical work, or work published in a series of books or parts" shall employ persons to compose the same, or any volumes, parts, essays, or portions thereof for publication in or as part of the same," and such work, volumes, &c., shall be composed under such employment, "on the terms that the copyright therein shall belong to such proprietor, . . . and paid for" by him, the copyright in such work "and in every volume, part, essay, article, and portion so composed and paid for shall be the property of such proprietor, . . . who shall enjoy the same rights as if he were the actual author thereof."

Haldane, K.C., and Younger, K.C. (T. L. Gilmour with them), for the appellants.—Sweet v. Benning, 3 W. R. 519, 16 C. B. 459, which was approved by the Court of Appeal in Lamb v. Evans, 41 W. R. 405, [1893] 1 Ch. 218, decided that no writing is necessary under section 18 of the Copyright Act, 1842, for the assignment of copyright. When such articles are written and paid for, the reasonable inference is that they are bought out and out.

Hughes, K.C., and Scrutton, K.C. (R. J. Parker with them), for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—If I had not come to the conclusion that this case was covered by authority, I should have desired further time to consider the mode in which I should express the views I entertain.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I think it is impossible, after the decision arrived at just about half a century ago in Sweet v. Benning upon this very point, confirmed as it is by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Lamb v. Evans, to doubt what the decision on this appeal ought to be. There may be a distinction between the inference of fact that would be drawn in different cases. As I have said more than once during the argument, it is not a question of law: it is a question of fact to be derived from all the circumstances of the case, what is the nature of the contract entered into between the parties.

I thought we had arrived at some sort of concurrence by the learned counsel in the course of the argument that, on the construction of this section 18 of the Copyright Act, 1842, there were, at all events, two propositions that could not be disputed. The first was that the bargain between the parties involving this question of copyright need not be in writing: as to that, I understand there is no dispute now, that it need not be in writing; secondly, that no express words were necessary in order to constitute the contract contemplated by the statute. One of the learned counsel has, I think, repudiated agreement with that proposition; the other, I think, without prejudice to his learned leader's argument, is disposed to concede it. But whether they are in agreement or not, I can entertain no doubt that this, like a great many other things in law, is one of those inferences which you are entitled to draw, but for which you can lay down no abstract rule. That which may be implied in a contract must depend very much on what the nature of the contract is, and whether or not the written contract displaces every other term whatsoever; because, in the infinite variety of dealings among mankind, there are some things which no one would think of expressing in terms, although undoubtedly they would form part of any contract made on such a subject. Although the decision in Sweet v. Benning is open to review in this House—in the sense that we are not estopped from considering it, as we should be by a decision of our own House—yet, where a state of law has been recognized for half a century and confirmed by the Court of Appeal, it would be, I think, a startling novelty for your lordships to treat that as res integra which we should determine for ourselves without reference to previous decisions. I should feel great hesitation in disagreeing with any proposition that had been laid down by such a court, presided over by such judges as those who decided Sweet v. Benning. I doubt very much whether in the whole history of English law it would be possible to find a collection of learned judges of keener intellect and more profound learning than those who decided that case—Jervis, C.J., Maule, J., and Cresswell, J. Speaking for myself, and remembering the sort of reputation those learned judges had when I was practising at the bar, and the authority given to their decisions, he would have been a very bold man indeed who, when those three judges agreed—not to mention Crowther, J.—would have ventured to question the authority of a decision of theirs. And that decision was approved by Lindley, Bowen, and Kay, L.JJ., in Lamb v. Evans.

The judges in Sweet v. Benning were unanimous in their decision that you could infer from the facts that the copyright was intended to belong to the publisher, though there was no express contract on the point. People do not spend money except upon the hypothesis that they will get something for it, and unless you give to the bargain the effect which the language itself seems to import, that the person who is the projector, the publisher, and who is called "the proprietor," is to stand in the shoes of the actual author, he would get nothing for his money; the whole object of his publication might be defeated the very next day by the same person to whom he had paid the money. It seems to me it would be a most unreasonable inference to draw from the facts in proof in this case if I were not to suppose that the person who paid the money and incurred the risk—I think to the extent of £19,000—was not to have the complete right such as the original author would have had, if the matter were not published in this way, to publish it himself. Therefore I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed.

Upon the other question—the meaning of the words "separately published"—I have not actually formed any opinion. It seems to me to involve a considerable amount of doubt and difficulty, and I propose to leave that question, because it is not necessary to decide it for the purposes of the present case. I move that the judgment be reversed.

Lord SHAND.—As the House has resolved that there shall be no decision given on the question which has been raised under section 2 of the statute as to the effect of the words "separately published," I shall say no more than that I am certainly not prepared, from the arguments we have heard, to agree with Vaughan Williams, L.J., in what he alone has said on that subject.

With reference to the case otherwise, I agree with what has fallen from the Lord Chancellor. I quite agree with what was decided in Sweet v. Benning; and if this question had now come up for the first time I should have been disposed to agree entirely in the general view taken by Vaughan Williams, L.J., upon it. Looking at all the circumstances in the present case, it appears to me that the articles are contributed on the footing that on payment under such employment they shall become the property of the publisher.

On these grounds, I am of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion. If this matter could be regarded as res integra, I think there would be a great deal to be said upon the construction of section 18—that it was for the publisher to prove an agreement that the author was employed upon the actual terms that the copyright should belong to the publisher. But any such proposition as that would be inconsistent with the law as laid down in Sweet v. Benning, and the more recent case of Lamb v. Evans.

The law which I understand to be laid down in Sweet v. Benning is that it is not necessary, according to the true construction of section 18 of the Copyright Act, 1842, that you should find an actual agreement that the copyright should belong to the proprietor; nor, indeed, is it even necessary to find special circumstances which lead to that conclusion. In Sweet v. Benning, the special case upon which the opinion of the Common Pleas was delivered contained a statement that nothing was said between the parties affecting copyright. I can find no special circumstances stated in the special case, and the decision seems to me to have been founded only upon the nature of the employment, the nature of the publication, and the relation of the parties. Joyce, J., says in his judgment in the present case, "I decide this case on the short ground that I see no special circumstance either in the nature of the work or in the terms or in the nature of the employment, from which I must infer that which is not expressed — namely, that the copyright is to belong to the publishers." That being so, he says in another passage that the consequence would not be different from what it would be in an ordinary case. I do not think that that decision was consistent with Sweet v. Benning or Lamb v. Evans. I think that what the court has to do is to look at all the circumstances of the case, and to say as a jury what is the inference which you would draw—or, as Bowen, L.J., puts it in his judgment in Lamb v. Evans, what is the way in which business men would look at the question.

The circumstances here are that the publisher is minded for his own profit to publish an encyclopedia of sport; he is prepared to spend, and he does spend, a very large sum of money, amounting to some thousands of pounds, upon the enterprize in which he is engaged; he employs a gentleman to act as editor and also to write some of the articles at a given salary, and through the editor he employs another gentleman to write articles for a given remuneration. Those are all the material facts of the case; and I have to ask myself what is the inference that I draw from those facts. That, I repeat, is a matter of fact, not a matter of law. No doubt one may gain some assistance from the way in which a similar set of facts have been regarded in other cases; but, after all, where it is a question of fact each case must stand upon its own merits. If I were to express my opinion as a juryman upon the facts I have mentioned, I should say that it was one of the terms on which these gentlemen were employed to write articles for the encyclopedia that the copyright should belong to the proprietor; and I say so for this reason: The encyclopedia was to be his property, it was to be his book, he was to derive the benefit and profit to be derived from its publication; and therefore I should assume that, in buying the articles written by these gentlemen, the inference is that both parties intended that the proprietor should have the right that was necessary for him adequately to protect the property which he had purchased, and the enterprize for the purpose of which these articles were intended to be used. In my judgment, he could not adequately protect the articles which he had purchased, or his property in the book for the purpose of which the articles were written and purchased, without having the right to prevent an invasion of the copyright in those articles. Therefore the inference I should draw would be the same as was drawn in Sweet v. Benning and Lamb v. Evans; and I am prepared to adopt every word of the judgments of Bowen, L.J., and of Kay, L.J., as well as the judgments in the earlier case. I will read one passage from the judgment of Kay, L.J.: "What is the fair inference from the facts of the case? Surely the inference is that the man who is to go to the expense of printing and publishing this book will, as between him and the agents he may have employed to assist him in the compilation of it, have in himself whatever property the law will give him in that book. That is the inference I should certainly draw; and, I think, in this case it is sufficiently clear, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the terms of employment of those several agents involved this, that the copyright in the portions of this book which they composed should belong to the owner of the book."

With regard to the other question—the construction of the words "separately published" in section 2 of the Copyright Act, 1842—I will only say that I think it is a question of some difficulty, and it is one which it is not necessary to deal with for the decision of this case, and therefore I shall not express any opinion upon it.

Lord ROBERTSON.—In my opinion this case ought to have been decided on the authority of Sweet v. Benning and Lamb v. Evans, as furnishing a principle applicable to the facts of the present case.

I do not think that the conclusion which I support is accurately described as inferring one of three statutory requirements from the existence of two. Whether that inference be legitimate or not must depend on the nature and the conditions of the employment; and the cases to which I refer do nothing to take the question out of the region of fact. But it is obvious that the facts of employment and of payment stand in a different category from the terms on which employment and payment take place, those terms being necessarily an element or ingredient in the employment and not a separate or independent fact. Accordingly, the view of the two lords justices about the three conditions all requiring, by the structure of the section, to be proved, really means that an express agreement about copyright must be proved or the writer retains the copyright. Unable as I am to accept this view, which is opposed to the decision in Sweet v. Benning, and indeed was not supported by counsel for the respondents, I am free to consider what is primâ facie the proper inference; and I prefer, on its merits and also from its authority, the inference of Sweet v. Benning.

I desire to say that I do not proceed at all on the argument of the words "separately published," which was raised at a late stage in the Court of Appeal and was apparently adopted by Vaughan Williams, L.J.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Elkin & Henriques.

Solicitors for the respondents, Field, Emery, Roscoe, & Medley.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 12.

In re SUSSEX BRICK CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Shares—Transfer—Registration—Special resolution for reconstruction before registration of transfer—Delay of company—Application for registration nunc pro tunc—Notice of dissent from resolution—Liquidation proceedings—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 35, 98, 131, 161, and 162.

Two transferees of two sets of fully paid-up shares in a company, transferred at different times, repeatedly applied to the secretary that they should be registered. The secretary replied that these transfers would be submitted at the next meeting of the company. Before these shares were registered in the names of the transferees, however, the company was voluntarily wound up, and a special resolution for reconstruction passed. The transferees thereupon sent in notices of dissent to the resolution, under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862; and as the liquidator refused to register their names, applied to have these transfers registered nunc pro tunc, and the certificates sent them.

Held, that, as unnecessary delay had taken place, the court had power under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, even after liquidation to make an order nunc pro tunc, if it did not work injustice to anyone, but such order was not ex debito justitiæ, but only at the discretion of the court.

Judgment of Buckley, J., varied.

In re Joint Stock Discount Co., Nation's case, 15 W. R. 143, L. R. 3 Eq. 77, discussed and followed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from part of an order by Buckley, J., and a cross-appeal by the defendant.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts were as follows:

G. B. Brown and D. G. H. Pollock, the applicants, on the 16th of January, 1901, had transferred to them 5,000 fully paid-up shares in the Sussex Brick Co.; this transfer was not at the time registered, but on the 3rd of March a further transfer of 17,234 shares was made to them. On the 12th of March the old certificates and transfer of these last shares, viz., 17,000 odd, were sent to the company, and the secretary in sending a receipt said it would be laid before the board, and the new certificate sent in due course. On the 27th of March, the transfer of the earlier shares, viz., the 5,000, was sent in, with a postal order, and at the same time a request that the certificate for the 17,000 might be sent back. On the 1st of April the secretary replied, saying that the books were closed until after the meeting (either of the board or of the company). On the 4th of April the applicants again applied for the certificates, and on the same day they received a letter from the secretary, saying that the transfer of the 5,000 shares had been duly received, and a certificate would be sent. Later, on the 6th of April, the applicants again pressed for the certificates. Meanwhile, on the 2nd of April, a resolution had been passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company, and on the 20th of April this resolution was confirmed, and a determination to reconstruct the company agreed on. The purpose was reconstruction, but the resolution was for a sale under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89). On the 25th of April, Brown and Pollock gave notice of their dissent, within the seven days prescribed by section 161, as they considered that they had done everything that was necessary to get themselves registered. The liquidator said he could not accept them as being registered shareholders, and as the directors had no power to register they could not be registered. The terms of the resolution of the 2nd of April, confirmed on the 20th, were: "That, it being desirable to reconstruct the company, the company be wound up; and that F. A. Rawlings be and he is hereby appointed liquidator. That a new company having the name of the 'Sussex Brick and Estates Co. (Limited)' or other suitable name be formed . . . for the purposes inter alia of acquiring the properties, assets, and undertaking of this company. That the liquidator be and is hereby authorized, pursuant to section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, to enter into and carry into effect, with such modification (if any) as he shall approve, an agreement for the sale and transfer of the properties, assets, and undertaking of this company to the said new company, a draft whereof is submitted to this meeting."

On the refusal of the liquidator to register their names, as they were not already on the register of members, the applicants, as transferees, applied by originating summons to have the transfers registered nunc pro tunc, by inserting their names as members, as joint holders of the shares. The application asked that the registration might date as from the date when the shares ought to have been registered—viz., as to the said 17,254 shares from the said 20th of March, 1903, and as to the said 5,000 shares as from the 4th of April, 1903.

Buckley, J., ordered that the register of members of the Sussex Brick Co. be rectified by registering therein the two transfers; but refused to date back the registrations to the 20th of March and the 4th of April respectively. As this was not all that was asked for, the plaintiffs appealed.

There was a cross-appeal by the respondent liquidator that the whole of Buckley, J.'s, order should be reversed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant plaintiffs.—Where the register is rectified for undue delay, and if not rectified would render the person liable as a member, the court will date back the registration: In re Joint Stock Discount Co., Nation's case, 15 W. R. 143, L. R. 3 Eq. 77. Here the plaintiffs are entitled to have the registration dated back, because on the 4th of April and the 21st of March respectively they were entitled to be members of the company. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The 35th section provides for rectification, not only where a wrong name is on the register, but where there has been unnecessary delay.] This order of Buckley, J., ought to be varied.

He referred to sections 161 and 162 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89).

Gore-Browne, K.C., and J. E. Harman, for the defendant, the liquidator.—Nation's case was decided under section 98 of the Companies Act, which links together for this purpose the settling of the list of contributories and the rectifying of the register. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Buckley, J., in his book says Nation's case was decided under section 35; section 98 is not mentioned once in the case.] If that is so, the only remedy for the plaintiffs is under section 35, and perhaps damages. Section 35 is preserved in section 98. Up to liquidation the governing document is the document of registration, after liquidation it is the list of contributories. The object of the scheme of reconstruction is to find out how to carry on the business. If application is made under section 35 it entitles a man only to have the registration rectified.

They referred to In re National Bank of Wales (Taylor, Phillips, and Rickard cases), 45 W. R. 401, [1897] 1 Ch. 298.

Muir Mackenzie replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that the plaintiffs' appeal must be allowed. I propose to deal with this case as a case in which there has been an unfortunate accident, which resulted in very unnecessary delay in the putting of the names of the applicants Brown and Pollock upon the register. If one looks at section 35 of the Act of 1862, it says: "If the name of any person is without sufficient cause entered in or omitted from the register of members of any company under this Act, or if default is made or unnecessary delay takes place in entering on the register the fact of any person having ceased to be a member of the company, the person or member aggrieved, or any member of the company or the company itself, may, as respects companies registered in England or Ireland, by motion in any of his Majesty's superior courts of law or equity . . . or in such other manner as the said courts may direct, apply for an order of the court that the register may be rectified; and the court may either refuse such application, with or without costs, to be paid by the applicant, or it may, if satisfied of the justice of the case, make an order for the rectification of the register and may direct the company to pay all the costs of such motion, application, or petition, and any damages the party aggrieved may have sustained." Now, in this case there can be no doubt that the names of these gentlemen ought to have been on the register at an earlier time, and, so far as this case is concerned, at a date earlier than the time of the holding of the meetings with regard to the reconstruction of this company. Now, under these circumstances, if one looks at Nation's case, 15 W. R. 143, 3 Eq. 77, and sees what is said there, there can be no doubt that that case is an authority for the proposition that where it is right that an order for rectification should be made (and Lord Romilly draws no distinction between whether there is an order for rectification by taking the name off or by putting a name on to the register), the court may make an order not only that the right name shall be put on or taken off the register, as the case may be, but that the register shall be treated as if the name had been on or off the register, when it ought to have been on or off the register.

Now what is suggested is this. It is said, on behalf of the liquidator, "It is quite true that may be done in the exercise of the power given by section 35 of the Act," but really the power which was actually exercised by Lord Romilly was a power exercised in respect of a list of contributories; and after the commencement of liquidation the only power under which the register can be rectified is under the 98th section, and you are no longer acting under the 35th section. The 98th section says, "As soon as may be after making an order for winding up the company the court shall settle a list of contributories, with power to rectify the register of members in all cases where such rectification is required in pursuance of this Act, and shall cause the assets of the company to be collected, and applied in discharge of its liabilities." It is said that after the liquidation, rectification is really under section 98, and that under these circumstances this rectification ought not to be made nunc pro tunc. On that point there is the case of In re The Scottish Universal Finance Bank (Buckridge's case), 13 W. R. 677, 2 H. & M. 642 (Wood, V.C.). Really, when one looks at it, this particular point was raised there. Mr. Morris in argument says, "The 98th section of the Act is a positive direction as to the course which is to be pursued. The court is to settle a list of contributories, with power to rectify the register, so far as may be necessary." When the learned Vice-Chancellor came to give judgment, what he says is this, at p. 645: "It is said in opposition to the motion, that it is irregular after a winding-up order has been made, because the whole matter is then in the hands of the court, and I am referred to the 98th section of the Act to show that the rectification of the register is, after such an order, a matter merely auxiliary to the settlement of the list of contributories. But there is nothing in that section to prohibit the court from acting in respect of the share register of the company, in any manner in which it might have acted had that section not existed, and I cannot therefore hold that the hands of the court are in any manner tied by that section." Really that decision of Wood, V.C., seems to me to be exactly in point, and to negative the argument which counsel for the respondent liquidator has submitted to us. I see really that that view is taken by Buckley, J., in the last edition of his book (Buckley on the Companies Acts (8th ed., 1902), at p. 322), in which he cites several other authorities besides Buckridge's case, which I have just referred to, and although I have not looked at them, I have no doubt that those other authorities cited by him bear out the same proposition. Buckley, J., says: "After a winding-up order has been made, the power of rectification given to the court by section 35 is not cut down and reduced to a mere power of rectification in the settling of the list of the contributories. It is open to a contributory after the order has been made, and before the list of contributories has been settled, to move for rectification under this section and the 35th section." I have only to add this, that I do not mean for a moment to suggest that anyone is entitled to such an order ex debito justitiæ; it is a matter in the discretion of the judge, and there might be cases in which the learned judge might refuse to make an order in favour of the applicant if he thought it would work injustice in respect of other people. If I thought here that it would work injustice to other people, and especially if I thought it would work injustice to persons who are not in any way bound to bear the mistakes of the company, I should carefully consider before I made any order. But in the present case there is no suggestion of any such state of things at all. The suggestions that have been made are that if we make this order we shall invalidate the resolution, because the meeting will not have been properly called, and a variety of other suggestions of that sort, which were dealt with in the course of the argument. As the matter stands we can do justice and prevent any wrong accruing to the applicants Brown and Pollock without doing injustice to anyone else.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first objection raised in this case to the exercise of the jurisdiction, which is conferred on the court by section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, is that the court is deprived of the power of exercising that jurisdiction, except for the purpose of settling the list of contributories. That objection is based on the wording of section 98. It is said that the power, therefore, of rectification which is derived under section 35 is confined to the settlement of the list of contributories. I think that is entirely contrary to previous decisions. There is not only the case to which Vaughan Williams, L.J., has referred—namely, Buckridge's case, but I observe in looking at another case which is cited in Buckley, J.'s, book, Reese River Mining Co. v. Smith, L. R. 4 H. L. 64, at p. 80, there is the high authority of Lord Cairns for the proposition which was laid down by Sir W. Page-Wood in Buckridge's case. Lord Cairns says: "Notwithstanding the winding up, the court, under section 98, is to rectify the register of members in all cases where such rectification is required in pursuance of the Act—that is to say, at all events, in those cases pointed out by section 35." Now, the present case falls within the 35th section because, as the learned judge has found, and the finding of fact is really not disputed, in the language of the Act, "unnecessary delay has taken place in the entering on the register the fact of a person having ceased to be a member of the company," and he has also found that the names of the applicants, Brown and Pollock, have been omitted without sufficient cause from the register. That being so, the jurisdiction to make such an order as Buckley, J., has made exists, and the order therefore must be sustained as far as it goes. But then it is said the present appeal, which was opened on behalf of the plaintiffs, seeks to fix the date at which the change on the register is to be operative. Now, it is contended that the court, under section 35, has no power to do that. There again it seems to me we have the guidance of authority as old as the decision of Lord Romilly, M.R., in Nation's case, which was given in the year 1866. That order was made by the Master of the Rolls, no doubt, having regard to section 98, in the exercise of the powers conferred by section 35. It is therefore an authority that in a proper case the court has power to fix a date at which the change in the register is to be made.

But then after that there comes, no doubt, a serious question. The application of the appellants is in substance that the registration be made nunc pro tunc. Now when an application of that sort is made, the court ought to very careful to see that it does no injustice by making the registration really retrospective. I may point out that the power which is conferred by section 35 is not imperative. All that it provides is that the court may, in a proper case, make an order for rectification. Therefore the court has full discretion to deal with every particular case which comes before it, in such a way as may produce complete justice; but in the present case I fail to see that any injustice will be done if the alteration is made as is asked. What took place is this: the present applicants, pressing to have their transfers registered, and seeking their certificates as early as possible, get answers from the secretary of the company which led them to believe that by the date of the last meeting the register would be altered, and they would appear as members. Supposing this had been done, although they had not received their certificates, they sent in notices of dissent from the special resolution in the way prescribed by section 161 of the Act. That gave the liquidator full notice of the position that they took in the matter, and he chose to disregard it. Then this application is made to Buckley, J., with the result that the register is altered in favour of the applicants. There is no evidence before us to satisfy me in any way that any injustice is likely to accrue from the alteration of the register being dated so as to cover the notice which was given by the present appellants in the exercise of the rights which they had as members under section 161. I think, therefore that the order asked for ought to be made.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that the argument of counsel for the respondent liquidator is really based on this hypothesis, that the register of members is a thing which ceases to have any real operation or existence after the winding-up order, that the only right which can then be dealt with, after a winding-up order, is to be given effect to by making some change in the list of contributories. Well, if one comes to look at the scheme and method of the Act, the register of members is one thing, and the list of contributories is an entirely different thing. The list of contributories, to mention one distinction, what is known as list "A" and list "B," is something larger than, and different from, the register of members; and the Act itself, as it seems to me, indicates in no doubtful manner that notwithstanding a winding-up the register of members and the status of members may be altered. Now section 131, the very section under which Buckley, J., has acted, or under which he has partly acted, says: "Whenever a company is wound up voluntarily the company shall, from the date of the commencement of such winding-up, cease to carry on its business, except in so far as may be required for the beneficial winding-up thereof, and all transfers of shares, except transfers made to or with the sanction of the liquidators, or alterations in the status of the members of the company taking place after the commencement of such winding-up shall be void. . . ." That section asserts that there may be after a winding-up transfers of shares with the sanction of the liquidators. That being so, it seems to me that quite apart from any list of contributories there is the register of members to which all the provisions of section 35 of the Act ought to be applied. The authorities to which Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., have called attention seem to me conclusively to show, that the power given by section 35 is independent of that which is found by reference under section 98. I therefore cannot doubt that the court now has the right to exercise every power which is conferred by section 35 where we find there has been an undue delay in registering a transfer. That there has been undue delay here, is found as a fact by the learned judge, and the accuracy of that finding is really not disputed. Then we have authority going back to the very early days of the Companies Act that an order under section 35 may be made having a retrospective effect—"may," I say, not "must" be made—may be made in a proper case, may be made imposing such conditions as the court thinks necessary to protect the rights of any third persons. But in a case like this, where there has been no real serious suggestion of any ill result or any unjust consequence which would follow from dating the transfers as at the date when they ought have been made, I think the order proposed is quite right.

Plaintiffs' appeal allowed; Respondent's appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Ingle, Holmes, Sons & Pott.

Solicitors for the respondent, Morris Fuller, & Co.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Dec. 16.

CROWTHER v. WEST RIDING WINDOW CLEANING CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — Building — Scaffolding — Ladder — Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the injured workman and another man were engaged at the time of the accident in whitewashing the interior of a shed more than 30 feet in height, and that they made use of a ladder by either standing or sitting on the rungs for the purpose of applying the whitewash to the higher parts of the shed. The county court judge found as a fact that the ladder was not a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act.

Held, that this finding was not wrong in point of law.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the Bradford County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a workman who had been injured by an accident in the course of his employment.

The employers had undertaken the work of whitewashing the interior of a wool-combing shed, which was more than 30ft. in height, and the work was being carried out by the applicant and another workman by means of a pump and a flexible pipe. It appeared that there was a ladder in the shed, and the men made use of it in their work by placing it against the wall and either standing or sitting on the rungs. This enabled them more easily to apply the whitewash to the higher parts of the building. By an accidental bursting of part of the apparatus some of the whitewash flew into the applicant's face and he lost the sight of one eye.

The county court judge found as a fact that the shed was not being repaired by means of scaffolding within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and on that ground refused to make an award of compensation.

The applicant appealed.

J. J. Wright, for the applicant.—The county court judge was wrong in point of law. He thought he was bound to hold that this ladder was not a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act, by the decision of the House of Lords in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., 49 W. R. 380, [1901] A. C. 49. But that decision shows that a "scaffolding" within the Act covers more than is popularly understood by the term. In Veazey v. Chattle, 50 W. R. 263, [1902] 1 K. B. 494, the Master of the Rolls said that the effect of Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co. was that a ladder might be a scaffolding. This case is distinguishable from Marshall v. Rudeforth, 50 W. R. 596, [1902] 2 K. B. 175. There the ladder was used merely as a ladder for the purpose of ascent and descent. Here the ladder was used in the way in which scaffolding is generally used in the repair of a building.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Compston, for the employers, was not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—As I understand the decision of the county court judge, he found as a matter of fact that this ladder was not a scaffolding within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. We have no jurisdiction to interfere with a finding of fact if there is evidence to support it. The applicant therefore argued that the decision was wrong in point of law, and that a ladder, used as the ladder in this case was used, must as a matter of law be a scaffolding. I am not prepared to assent to that. Having regard to the case of Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., I do not think it can be laid down that a ladder cannot under any circumstances be a scaffolding. But I am not prepared to say that the finding of fact of the county court judge that this particular ladder used in this particular way was not a scaffolding is wrong in law.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Wrensted & Hind, for W. H. Scott, Bradford.

Solicitors for the employers, W. A. Crump & Son, for Neill & Holland, Bradford.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Feb. 20.
Byrne, J. }

In re CHURCH STRETTON MINERAL WATER CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice — Debenture-holders' action — Short cause— Affidavits in support.

In actions coming on as short causes without pleadings or notice of motion copies of the affidavits in support should be left with the papers for the use of the judge.

This was a debenture-holder's action which the master had directed to be set down as a short cause to come on with minutes of the proposed order.

H. E. Wright.

Ryland.

Llewellyn Williams.

Upon the hearing,

BYRNE, J.—In cases like the present, which come on as short causes without pleadings or notice of motion, copies of the affidavit in support should be left with the papers for the use of the judge.

Solicitors. Chester, Broome, & Griffithes; Woodcock, Ryland, & Parker; A. W. Osmond.

(a.) Reported by PERCY WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. } Feb. 26; March 1.
Farwell, J. }

LAWSON v. REYNOLDS. (a.)

Justices — Petty sessions — County business — Borough business — County justices — Jurisdiction — Precedence of mayor.

The county justices for the petty sessional division of Highgate sat at Hornsey in petty sessions. The business of the court included an information against H. for an offence committed within the borough on a summons against H. signed by a county justice. The mayor of Hornsey claimed the right to take the chair.

Held, when a case has once been earmarked as county business or borough business by the issue of a proper summons to appear before the county or the borough tribunal, the county justices or the borough justices, as the case may be, have seisin of it, and the other body of justices, although having concurrent jurisdiction, cannot intercept the case. The business in this case was not borough business for the purpose of founding a claim for the mayor to take the chair. It was, in fact, ab initio and remained throughout, county business.

This was an action by the Mayor of Hornsey claiming a declaration that he is entitled by virtue of section 155 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, to precedence over all justices of the peace for the county when sitting at petty sessions within the borough.

The facts are set out in the judgment of Farwell, J.

The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, provides: Section 155.—"(1) The mayor shall, by virtue of his office, be a justice for the borough, and shall, unless disqualified to be mayor, continue to be such a justice during the year next after he ceases to be mayor. (2) The mayor shall have precedence over all other justices acting in and for the borough, and be entitled to take the chair at all meetings of justices held in the borough at which he is present by virtue of his office as mayor; except that he shall not, by virtue of this section, have precedence over the justices acting in and for the county in which the borough or any part thereof is situate, unless when acting in relation to the business of the borough, or over any stipendiary magistrate engaged in administering justice."

Macmorran, K.C., and E. Beaumont, for the plaintiff.

Warmington, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., and Eustace Hills, for the defendants.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: The mayor of Hornsey claims a declaration that he is entitled, by virtue of section 155 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, to precedence over all justices of the peace for the county when sitting at petty sessions within the borough and acting in relation to the business of the borough under the following circumstances: The borough of Hornsey forms part of the county of Middlesex, and was incorporated by Royal Charter of the 17th of August, 1903. The plaintiff was duly elected mayor of the borough on the 9th of November, 1903, and has taken the oath of allegiance and the judicial oaths required to be taken by a justice of the peace for the borough and also by a justice of the peace for the county. The borough has not a separate court of quarter sessions, nor has it a separate commission of the peace, and the county justices continue to hold petty sessional courts for the Highgate division in exactly the same way as they held them before the incorporation, and their jurisdiction is in no way abridged or affected by the incorporation.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question turns on the true construction of section 155 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. [His lordship read the section, and continued:] The Act obviously contemplates that the mayor will sit with the county justices, and gives him the right to take the chair at all meetings of justices held in the borough at which he is present virtute officii, and not merely at meetings of borough justices, for, having regard to the exception, I cannot read "justices" as if it were "such justices." This right to attend meetings of the county justices is in accordance with the general law as laid down in Rex v. Amos, 2 B. & A. 533, and stated by Lord Blackburn in Mayor of Reigate v. Hart, 16 W. R. 896, L. R. 3 Q. B., at p. 248, that in a borough where there is no court of quarter sessions and no non-intromittant clause in the charter (which is this case) the justices of the borough have no exclusive jurisdiction within the borough and no jurisdiction beyond the borough, but act in ease and in aid of the county justices, so far as they act upon what are at the same time borough and county offences, and all acts that the borough justices can do can be done by the county justices. The county justices and the borough justices have exactly the same powers and authorities, but the ambit of the exercise of such powers is different—that of the county justices includes, and that of the borough justices is limited to, offences committed within the borough. They may act together (per Lord Kenyon, Rex v. Sainsbury, 4 T. R .456), and the county justices cannot lawfully exclude the borough justices (Reg. v. Williamson, 7 Times L. R. 534), and the county justices can, if they please, sit with the borough justices in petty sessions for the borough and dispose of borough business. This brings me to the consideration of the exception. I observe that the sub-section begins by giving precedence and the right to take the chair, while the exception specifies precedence only, and I do not forget that under the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, it was held that words giving precedence only applied to social and not to magisterial precedence—e.g., Ex parte The Mayor of Birmingham, 9 W. R. 34, 30 L. J. Q. B. 2; but I do not think that it is possible so to limit the exception, having regard to the reference to business.

The next question, to my mind, is, "What is meant by 'the business of the borough'?" The facts in the present case, and on which alone I express an opinion are as follows: On the 9th of December, 1903, the county justices for the petty sessional division of Highgate sat at Hornsey in petty sessions. The business of the court included an information laid against Gerald Herman for throwing stones within the borough on a summons against Herman signed by a county justice. On the case being called on the mayor claimed the right to take the chair, on the ground that he was entitled so to do in all cases in which the offence had been committed within the borough. His right was not admitted, and this action is brought to establish such right. I am of opinion that the mayor has no such right. The court was sitting as a petty sessional division, not as petty sessions. The summons was granted by a county justice, and the connty justices had full jurisdiction to deal with the case. The fact that if there were a mayor and ex-mayor, so as to constitute a quorum, they could have sat in petty sessions (see Reg. v. Whittles, 13 Q. B., at p. 254), and have granted a summons to bring the prisoner before them does not make the trial of this offence business of the borough. It was, in fact, business of the county, and not the less so because it might in certain events have been dealt with as business of the borough. Even if there were a quorum of borough justices, they could not as such try the case after the jurisdiction of the county justices had attached. When a case has once been earmarked as county business or borough business by the issue of a proper summons to appear before the county or the borough tribunal, as the case may be, the county justices or the borough justices, as the case may be, have seisin of it, and the other body of justices, although having concurrent jurisdiction, cannot intercept the case.

The question before me is governed, in my opinion, by the decision of the Court of King's Bench in Rex v. Sainsbury, 4 T. R. 451, that where two sets of magistrates have a concurrent jurisdiction and one appoints a meeting to grant ale licences their jurisdiction attaches so as to exclude the others, although both might sit together. In that case the mayor and some of the aldermen of the City had by charter jurisdiction in Southwark, but as the charter contained no intromittant clause the justices of Surrey had a concurrent jurisdiction. Lord Kenyon at p. 456 says: "But another question has arisen, and which is proper should be settled—whether it be legal (for whether it be decent or decorous no person can doubt) for two different sets of magistrates, having concurrent jurisdiction, to run a race in the exercise of any part of their jurisdiction? It is of infinite importance to the public that the acts of the magistrates should not only be substantially good, but also that they should be decorous. The facts in this case are shortly these. Some of the justices for the county of Surrey, having before them the statute of 26 Geo. 2, and knowing that the licences ought to be granted on a certain day and time, appointed a day—the 4th of September—for licensing alehouses in this division, on which day they accordingly held their meeting; and certain of the magistrates of the City of London, who in general are competent to this purpose, appointed another meeting on a subsequent day. But the jurisdiction of the justices who had appointed the first meeting had attached before this time, not indeed, so as to exclude the City justices from acting at the first meeting, for they might all have acted together, but it excluded the City justices of their jurisdiction to act on the subsequent day. On the general question, therefore, I am clearly of opinion that the Surrey justices and the magistrates for the City have a co-ordinate jurisdiction in this district; that the meeting of the City justices in this case was illegal, the jurisdiction of the other magistrates having first attached."

In my opinion the mayor in the case before me could not issue a summons against, or hold a petty sessions for the borough on, a prisoner already summoned before the county justices, because the jurisdiction of the latter had already appropriated it as county business, and by parity of reasoning he cannot be heard to intervene and say that it is borough business for the purpose of founding upon it a claim to take the chair at a meeting of the county justices sitting for the petty sessional division to try it. It was, in fact, ab initio and remained throughout county business. In the same way, if there were a borough petty sessions and the summons had required the prisoner to attend there, the county justices could not have intercepted it, and if they had chosen to sit at the borough sessions the mayor would have taken the chair. The result is that the action fails and is dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, L. J. Lathom.

Solicitor for the defendant, Sir Richard Nicholson.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Feb. 16, 18, 23.

In re FRENCH BREWSTER.
WALTERS v. FRENCH BREWSTER. (a.)

Merger—Charge—Intestacy of portioner—Owner of land next-of-kin—No administration—Merger of beneficial interest.

A father was the settlor of a portion term which became vested in his son. The father became beneficially entitled to the portion on the decease of his son intestate in the father's lifetime. The father did not take out letters of administration to the son.

Held, that it was for the benefit of the father that the portion should sink into the estate. That the father's own beneficial interest in the charge, as the sole next-of-kin of the son, had merged in the estate.

Originating summons.

Robert A. B. French Brewster married Geraldine Cooper in 1876.

This marriage was dissolved in 1891. There was issue of the marriage four sons, the eldest being Robert A. French Brewster. The second son, Henry G. French Brewster, who attained twenty-one in his father's lifetime died in January, 1900, and was not married. Arthur A. French Brewster, and a fourth son who died in infancy. R. A. B. French Brewster married a second time, and his widow, Mrs. Annie V. French Brewster, was still living.

Mrs. Geraldine French Brewster was also living.

By a marriage settlement dated the 27th of September, 1876, on his marriage with G. Cooper, R. A. B. French Brewster charged his Irish properties with rent-charges for his wife, and a portions charge of £15,000 for the younger children.

On the dissolution of the marriage of R. A. B. French Brewster and G. French Brewster a deed of covenant, dated the 2nd of June, 1891, was entered into by R. A. B. French Brewster in the terms of an order of the Divorce Division. R. A. B. French Brewster died in May, 1901. His will and codicil were proved in November, 1901.

In July, 1902, an originating summons was issued at the instance of Mrs. Annie French Brewster for the administration of the estate of R. A. B. French Brewster.

The trustees of the settlement took out the present summons for the settlement of the following amongst other questions: whether the sum of £7,500 (being the moiety of the portions charge of £15,000) which became vested in Henry G. French Brewster had merged and was no longer raisable.

Eve, K.C., and E. J. Elgood, for the trustees of the settlement charging the portions, submitted that a question has arisen by reason of the death of the second son Henry, who attained twenty-one and who was killed in January, 1900. His right to the £7,500 had vested, and the question is whether by reason of his death, leaving his father his sole next-of-kin, the sum of £7,500 being a moiety of the portions charge of £15,000, has merged in the fee simple settled by the marriage settlement, which, subject to the jointure rent-charge and portions charge thereby created, belonged absolutely to the testator, or whether it is still raisable. This is a question between the eldest son and the son Arthur. The eldest son takes it if it is raisable, and if it is sunk into the inheritance they benefit rateably between the two.

Hon. Frank Russell, for the defendant, Robert A. French Brewster, submitted that it was his interest to contend that there had been no merger, in order that the personal estate of which Robert was tenant for life might be freed.

Hodge, for Arthur A. French Brewster, submitted that the £7,500 never became vested in the son Henry, so that the father became entitled, as being sunk in the inheritance.

Vernon Smith, K.C., and A. E. Russell, for the executors of the father, Robert A. B. French Brewster.

Martelli, for a jointress.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The only remaining question is whether the portion of £7,500 which vested, but which the father became beneficially entitled to on the decease of his son intestate in the father's lifetime, has sunk into the estate out of which it was to be raised, or must be treated as still subsisting and forming part of the father's personal estate.

In my opinion it was clearly for the benefit of the father that it should sink into the estate, having regard to the father's covenant that the premises should continue to be of the full clear yearly value of £1,800. The extinction of this charge would reduce the father's liability upon this covenant, and the lands charged would become a better security for the remaining moiety of the portion of £15,000. Again, the father never manifested any intention of keeping alive the charge, and although the son died in January, 1900, and the father not until the 20th of May, 1901, the father did not take out any letters of administration to his son.

The objection urged to the merger or extinguishment of the charge is that the father did not own the estate and the charge in the same right. He was entitled to the estate beneficially, but was only entitled to the charge upon taking out administration to his son, and that any debts of the son would first have to be paid before the title of the father to the residue was cleared.

The answer to this objection is that no question of merger arises until all debts and other claims (if any) against the son's estate have been discharged. It is only in respect of the interest, which the father takes beneficially in the son's estate, that merger arises, so that no prejudice can be occasioned to third parties. It is not claimed that if the father had taken out letters of administration to his son merger would at once have taken place, irrespective of any liabilities of the son. The father would not in that case have been entitled to the land and the estate of his son in the same right, and there would not have been any merger to the prejudice of the son's creditors: In re Radcliffe, Radcliffe v. Baver, 40 W. R. 323, [1892] 1 Ch. 227.

This, however, does not affect the question before me, which is whether the father's own benefical interest in the £7,500, as the sole next-of-kin of the son has not merged, and in my opinion it has.

Having once arrived at the conclusion that it was for the benefit of the father that it should merge, I see nothing to prevent the extinguishment of the charge taking place.

It is established by unquestionable authority that where the owner of land becomes entitled beneficially to a charge thereon as next-of-kin of a person entitled to the charge, the charge will sink, if it is for the benefit of the person entitled to the land that it should, even although some person other than the owner of the land became the legal personal representative of the owner of the charge, and even although the charge be secured by an outstanding term vested in trustees, for the purpose of raising the charge. This was decided by Lord Loughborough in 1793 in the case of Lord Compton v. Oxenden, 2 Ves. jun. 261. In that case a lunatic was entitled to land, and his sister Elizabeth Bromfield was entitled to two sums of £1,500 each, secured upon it, one of which two sums was secured by a trust term. She died intestate, leaving her brother her sole next-of-kin. After the lunatic's death, a bill was filed by his next-of-kin, claiming that these two sums of £1,500 each formed part of the lunatic's estate, and had not sunk into the land, and on the other hand it was insisted by Sir Henry Oxenden, the heir-at-law of the lunatic, that he inherited the land free from any charge in favour of the personal estate. It was urged on behalf of the plaintiff that the two sums of £1,500 each would have been liable for the debts of Elizabeth, and that in the absence of any election by the lunatic it ought not to be held that the charge had merged, merely because as sole next-of-kin to his sister the lunatic had become entitled to the benefit of the charge. Lord Loughborough, however, held that the heir took the land discharged from the burden which had become merged in the inheritance, and that it made no difference that one of the two sums was secured by a trust term. This case is precisely in point, and the circumstances are undistinguishable from the present.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Again, in Forbes v. Moffatt, 18 Ves. 384, Sir William Grant said: "Upon the subject" (of merger or extinguishment of a charge) "a court of equity is not guided by the rules of law. It will sometimes hold a charge extinguished where it would subsist at law, and sometimes preserve it where at law it would be merged."

Again, in Swabey v. Swabey, 15 Sim. 106, it was held by Shadwell, V.C., that certain charges on real estate were kept alive so far as was necessary for the payment of certain debts and legacies, and subject thereto sunk into the inheritance, and that the next-of-kin had no equity to have the balance of the amount of the charges raised and paid to them.

Accordingly I decide that the £7,500 in question in this case has sunk into the inheritance.

Solicitors. Gush, Phillips, Walters, & Williams; Martineau & Reid; Robert Todd.

K. B. Div. (Buckley, J.) — Feb. 19, 22; March 1.

SOUTH-WEST SUBURBAN WATER CO. v. ST. MARYLEBONE GUARDIANS. (a.)

Water — Pauper school — Supply of water for domestic purposes—Trade, manufacture, or business—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 35, 53—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 93), s. 12.

Although the maintenance and education of pauper children by guardians of the poor is a "business" within section 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, yet, inasmuch as the premises wherein such business is carried on constitute a "dwelling-house" within section 53 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, the guardians are entitled to demand a supply of water to the premises for domestic purposes, provided that they put themselves into a position to confine the user of the water so supplied to purposes which are domestic.

The meaning of the term "domestic purposes" discussed.

Observations on Barnard Castle Urban District Council v. Wilson, 50 W. R. 92, 51 W. R. 102, [1901] 2 Ch. 813, [1902] 2 Ch. 746.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This action, which was tried before Buckley, J., sitting as an additional judge of the King's Bench Division, raised the question whether guardians are entitled to demand from a water company a supply of water for domestic purposes in respect of their pauper schools.

The following statement of the facts and relevant statutory provisions is taken in substance from his lordship's judgment:

The plaintiffs, under an order of 1878, supply water to the district within which are situate certain pauper schools belonging to the defendants, the Guardians of the Poor of St. Marylebone.

On the 6th of December, 1901, the plaintiffs gave the defendants notice to terminate on the 25th of March, 1902, an agreement then subsisting between the plaintiffs and the defendants for the supply of water to the schools, offering at the same time to enter into a new agreement for the further supply of water. The agreement thus terminated was one by which the defendants paid a certain price for 1,000 gallons by meter, and for its supply a 3in. service pipe had been laid.

On the 10th of March, 1902, the defendants passed a resolution to demand of the plaintiffs a supply of water for domestic purposes for the schools on the annual rack-rent or value of their premises, discontinuing at the same time any supply for the use of the defendants' swimming-bath.

On the 11th of March, 1902, the defendants communicated that resolution to the plaintiffs.

On the 20th of March the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants that, inasmuch as the defendants required a supply for domestic purposes only, the 3in. pipe must be disconnected, and a ½in. service pipe substituted, and that certain alterations, which the plaintiffs briefly indicated, must be made by the defendants in their system so as to disconnect the supply from purposes not of a domestic nature. The letter concluded by stating that the plaintiffs would supply, as from the 25th of March, water for domestic purposes for which the charge would be based upon the annual value of the premises.

On the 25th of March the defendants replied that they had instructed the superintendent of their schools neither to make nor to allow any alterations to be made to the schools or service mains connected with the supply of water, except to disconnect the swimming-bath, and they sent a copy of a resolution which the defendants had passed that the defendants' solicitors be instructed to resist any action on the part of the plaintiffs to avoid the defendants' resolution of the 10th of March, and that the solicitors be instructed to enforce the performance of that resolution on the part of the plaintiffs.

On the 5th of June, 1902, the plaintiffs, having been allowed inspection of the defendants' water service, gave details of the alterations which the plaintiffs said were necessary.

On the 25th of June the defendants, in reply, simply referred to their previous resolution demanding a supply for domestic purposes.

On the 30th of June, the plaintiffs replied that if the guardians wished for a domestic supply only, they must comply with the plaintiffs' previous request. The defendants, however, refused to make any alterations at all.

Subsequently the plaintiffs demanded payment upon the footing of so much per 1,000 gallons, and the defendants tendered payment on the footing of an annual charge based on the annual value. This tender the plaintiffs did not accept. The plaintiffs did not cut off the supply, but by writ issued on the 17th of April, 1903, commenced the present action.

By their statement of claim the plaintiffs claimed

(1) £461 18s. 6d., being the value placed by the plaintiffs on the amount of water actually consumed by the defendants from the 25th of March, 1902, to the 25th of March, 1903; and declarations that the defendants were not entitled (2) without an agreement in that behalf to require the plaintiffs to supply water to the schools for any purpose, or, alternatively, for certain purposes therein mentioned and described in the judgment, and (3) without the plaintiffs' consent, to maintain the three-inch pipe and a certain bye-pass and valve which allowed the use of water in case of fire without passing through a meter.

The defendants counterclaimed for a declaration that they were entitled to be supplied with water for certain of the specific purposes mentioned in the statement of claim at a rate based on the annual value of their schools.

The relevant statutory provisions are shortly as follows:

The order of 1878 incorporates the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847.

By section 48 of that Act any owner or occupier of a dwelling-house may lay pipes from the undertakers' pipes into his premises.

By section 50 the bore of any such pipe is not to exceed the prescribed limits, or, if none be prescribed, is not to exceed half an inch, except with the consent of the undertakers.

By section 53 every owner and occupier of a dwelling-house shall, when he has laid his communication pipes, be entitled to demand and receive a sufficient supply of water for his domestic purposes.

By section 35 the undertakers are to provide a supply of water sufficient for the domestic use of all the inhabitants, who shall be entitled to demand a supply.

By the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, s. 12, a supply of water for domestic purposes is not to include, amongst other things, a supply for any trade, manufacture, or business.

By the order of 1878, section 17, the undertakers shall, at the request of the owner or occupier of any dwelling-house, furnish a sufficient supply for domestic purposes.

By section 19 of the order the undertakers may make and enforce reasonable regulations for preventing the waste or misuse of water, and may prescribe the pipes, cocks, cisterns, and apparatus suitable for the purposes of supply.

By section 20, in the event of the regulations not being observed, the undertakers may refuse to supply, or may cut off the supply, unless and until the regulations are complied with, and any difference as to whether the regulations are reasonable or have been complied with may be referred by either party to, and shall be settled by, two justices.

By section 21 the undertakers may supply water for other than domestic purposes for such remuneration and upon such terms as may be agreed.

Danckwerts, K.C., and G. Wallace, for the plaintiffs.—The guardians are carrying on the business of teaching and fitting for life the pauper children; it is immaterial that no payment is taken: Rolls v. Miller, 32 W. R. 806, 27 Ch. D. 71. Unless, therefore, they can show that they require a supply for domestic purposes other than those which are necessarily incidental to their business, they are not entitled to any supply at all. The contrary was assumed, but not decided, in Barnard Castle Urban District Council v. Wilson. [On this point they referred to and distinguished Pidgeon v. Great Yarmouth Waterworks Co., [1902] 1 K. B. 310, 50 W. R. Dig. 183, and Bristol Waterworks Co. v. Uren, 15 Q. B. D. 637, 33 W. R. Dig. 239.] Secondly, assuming that they are entitled to demand a supply for domestic purposes at all, they must not use the water supplied on the basis of rateable value for purposes which are not domestic. The specific purposes for which they use the water, and of which we complain, are either so unreasonable as that they cease to be domestic, or if domestic, are contrary to the plaintiffs' regulations.

Macmorran, K.C., and R. C. Glen, for the defendants.—A workhouse is entitled to a supply for domestic purposes (Liskeard Union v. Liskeard Waterworks Co., 30 W. R. 292, 7 Q. B. D. 505), and a pauper school is merely a detached part of a workhouse. Even if a business is being carried on, the premises constitute a dwelling-house, and persons residing in them are entitled to a supply for domestic purposes: Pidgeon v. Great Yarmouth Waterworks Co.; Smith v. Müller, 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 26, [1894] 1 Q. B. 192; Cooke v. New River Co., 38 Ch. D. 56, 14 A. C. 698, 36 W. R. Dig. 218, 38 W. R. Dig. 209.

They also cited Weaver v. Corporation of Cardiff, 48 L. T. 906, 31 W. R. Dig. 215.

Danckwerts, K.C., in reply, cited Riley v. Read, 27 W. R. 414, 4 Ex. D. 100, and Charterhouse School v. Gayler, 44 W. R. 412, [1896] 1 Q. B. 437. The argument in regard to the purposes for and the manner in which the defendants used the water is sufficiently indicated in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J., in stating the facts, said that in adopting the attitude disclosed by the letter of the 25th of March the defendants were in the wrong, because some of the purposes for which the existing supply was then used were not domestic, and because the supply so far as used for domestic purposes, was used in a manner not permissible by the plaintiffs' regulations duly made under the order of 1878. His lordship continued: The correspondence shows that the plaintiffs did not thereby deny the right of the defendants to receive a supply for domestic purposes upon complying with proper conditions. By their statement of claim, however, and at the bar, they have put forward a contention that the defendants are not entitled except by agreement to a supply for domestic purposes at all. This contention is based upon an argument that the purposes of these schools constitute a business; and that section 12 of the Act of 1863 excludes them from a supply for domestic purposes. Even if (which is not here the case) the premises were occupied, not as a dwelling-house by persons resident and sleeping there, but purely for the purposes of a business—say, of a factory—I should not be prepared to hold, at least without further argument, that, even in that case, the supply of water for what I may call sanitary purposes—such as supplying washhand-basins or the ordinary flushing of water-closets—could be refused upon the mere ground that no one, or only a caretaker, slept upon the premises. It is noticeable that for domestic purposes there is a right to demand a supply, and that there is no right to demand a supply for other purposes. It is the character of the purpose, not the character of the premises in which the water is used, that is here the important factor. The test of residence is not a test of the purposes of user. If the contention be well founded, a factory would be excluded from a right of supply for even sanitary purposes, a conclusion at which I should be very slow to arrive. The contention rests upon the basis that a house is not a dwelling-house unless the residence in or occupation of the house extends to sleeping in it. In Cooke v. New River Co. (38 Ch. D. at p. 66), Lindley, L.J., speaking, no doubt, of a different Act expressed in different terms, says: "I am disposed to think that anything is a dwelling-house within the meaning of this section, which is a house, and in which water is required for domestic purposes, or for any other purposes for which rates are fixed." As at present advised I think this is true of the Waterworks Clauses Acts. Upon the same point I refer to Smith v. Müller. The point, however, does not arise in this case, for these schools are occupied by children, and by those who govern and control them, being persons who are all resident on the premises. There is no question, in my judgment, but that these premises constitute a dwelling-house; Liskeard Union v. Liskeard Waterworks. As a dwelling-house they are, I think, entitled to a supply for domestic purposes, if such premises can be spoken of as having domestic purposes.

But, granting that the schools are a dwelling-house, the next contention of the plaintiffs is that these premises have not, and cannot have, domestic purposes, because that which is carried on upon the premises is a business, and that all the supply is for the purposes of that business, and they say that section 12 of the Act of 1863 applies. If I were to define the business carried on, I should say that it is the business of providing for, maintaining, and training pauper children, and that this is none the less a business because it is carried on, not for profit, but, on the contrary, at a large expense. It was held in Rolls v. Miller that a home for working girls is a business. This, no doubt, was upon a covenant which involved some considerations not relevant here, but the reasoning in that case is, I think, applicable to the present case. But, although that which is carried on upon the premises is a business, it is, in my judgment, perfectly consistent that in business premises, water may be wanted for domestic purposes. The question is, what is the character of the purpose, not what is the character of the place or user? Thus a boarding-house is a business, but persons in a boarding-house may and do want water for domestic purposes: Pidgeon v. Great Yarmouth Waterworks Co. The inhabitants of the workhouse, although maintained for a public purpose, can demand water for domestic purposes—that is to say, for use within the workhouse for purposes which are domestic purposes as distinguished from purposes of trade: Liskeard Union v. Liskeard Waterworks. If within the same premises water is required both for domestic and for trade purposes the solution of the matter is, I think, that there must be two supplies—the one for that which can be demanded, and for which payment is to be made upon the rateable value of the premises, and the other for that which cannot be demanded, and can be taken only by agreement at such price as may be agreed, based probably upon the consumption as ascertained by meter. If, therefore, the defendants here wanted water for two such purposes the plaintiffs were, I think, right in saying: "As to the supply which you demand for domestic purposes, put yourself in a position to confine the user to domestic purposes, and we will give you the supply." As to the rest, the matter would have to await agreement between the parties.

It remains to investigate whether the purposes to which the defendants put the water supplied were wholly, or in part, and to what extent respectively domestic and not domestic, and, so far as they were domestic, whether the plaintiffs' reasonable regulations were complied with. The short way to deal with this is to indicate those which were not domestic, and those for which, being domestic, the water was not taken in accordance with the regulations. It is convenient here to refer to the plaintiffs' statement of claim. No one says, having regard to section 12 of the Act of 1863, that water for garden and greenhouse supply is domestic. Further, the defendants do not say that water for washing out the swimming-bath is domestic. As appears by the correspondence, they had ceased to require any supply to the swimming-bath before the dispute arose. The matters which remain fall substantially under the following heads: (a) Automatic flushing cisterns with a continuous action by day and by night. Of these there are ten of capacity from 40 to 90 gallons discharging 12 or 15 times in the 24 hours at a total consumption of 6,180 gallons for 24 hours, equal to 1,265,700 gallons per annum. The plaintiffs have made regulations under section 19 of the order. These automatic cisterns are in breach of the regulations. There are 40 water-closets flushed from fixed cisterns. By regulation 21 no cistern for a water-closet must deliver more than two gallons at a flush; 13 of these water-closets discharge 2½ gallons, and 26 discharge three gallons at a flush. These are in breach of the regulations. The observation upon this head, is not that the water is not taken for a domestic purpose, but that it is taken in a way not allowed by the regulations, which seem to me reasonable, and which, until two justices under section 20 of the order shall have held otherwise, I take to be reasonable. By section 20 of the order the undertakers may refuse to supply until those regulations are complied with. The next head (c) is for a continuous and constantly running supply for urinals. This continuous flow is in breach of the regulations. My observation on this is the same as on the previous head (b). The next head (d) is for hydrants. Of these there are 11. There has, happily, never been occasion to use them for purposes of fire, for which they are intended, but they are used for washing purposes by attaching a hose and washing the yards and paths of the premises. This, I think, is a domestic purpose, but, again, it is in breach of regulation 28. It is obvious that a very large amount of water may thus be used which may be unreasonable. The next head (e) relates to three large Lancashire boilers, which are used for three purposes. First for heating water for warming the buildings by circulation. This seems to me to be a domestic purpose. But, secondly, they are used for purposes of power, to drive machinery of two classes; the one is machinery which is used in the laundry, and the other consists of certain pumps, which are employed for raising water from certain wells which the defendants have on their ground. In my opinion the supply of power for the above is not a domestic purpose. Reading the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Barnard Castle Urban District Council v. Wilson it seems to me that the wide scope which Vaughan Williams, L.J., there thought should be given to the words "domestic purposes" was not adopted by the other two members of the court. It is plain that it was not adopted by Romer, L.J. It is a little more difficult to say what was the view of Stirling, L.J. But I think the result of the case is that, in arriving at a decision on the words "for domestic purposes" regard is to be had to that which is reasonable having regard to the purposes for which, according to the ordinary habits of domestic life in this country, people require water in their houses. As to the particular question of the use of water for power, I refer to what Romer, L.J., says at the top of p. 756, that to use water at a high pressure to drive a dynamo for purposes of lighting by electricity is not a domestic purpose. I think the same is true of the use of water to generate steam for purposes of power. I notice that in Pidgeon v. Great Yarmouth Waterworks Co., Channell, J., seems to have thought, although Darling, J., certainly did not, that I had in the Barnard Castle case when it was before me held that the use of water for a large swimming-bath in a private house would be use for a domestic purpose. I think it is well to point out that I decided nothing of the kind. Counsel for the plaintiff before me admitted that water for a swimming-bath in a private house would be for a domestic purpose, and although I used some pressure to induce him to argue the contrary (for my opinion was the other way), I did not succeed in arriving at that result. All that I decided was that, it being conceded that the use of water for a swimming-bath in a private house would be for a domestic purpose, the same proposition was true in the case with which I had to deal. I thought the swimming-bath there was not educational, and if a swimming-bath in a private house would be domestic, the affirmative of which the plaintiff admitted, then, I, upon that hypothesis, thought it was domestic. The Court of Appeal only differed from me on the question of fact, and held that the swimming-bath there was educational. Under these circumstances they had not to decide whether it could have been justified as domestic. If they had had to decide the point I think they would not have been unanimous in opinion. I think the true result of the cases is that the words "domestic purposes" include user not merely for washing, drinking, flushing closets, and the like, but extend to user for what in the Bristol Waterworks Co. v. Uren (at p. 648) were called the amenities of the house, but that the limits of such amenities must be ascertained with due regard to what is reasonable and what is the ordinary user in our day. This user of the boilers for power is not, in my opinion, a user for domestic purposes. Thirdly, the boilers are used for laundry purposes. Here a subdivision is necessary. So far as they are employed for power to drive laundry machinery, the purpose is not, in my opinion, domestic. So far as they are employed simply for the supply of hot water for laundry purposes the user is, I think, domestic. The latter, again, is said to require a sub-qualification. To some extent the laundry is used for educational purposes. A few of the elder girls go there, one at a time, say three days in a week, to be taught laundry work in the laundry. Strictly, no doubt, this is educational, not domestic. But the matter is too small to be worth attention. A parallel case would be a case where a mother sent her daughter into the laundry on washing days to learn something of the laundry work. As regards the bore of the service pipe, section 50 of the Act of 1847 provides that it shall not exceed the prescribed limits, and where no limit is prescribed shall not exceed half an inch, except with the consent of the undertakers. No 12 of the plaintiffs' regulations allows a bore of half an inch or three-quarters of an inch for the service of a supply for domestic purposes. The defendants are entitled (if and when they put themselves in a position to take a domestic supply) to use a pipe of three-quarters of an inch bore, but not a larger bore without the plaintiffs' consent. I find nothing to limit them to one such pipe. They are entitled to so many pipes of a bore of three-quarters of an inch as are necessary for obtaining a sufficient supply within section 53 of the Act of 1847.

For the determination of this action it is sufficient to say that the defendants have not at any time during the period in respect of which the plaintiffs sue for payment put themselves in a position to demand a supply for domestic purposes. It results that the plaintiffs are entitled to payment upon the basis of the fair value of the amount of water supplied. It is, therefore, not necessary for the determination of this action to declare which of the purposes to which the water is at present supplied are and which are not domestic purposes. It is sufficient that some of them are not domestic, and that as regards such as are domestic the regulations are not complied with. For the guidance of the parties I have endeavoured to express as clearly as I can which are of the one and which are of the other character. But it is unnecessary, and I think inexpedient, to introduce into the order declarations addressed specifically to each case. For instance, as regards the water to the boilers, the question whether the supply to them is domestic or not domestic turns upon the uses to which the boilers are put. Again, the supply to the flushing cisterns is objectionable, not because the flushing of water-closets is not a domestic purpose, but because the nature of the user which the defendants make is in breach of the plaintiffs' regulations. If, hereafter, any question should arise as to whether any particular user is domestic or not domestic, or is in breach of the regulations, it should be raised, I think, in a concrete form.

The order which I make is as follows: I declare that the defendants, upon complying with the reasonable regulations for the time being lawfully made by the plaintiffs, under section 19 of the order of 1878, will be entitled to a supply for domestic purposes at the rate provided for by the same order. I declare that the defendants are not entitled, without the plaintiffs' consent, to have or maintain for that purpose any pipe with a bore exceeding three-quarters of an inch communicating with the plaintiffs' pipes, or to have the by-pass and valve mentioned in the statement of claim. I declare that the defendants had not, during the period over which the plaintiffs seek to recover payment in this action, complied with such regulations or provided a pipe or pipes of the bore lawfully useable for that purpose, and had not become entitled to a supply for domestic purposes. I declare that the plaintiffs are entitled in this action to payment upon the basis of a supply by meter at a reasonable price per 1,000 gallons. I hope the parties will agree as to what is a reasonable price, but if not, I must put that in course of trial in a proper manner, for it has not been the subject of evidence before me. There will be one order in the action and counterclaim. The defendants must pay the costs of both the action and counterclaim.

Solicitors, Bolton & Co.; Clarkson, Greenwell, & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) — Dec. 14, 15.

ELLIS (Appellant) v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (Respondents). (a.)

Metropolis—Buildings—Drainage of houses on low-lying land—Recovery of penalty—Time for commencing proceedings—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cxiii.), ss. 122, 200, sub-section 9.

Section 122 of the London Building Act, 1894, enacts that "It shall not be lawful for any person upon land of which the surface is below the level of Trinity high-water mark, and which is so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council, to erect any building to be used wholly or in part as a dwelling-house . . . except with the permission of the council."

Low-lying land, if it is situate at such a level that the drainage from it finds its way by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council under the ordinary conditions of the sewer, does not come within the above prohibition merely because that sewer during a substantial number of days in each year is so surcharged with flood water that the drainage is then prevented from passing into it.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Proceedings to recover a penalty under section 200, sub-section 9, of the Act, for contravening the above section are in time if they are taken within six months of the completion of the erection of the building, although more than six months have elapsed since the commencement of the erection.

Case stated by Rupert Kettle, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate sitting at Woolwich police-court.

On the 28th of January, 1903, ten several informations were laid before the magistrate by Thomas Chilvers, on behalf of the respondents, that the appellant in each of ten cases, between the 29th of July and the 30th of November, 1902, at the south side of Cedar-grove, Charlton, in the borough of Greenwich, in the county of London, and within the said district, did unlawfully erect otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of Part XI. of the London Building Act, 1894, a building to which the said Part XI. of the Act relates, to wit, without the permission of the London County Council, upon land of which the surface is below the level of Trinity high-water mark, and which is so situated as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the said council, did erect a building to be used wholly or in part as a dwelling-house, whereby he became liable to the penalty prescribed by section 200, sub-section 9, of the said London Building Act, 1894.

Upon the hearing of the summons it was proved or admitted that the appellant was the owner and the person who erected the dwelling-houses situate on a piece of land at the south side of and running at right angles to Cedar-grove, Charlton, in the county and district aforesaid. Such houses constituted a terrace or row and fronted on a length of roadway which had some time previously been constructed by the appellant in continuation of the line of Ransom-road, the ground on which such houses were being built being about five feet six inches lower than the surface of such roadway.

The appellant commenced to erect the buildings as a whole on or about the 14th of July, 1902, and more than six calendar months before the informations were laid, and the buildings were covered in in the month of November, 1902. Prior to commencing the erection of such buildings, the appellant gave notice in that behalf to the district surveyor of his intention so to do, but no permission of the respondents was obtained by the appellant. Before the buildings were commenced the appellant was warned by the district surveyor that such buildings would be in contravention of Part XI. of the Act above referred to.

The level of the lowest floor of the ten houses is seven feet above ordnance datum, and the land on which the houses were built is about eighteen inches or two feet below such lowest floor, i.e., about five feet or five feet six inches above ordnance datum. Trinity high-water mark is about twelve and a-half feet above the ordnance datum, so that such land is about seven feet to seven feet six inches below Trinity high-water mark.

Provision was made by the appellant for draining the houses into a sewer of the borough of Greenwich (hereinafter referred to as the Ransom-road sewer) laid under Ransom-road, having a diameter of fifteen inches, and falling towards and opening into the respondents' southern main outfall sewer which runs underneath the Woolwich-road. The said outfall sewer is of circular section, having an internal diameter of eleven feet six inches, the invert being twenty-two feet six inches below the surface of the Woolwich-road. The inner or lower side of the arch of this sewer is 5·53 feet above ordnance datum, so that the appellant's land on which the said houses were built is as nearly as may be on the same level as the inner or lower side of the arch of this sewer. The Ransom-road sewer is connected with the said outfall sewer at a point about half-way up its side (i.e., on its horizontal diameter), and the opening or junction is protected by a hinged flap which, when the outfall sewer becomes flooded, closes or should close automatically, and so prevent the metropolitan sewage flowing along the said outfall sewer from passing up into Ransom-road sewer. At the point of inlet into the Ransom-road sewer of the drain provided as aforesaid by the appellant, is a manhole which is situated ninety feet from the nearest and 250 feet from the farthest of the said ten houses, and the length of the Ransom-road sewer from the manhole to the inlet into the outfall sewer is about 350 feet.

The Ransom-road sewer was constructed and connected with the outfall sewer in 1894 by the permission and sanction of and in accordance with the requirements of the respondents pursuant to the Metropolis Local Management Acts. The outfall sewer is discharged and emptied by means of a pumping station at Crossness, on the south side of the River Thames, erected for that purpose, and under the control and management of the respondents.

The total length of the drain, so provided by the appellant as aforesaid, from the farthest off of the appellant's houses to the manhole aforesaid is about 250 feet, and the total fall of the drain in that distance is five and a half feet—i.e., one inch in four feet.

The total fall of the Ransom-road sewer from the manhole aforesaid to the outfall sewer, which is a distance of about 350 feet as aforesaid, is two feet seven inches—i.e., one inch in eleven feet.

The outfall sewer necessarily receives much of the flood water of the metropolis, so that in times of flood and even after moderate rainfall it becomes full and surcharged. The effect of this condition of the outfall sewer upon the Ransom-road sewer is that at times of flood and moderate rainfall no sewage or drainage can pass away from the latter sewer at all, and it necessarily becomes more or less full.

It will be seen that all these flood levels were substantially above the appellant's land, above referred to, on which the said houses were built and that if such flood were free to reach a corresponding level at the appellant's land the latter would be flooded. The flap aforesaid in the said outfall sewer at the inlet of it into the Ransom-road sewer would, however, normally prevent the contents of the outfall sewer from escaping into the Ransom-road sewer.

There was no evidence before the magistrate, save in the one instance, as to how far in times of flood the water in the Ransom-road sewer rose, or to what distance towards or past the said manhole the flooding or surcharging of or in the said Ransom-road sewer or the appellant's said drains extended.

There is no land in the county of London lying so low as to be below the bottom of the said outfall sewer. It was not suggested that the appellant's land could be drained by gravitation into any existing sewer of the respondents other than the said outfall sewer.

Upon the above facts the respondents contended that the appellant's land did not admit of being drained by gravitation into the said outfall sewer as then existing and that the offence charged had been proved.

The appellant contended that the offence charged had not been proved and that it was not proved that his said land was so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the respondents; that the Ransom-road sewer was such a sewer, that in fact his land was drained by gravitation into the Ransom-road sewer and also into the said outfall sewer; that the respondents ought not to be heard to say that the drainage by gravitation was not proper and efficient by reason of the Ransom-road sewer being constructed and connected with the said outfall sewer with the permission and sanction of the respondents or by reason of the use or management of the said outfall sewer; and that the temporary non-escape in time of floods as aforesaid of the contents of the Ransom-road sewer into the said outfall sewer did not prevent the land being so situate as to admit of its being drained by gravitation within the meaning of this section. The appellant further contended that the information and proceedings were out of time, having been laid and commenced more than six calendar months after the commencement of the erection of the buildings.

Taking the facts as above set out, and considering all the circumstances of the case, the learned magistrate found that the ten houses above mentioned were erected by the appellant upon land of which the surface was below the level of Trinity high-water mark and that the same were intended to be used as dwelling-houses; that during the greater part of the year the houses admitted of being and were drained by gravitation into the Ransom-road sewer and through that into the southern outfall sewer, but that for a substantial number of days in the year the drainage of the land upon which such houses were erected could not pass into the said outfall sewer; that the Ransom-road sewer being a sewer of the Greenwich Borough Council is not, but that the southern outfall sewer is, an existing sewer of the respondents within the meaning of section 122 of the London Building Act, 1894, and that there was no other existing sewer of the respondents into which it was possible to drain the said land.

He held that it was immaterial whether the impossibility of draining the land into the outfall sewer at certain periods as above-mentioned was or was not due to insufficient pumping arrangements provided at Crossness by the respondents, or whether it was or was not due to the insufficiency or incapacity of the sewer, and that for the purposes of the section the sewer and the appliances connected therewith must be taken as they existed at the time the buildings were erected; and that as the land did not admit of being constantly and effectually drained by gravitation into the outfall sewer, it did not admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the respondents within the meaning of section 122 of the said Act.

He further held that the informations were laid and the proceedings commenced within six calendar months from the erection of the building and therefore within the time prescribed. He therefore convicted the appellant. The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the above statement of facts the learned magistrate came to a correct decision in point of law.

The London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 122, provides as follows: "It shall not be lawful for any person upon land of which the surface is below the level of Trinity high-water mark, and which is so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council, to erect any building to be used wholly or in part as a dwelling-house, or to adapt any building to be used wholly or in part as a dwelling-house, except with the permission of the council, and subject to and in accordance with such regulations as the council may from time to time prescribe with reference to the erection of buildings on such land."

The appellant in person.

Avory, K.C., for the respondents.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Upon the point taken, that these proceedings were too late, I am clearly of opinion that there is no ground for interfering with the entertaining of the case by the learned police magistrate. Sub-section 9 of section 200 says that the person who erects under this very section, "or adapts or commences to erect or adapt otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of Part XI. of this Act, any building to which Part XI. of this Act relates shall be liable to a penalty." It is contended that because the appellant commenced the ten houses more than six months before the laying of the information, although they were not completed until well within the six months, that the six months ran from its commencement. In my opinion that would give no effect to the words "erect or adapt" as distinguished from "commence to erect or adapt." The object of what I may call the double provision is obvious; it may be necessary to wait until the houses are complete in order to see whether they fall within the section or not. On the other hand, there may be a case in which it is quite clear that what is going to be done may be an infraction of the section, and then power is given to take proceedings as soon as work of that character is commenced.

On the other part of the case I think the learned magistrate has gone too far—that is to say, that he has applied a test which is not laid down by section 122 of the statute. Section 122 says that "It shall not be lawful for any person upon land of which the surface is below the level of Trinity high-water mark, and which is so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation into an existing sewer of the council, to erect any building to be used wholly or in part as a dwelling-house." Now, the learned magistrate has found that the ten houses above-mentioned, which have been erected by the appellant, are on land of which the surface was below the level of Trinity high-water mark, and that therefore primâ facie the section applies, and that they were also intended to be used as dwelling-houses. He then finds facts which I need not detail, showing that the houses are on a level which admits of their being drained by gravitation. It is not disputed that if there were no other sewer or no other special construction or special use of the sewer in the Woolwich-road, the houses could be drained by gravitation into that sewer. Then he says this: "During the greater part of the year the said houses admit of being and are drained by gravitation into the said Ransom-road sewer and through that into the said southern outfall sewer." Therefore that fact is obvious: that the situation of the houses is such that they admit of being drained by gravitation and it does not alter that fact that they could not be drained, in the ordinary sense of the word, for the whole of the year, but that for a considerable number of days in the year the drainage of the land would not pass into the outfall sewer. Then he goes on to say that he thinks that it is is immaterial as to why it would not pass. It is in that respect that I think he has applied a wrong construction of the law, because it turns out, and the fact is, that this outfall sewer being very heavily charged in times of flood, or in times of excessive or even moderate rainfall, so much water comes down the sewer that the flaps which are made to shut with the pressure of the water close the mouth of the Ransom-road sewer, so that the water cannot go out owing to the greater pressure of water in the main outfall sewer. That does not make the house one which is so situate as not to admit of being drained by gravitation. What it does mean is that on those particular days the sewer is so used by the London Council that the water will not go out. In my opinion it was not intended that the particular house-owner or landowner whose houses are within the terms of the section should be prevented from draining because on certain days of the year the sewer is so used that the water will not go out; and as I clearly pointed out in the course of the argument of this case, really the question of the level of the houses has nothing to do with the case. We have to see whether they fall within the section or not, not merely as being below the level of high-water mark, because assuming the level of the houses was ten feet higher still the same objection applies—namely, that on those days of the year the water would not go out of the sewer because it would be headed back owing to the pressure of the water in the main sewer. I desire to say that no point is raised as to any improper connection of the drains of the houses with the Ransom-road sewer. I deal with this case solely upon the point raised—namely, that it is objected by the London County Council that because the water in the Ransom-road sewer was on a certain number of days in the year headed back by the water in the outfall sewer that therefore the houses were not houses capable of being drained by gravitation into the existing sewer. I think the learned magistrate was wrong, and that, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I quite agree.

KENNEDY, J.—I also entirely agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for respondents, W. A. Blaxland.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Buckley, J.) — Feb. 29.

In re BROWNE.

Ex parte MARTINGELL. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Gambling debt—Gaming Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 9).

The debtor had been sued by a creditor for a gambling debt, and successfully pleaded the Gaming Act of 1892. After the decision against him the creditor wrote to the debtor's clubs informing them of his conduct. The debtor thereupon agreed to pay the creditor £100 in cash and to give bills for the remainder of the debt, in consideration of the creditor withdrawing those letters, which agreement was carried out. Upon the debtor becoming bankrupt the creditor proved in the bankruptcy for the amount of the bills then due, but his proof was rejected by the trustee.

Held, that the bills had not been given for an illegal consideration, and that the proof was wrongly rejected on that ground.

Appeal by a creditor from the rejection of his proof by the trustee in the bankruptcy.

The appellant Martingell had acted as agent for the bankrupt Browne in making bets with bookmakers, and had paid losses for Browne to the amount of £800.

In 1900 Martingell brought an action against Browne to recover that sum, but Browne pleaded the Gaming Act of 1892, and succeeded in his defence both in the King's Bench Division and in the Court of Appeal.

Martingell thereupon wrote to the secretaries of two clubs of which Browne was a member, and informed them of Browne's conduct. Browne thereupon offered terms of settlement, and it was agreed that Browne should pay £100 in cash and give bills for the remainder of the debt, and that Martingell should withdraw the letters he had written to Browne's clubs. Browne paid the £100 and gave the bills, and Martingell withdrew the letters to the clubs. Subsequently Browne failed to meet some of the bills and became bankrupt. Martingell tendered a proof on the bills, but it was rejected by the trustee on the ground that the bills had been given for an "illegal consideration."

Martingell appealed.

Reed, K.C., and Simmonds, for the appellant.—The consideration for the bills was not the gambling debt; that was disposed of for ever by the judgment for the defendant in the action of Martingell v. Browne, and could never be sued for again. There was a new consideration given for the bills—namely, the withdrawal by Martingell of the letters he had sent to the bankrupt's clubs. It cannot be contended that this was an "illegal consideration."

Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee.—It may be that the bankrupt would have had no answer to this claim, but the trustee representing the other creditors can inquire into the real consideration and go behind the judgment. The consideration alleged is not such as can stand against the other creditors: Ex parte Seaton, In re Deerhurst, 8 Morr. 97, 39 W. R. Dig. 24.

Reed, K.C., was not called upon to reply.

BUCKLEY, J.—In this case the trustee has rejected the appellant's proof on the ground that it was founded on an illegal consideration. The material facts are that the appellant sued the bankrupt to recover what is called "a debt of honour," and failed in his action and on appeal. The result is that that debt is at an end. After that, for a new consideration altogether — namely, the withdrawal by the appellant of certain letters he had written to the bankrupt's clubs, the bankrupt agreed to pay £100, and to give bills for the remainder of the debt. That was a wholly new transaction. It was said that this was merely a further agreement to pay the gaming debt, and Ex parte Seaton, In re Deerhurst, was cited, but that case was the contrary of the present, as the creditor there had obtained by default a judgment for a gaming debt which was bad, and the debtor had agreed, in consideration of the creditor not posting him as a defaulter, to treat the bad judgment as a good one. The bills in this case were given for a new consideration altogether, which is not an illegal consideration, and the trustee was wrong in rejecting the proof upon that ground. The decision of the trustee must be reversed without prejudice to his setting up other grounds for rejection within fourteen days.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, J. J. Hands.

Solicitors for the respondent, Andrew Wood, Purves, & Sutton.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) March 10, 14.

MOORE, NETTLEFOLD, & CO. v. SINGER MANUFACTURING CO. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Distress for rent—Sale of goods—Purchase by landlord—2 W. & M., Sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2—Practice—Appeal to Court of Appeal—County court appeal—"Right of appeal to the High Court"—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c 43), s. 120—Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1, sub-section 5.

A landlord who has distrained goods for rent in arrear cannot himself purchase them.

King v. England, 12 W. R. 308, 4 B. & S. 782, approved and followed.

Section 1, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act, 1894, which empowers the Court of Appeal to give leave to appeal from the High Court in all cases "where there is a right of appeal to the High Court from any court," includes cases in which there is an appeal to the High Court with the leave of the county court judge as well as cases where there is an appeal without leave.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (51 W. R. 699, [1903] 2 K. B. 168) affirmed.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.), reversing the decision of Judge Smyly, K.C., at the Shoreditch County Court (reported in 51 W. R. 699, [1903] 2 K. B. 168).

The action was brought to recover damages for the conversion of a sewing-machine, the amount claimed being £17.

The facts were as follows: A man named Anton, who was in the employment of the plaintiffs, was the tenant of a house belonging to them.

The defendants let the sewing-machine in question to Anton under a hire-purchase agreement, by one of the terms of which the property in the machine was to remain in the defendants until all the instalments were paid, and the defendants could seize the machine if any of the instalments were in arrear.

The rent of the house being in arrear, the plaintiffs distrained for the rent, and seized, among other things, the sewing-machine, and it was put up for sale by auction. At the auction the sewing-machine was bought in by the plaintiffs' manager for the plaintiffs, who by an agreement in writing let the machine on hire to Anton, and it was handed back to him. The defendants, who had not heard of the distress, seized the machine upon the instalments due under the original hiring agreement falling into arrear. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action in the county court.

The county court judge found that there was a bonâ fide sale of the sewing-machine to the plaintiffs, and he held that the sale was a valid sale, and that the property in the machine passed to the plaintiffs. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs, but gave the defendants leave to appeal.

The Divisional Court reversed the decision of the county court judge, and gave judgment for the defendants, holding upon the authority of King v. England, 12 W. R. 308, 4 B. & S. 782, that the sale must be to a third party, and that the property in the goods did not pass to the plaintiffs.

The Divisional Court refused leave to appeal, but the Court of Appeal granted leave.

March 10.—Hugo Young, K.C., and Lawless, for the defendants, took a preliminary objection to the hearing of the appeal. The judgment of the Divisional Court in this case is final and conclusive, by virtue of section 45 of the Judicature Act, 1873, which governs this case notwithstanding the more recent enactment of section 1, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act, 1894. By section 45 of the Act of 1873 all appeals from inferior courts are to be heard and determined by the Divisional Court, and the determination of such appeals by the Divisional Court is final unless special leave to appeal from the same to the Court of Appeal is given by the Divisional Court. Section 1, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1894 is as follows: "In all cases were there is a right of appeal to the High Court from any court or person, the appeal shall be heard and determined by a Divisional Court constituted as may be prescribed by rules of court; and the determination thereof by the Divisional Court shall be final, unless leave to appeal is given by that court or by the Court of Appeal." In this case there was no "right of appeal" from the county court to the High Court within the meaning of that sub-section, as the claim was for less than £20. The words "where there is a right of appeal" mean cases in which the party has an absolute right to appeal without asking for any leave, and do not include a case where, as here, the party has obtained leave to appeal from the county court judge: see the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J., in the case of In re Oddy, 43 W. R. 363, [1895] 1 Q. B. 392. The same expression occurs in section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which provides that at the trial of any action "in which there is a right of appeal" the judge shall at the request of either party make a note of any question of law. That must refer to cases in which there is an absolute right to appeal apart from special leave. Therefore, the Divisional Court having refused to give leave to appeal from their decision, no appeal can be brought to this court, even with the leave of this court.

Montague Lush, K.C. (Lincoln Reed and Arthur Page with him), for the plaintiffs.—Where a county court judge has given leave to appeal, the party has a right to appeal within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1894. That sub-section therefore applies, and this court may give leave to appeal notwithstanding the fact that the Divisional Court has refused leave to appeal.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that the preliminary objection fails. When we examine section 1, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act, 1894, and look to see with what point of time the Legislature are there dealing, it seems to me to be clear that they are not concerned with the initial character of the action, but are looking at the time when the Divisional Court has to be formed for the purpose of hearing appeals from inferior courts. In some of the cases coming from inferior courts, the parties have an absolute right to appeal; in some cases the parties have the right to appeal given to them by leave. The court to be constituted has to consider all the cases which have a right to be entered in the list. In my opinion the words "where there is a right of appeal," in this sub-section, apply to all those appealable cases, and are not confined to those cases in which there is an absolute right of appeal without leave. It is suggested that the same words, where they are used in section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, must be directed to the inception of the action. That may or may not be so, but the words are there used in a different context. There being no authority contrary to the view which I take, I think the objection must be overruled.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY and F. G. RÜCKER, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Preliminary objection overruled.

March 14. — The appeal on the merits was, by consent, heard before two judges.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Arthur Page (Lincoln Reed with them), for the plaintiffs.—The Divisional Court were wrong in holding that a landlord cannot buy the distrained goods. To allow a landlord to buy distrained goods would not, as the Divisional Court thought, open the door to abuses. On the contrary, it would be in the interests of the tenant to allow the landlord to bid, because a better price would be obtained for the goods. The Divisional Court based their judgment upon the case of King v. England, 12 W. R. 308, 4 B. & S. 782. But there the court held that there was no sale at all as the landlord took the goods at their appaised value. In that case there was a dictum of Blackburn, J., that the sale must be to a third person. That, however, was only a dictum. When distrained goods are sold the landlord is not the seller. The goods are in the custody of the law, as in the case of goods taken in execution. The distrainer gains neither a general nor a special property, nor even a possession, in the things distrained; he cannot maintain trover or trespass, for they are in the custody of the law: per Parker, C.B., in King v. Cotton, 2 Ves. sen. 288, at p. 294. The law transfers the property in the goods to the purchaser, as in the case of the sale of goods seized in execution by the sheriff. The landlord is not the seller, and therefore it cannot be said that the landlord sells to himself. The auctioneer is not the landlord's agent to sell. At the moment of the contract he is the purchaser's agent to buy: Emmerson v. Heelis, 2 Taunt. 38, at p. 47. The judgment is therefore wrong.

They also referred to Bishop v. Bryant, 6 C. & P. 484.

Hugo Young, K.C., and Lawless, for the defendants. —A landlord may himself distrain or he may employ a certified bailiff to distrain. He may sell the distrained goods by private treaty or by public auction. The plaintiffs' contention must come to this, that a landlord may sell by private treaty to himself. That was what King v. England said that a landlord could not do. In that case there was a sale of the distrained goods by the landlord to himself by private treaty, and the court held that it was not a proper sale under 2 W. & M., Sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2, Blackburn, J., adding that the sale must be to a third person. By 2 W. & M., Sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2, the landlord is the person selling, though he has not the property in the goods. He sells another person's property by virtue of the Act, and if he is allowed to buy the goods when sold by auction it may give rise to gross abuses. For instance, the landlord could employ an auctioneer of his own choosing; he might direct the sale to take place where he liked; and he might lot the goods in a way most inconvenient to other would-be buyers. The interests of third persons whose goods were seized would be imperilled if a landlord could buy, as he would wish to buy at the cheapest price so long as his rent was covered. In Rocke v. Hills, 3 Times L. R. 298, it was held that the person who had acted as the landlord's agent in the distress could not be one of the appraisers to value the goods. That decision was before the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888, section 5 of which did away with the necessity of appraisement, but it shows that the sale must be conducted quite independently of the landlord. The sale must be an independent sale.

Page replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question here arises upon a distress for rent put in by the plaintiffs as landlords. Among the goods seized was a sewing-machine which had been hired out by the defendants to the tenant on a hire-purchase agreement. The landlords sold the sewing-machine under the distress by public auction, and at the sale an agent employed by them bought in the machine on their behalf at what was apparently a fair price, and the landlords thereupon let the machine to the tenant. The defendants, who had originally let the sewing-machine to the tenant, seized the machine upon the instalments due under their hire-purchase agreement falling into arrear, and the landlords brought this action to recover damages for conversion of the machine. That raises the question whether the landlords have acquired a title to the machine.

The facts of the case are on all fours with those in King v. England. In King v. England there had been an appraisement of the goods, which at that date was necessary, and the landlord, who was the person authorized by the statute of 2 W. & M., Sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2, to sell the goods, took over the goods of a third person at the appraised value with the consent of the tenant. The true owner of the goods then seized them, and the plaintiff, to whom the landlord had given them, brought an action of conversion as in the present case. The only material difference between the two cases is that here the formality of a sale by auction took place. The real substance, however, of the matter is the same in both cases—namely, a sale of the goods by the landlord to himself. By the statute the person distraining is the person selling. It is true that the auctioner may be the agent of both buyer and seller for some purposes, but in selling he acts primarily as agent for the person selling, though in the course of the transaction he may become for some purposes the agent of the purchaser. The same mischief might arise here as was referred to in King v. England, the landlord being both seller and buyer, and the likelihood of that mischief arising was pointed out by Blackburn, J., in King v. England, and by Wills, J., in the present case. Therefore it seems to me, both upon principle and upon authority, that the judgment of the Divisional Court was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The Act of 2 W. & M., Sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2, makes the case quite clear. The statute empowered the landlord who distrains to sell the distrained goods. A sale there referred to does not mean a sale by the landlord to himself. The word sale would be an improper description of a transaction of that kind. The sale must be to someone other than the landlord. In the present case the auctioneer was employed by the landlord as his agent to effect the sale, though he might become the agent of the buyer to record the sale. The case comes clearly within the authority of King v. England.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, James Morley.

Solicitor for the defendants, G. D. Wansbrough.

From K. B. Div. (Romer and Mathew, L.J.) March 7.

GRAY v. BONSAL. (a.)

Landlord and tenant — Lease — Forfeiture — Relief — Underlessee — Non-payment of rent — Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14 — Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 13), s. 4.

The court has power, under section 4 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1892, to grant to an underlessee relief against forfeiture of the superior lease incurred by reason of non-payment of rent.

Appeal from an order made by Bucknill, J., granting relief against forfeiture of a lease.

The plaintiffs' predecessors in title had granted a lease of the premises, which consisted of a hotel and a yard, for a term of years. The lessee underlet the yard to the Midland Railway Co., and subsequently assigned the term to the defendant.

The plaintiffs having recovered judgment against the defendant in an action for possession of the demised premises on a forfeiture for non-payment of rent, the Midland Railway Co. applied for relief against the forfeiture.

It appeared that the defendant desired to disclaim all interest in the property, and that nothing was known as to the original lessee.

Bucknill, J., granted relief against the forfeiture on payment of arrears of rent and costs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C., and B. A. Cohen, for the plaintiffs.—The learned judge had no jurisdiction to grant relief under section 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892. Section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, contains a code dealing with the granting of relief to lessees against forfeiture of their leases. By sub-section 8 that section is not to apply to a case of forfeiture for non-payment of rent. In that sub-section the Legislature followed the practice of the Court of Chancery and the practice under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860. It was held that the benefits of section 14 could not be claimed by an underlessee of a part only of the demised premises, and, in order to cure this blot, section 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, was passed. But that section is subject to the same limitations as section 14 of the Act of 1881. It does no more than place underlessees in the same position as lessees. Neither one section nor the other applies to the case of forfeiture for non-payment of rent. In Wardens of Cholmeley School, Highgate v. Sewell, [1894] 2 Q. B. D. 906, Charles, J., held that under section 4 of the Act of 1892 the court might grant relief to an underlessee in some cases in which relief could not be granted to the lessee himself. That, however, was a case of forfeiture by reason of bankruptcy. [ROMER, L.J., referred to Imray v. Oakshette, 45 W. R. 681, [1897] 2 Q. B. 218.] That was a case of forfeiture by a breach of a covenant not to assign or underlet without licence. The law has always treated forfeiture by non-payment of rent as being on a separate footing from other forfeitures. In London Bridge Buildings Co. v. Thomson, 89 L. T. 50, Joyce, J., assumed that section 4 of the Act of 1892 applied to forfeiture for non-payment of rent, but there the point was overlooked. Neither was there jurisdiction in this case to grant relief under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860. The underlessees could not claim relief under that Act without making the original lessee and the assignee of the lease parties to the application: Hare v. Elms, 41 W. R. 297, [1893] 1 Q. B. 604.

Neville, K.C., and C. H. Sargant, for the Midland Railway Co.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of opinion that in substance the learned judge was right in holding that relief ought to be granted to the underlessees in this case. But I am not satisfied that the order has been made in the right form. It is clear to my mind that relief could have been granted to the underlessees, either under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, or under section 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892. But there are certain difficulties which would have arisen in imposing the terms which are required to be imposed by the Common Law Procedure Act, in consequence of the fact that the original lessee and his assignee are not before the court. Those difficulties do not arise if the Conveyancing Act, 1892, is applied; and in my opinion the general powers conferred on the court by section 4 of that statute for protecting underlessees on forfeiture of superior leases, ought to be enforced here. I think those powers are most useful in a case like this. It is suggested on the part of the appellants that that section does not enable the court to grant any relief to underlessees other than such relief as was formerly granted either by the Court of Chancery under its equitable jurisdiction or by the Common Law Courts under the Act of 1860, and that it does not extend to relief against forfeiture on non-payment of rent. That suggestion is founded on sub-section 8 of section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. That section deals with the right of lessees to relief against forfeiture, and sub-section 8 provides that the section shall not affect the law relating to re-entry or forfeiture or relief in case of non-payment of rent. It is argued that that provision is imported into section 4 of the Act of 1892, and that the court has no wider powers in dealing with an application of an underlessee for relief than it had under the earlier law.

I am of opinion that section 4 of the Act of 1892 is not a mere amendment of section 14 of the Act of 1881, but that it is a general enabling clause empowering the court to grant relief to underlessees on forfeiture of superior leases under any circumstances on such terms as may appear to the court to be just. I am supported in this view by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Imray v. Oakshette, [1897] 2 Q. B. 218. There a similar question arose, and the argument which has been addressed to us was used and failed. Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ., held that the court had jurisdiction under the Act of 1892 to relieve an underlessee against a forfeiture of the original lease, though such forfeiture was occasioned by breach of a covenant not to assign or underlet without licence, and therefore could not be relieved against in favour of the lessee under the Act of 1881. They treated section 4 of the Act of 1892 as being a substantive section in itself. I therefore think that the objection to our applying section 4 of the Act of 1892 falls to the ground. With regard to the form of the order, I think we ought to grant relief to the underlessees under section 4 by vesting in the underlessees the term of the underlease, and making them covenant with the landlord during the term to pay the rent and also to perform the covenants contained in the original lease as to the demised premises. It is said that there may have been breaches of the covenant to repair. If so, it ought to be made a term or condition of the relief that those breaches should be made good. The case will be referred back to the court below for the purpose of an investigation being made into that matter. There will be no costs of this appeal.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Order varied.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Druces & Attlee.

Solicitors for the railway company, Beale & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) March 5.

BOULTON v. HOULDER BROTHERS & Co. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Marine insurance—Discovery of ship's papers — Action by underwriters to recover money paid on fraudulent claim.

In an action brought by underwriters claiming repayment of sums obtained from them by the defendants by false and fraudulent claims under policies of marine insurance, and alleging a conspiracy to defraud,

Held, that the underwriters were entitled to the same full discovery as if they had been defendants being sued on the policies.

Appeal from an order of Bucknill, J., for the production of certain documents by the defendants.

The action was brought by a number of underwriters at Lloyd's against Houlder Brothers & Co., and Houlder Brothers & Co. (Limited), and several other defendants.

Between the years 1890 and 1901 the defendant firm, Houlder Brothers & Co., effected with the plaintiffs in their own names various policies of marine insurance on steamships which were known collectively as the Houlder Line, and of which the defendant firm were owners or managing owners.

During the period covered by the insurances the defendant firm, or the defendant company, Houlder Brothers & Co. (Limited), which was incorporated in 1898, promoted the formation of a number of single-ship companies for the purpose of owning particular ships in the Houlder Line, and many of these companies, having gone into voluntary liquidation, were amalgamated in a new company called Houlder Line (Limited).

The plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, alleged that all the defendants had conspired, by means of false receipts and false reports, to prepare various inflated and manipulated accounts of repairs to the ships insured, and that the plaintiffs had thereby been induced to pay to the defendant firm in respect of the policies sums largely in excess of what was due.

The sixth paragraph of the statement of claim was as follows: "From time to time during the period aforesaid the defendants Houlder Brothers & Co. effected with the insurers insurances in their own names on the said ships covering losses by the perils enumerated in the said policies, including general and particular average losses, and in due course each of the policies so effected as aforesaid was handed over to Houlder Brothers & Co., who subsequently thereto put forward claims for alleged losses thereunder as being just and honest claims, but which were in fact both false and fraudulent, and they supported and gave colour to such dishonest claims by means of false receipts and false and inflated and manipulated accounts prepared and obtained as aforesaid for the purpose of deceiving and defrauding the insurers of such ships and fraudulently obtaining payment of such claims from them."

The plaintiffs claimed to recover for the defendant firm the sums paid by them in respect of the policies, and they also claimed damages against all the defendants for conspiracy.

The defendant firm and the defendant company pleaded that until October, 1900, they had no knowledge that any claims had been presented to the underwriters in excess of the amounts properly claimable; and, while denying liability, they paid into court a sum which they said was sufficient to meet the overcharge.

The plaintiffs obtained an order on the defendants to produce for inspection all the policies referred to in the pleadings.

On an application by the defendants for an extension of time for complying with the order for production, it was stated on the part of the defendants, Houlder Brothers & Co., that, with regard to certain policies referred to in the pleadings, some of them were in their possession only in their representative character as directors of Houlder Line (Limited), and some of them, which had been in their possession, were now in the possession of the liquidator of the single-ship companies. Neither Houlder Line (Limited) nor the liquidator were parties to the action.

The master granted an extension of time, but ordered the defendants Houlder Brothers & Co. to produce all the policies referred to in the pleadings for the inspection of the plaintiffs, subject to any order of the liquidator.

On appeal by Houlder Brothers & Co., Bucknill, J., varied the order for production by excluding therefrom all such policies as were in the possession of the liquidator or Houlder Line (Limited).

The plaintiffs appealed.

Rufus Isaacs, Sims Williams, and Theobald Mathew, for the plaintiffs.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., Bremner, and G. Hay Morgan, for Houlder Brothers & Co.

The following cases were cited: Twizell v. Allen, 5 M. & W. 337; Goldschmidt v. Marryat, 1 Camp. 559; China Steamship Co. v. Commercial Union Assurance Co., 30 W. R. 224, 8 Q. B. D. 142; Kearsley v. Philips, 31 W. R. 467, 10 Q. B. D. 465.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from an order made by Bucknill, J., on an application by the plaintiffs for discovery of documents by the defendants. The present case has this peculiarity, that the plaintiffs are underwriters who are seeking to recover from the defendants sums of money which they say they have overpaid to some of the defendants as the assured under certain policies of marine insurance. It is an admitted fact, and it is common ground, that these defendants, being the assured of the plaintiff underwriters, did demand and receive from the underwriters sums of money in respect of ships insured, which were in excess of the sums really due under the policies of insurance. The case is complicated in this way, that the persons who received these sums of money were agents acting for certain companies, though they were also to a certain extent acting for themselves. If proceedings had been taken by the assured on these policies, and the underwriters had resisted their claim, there can be no doubt whatever that the underwriters would have been entitled to the fullest possible discovery of documents. It is admitted that in such a case the assured would have been under an obligation to make that full discovery, which would have included an obligation on them, who would in such a case be the plaintiffs, to produce for the inspection of the defendant underwriters all material documents, even documents not now in their own custody, and documents which they had in their custody as agents for others, or else to account to the court for their inability to produce them. That would have been the case if the underwriters had sought to sift or investigate the claim put forward by the assured, or had disputed the liability which was asserted against them. But the underwriters in the present case, acting as honourable men, did not seek to sift or investigate the claims put forward, and did not demand the discovery to which they were entitled, but paid the amount of the claims without question. It turned out that in this way they paid an amount largely in excess of what was due. In these circumstances, having become aware of the fact that they had in many instances paid sums in respect of losses which had not occurred, they brought this action to recover the excess. The action is in form an action for fraudulent conspiracy, but it is in reality brought for the purpose of exacting repayment of the sums paid in excess of what was due. The case standing thus, the underwriters, being plaintiffs, demand from the assured the same discovery as they would have been entitled to have from the same persons if they had been defendants being sued by those persons. They say that they ought not to be placed in a worse position merely because they forewent their right to investigate the claims when they were first put forward. It is asked on the part of the defendants whether we ought to order the same discovery in an action of conspiracy like this as we would order in an action on a policy of marine insurance. In my opinion the answer to that question is yes, because the substance of the matter is that this is an action on a policy of marine insurance. It has been entirely brought about by the defendants that the position of the parties has been changed. Where the position of the parties on the record has been changed owing to misstatements in the claim of the assured, I am of opinion that the underwriter ought not to be in a worse position with regard to discovery than if he had sifted and investigated the claim when it was put forward. We are not extending the principle underlying the rule which allows underwriters a very wide discovery. It does not seem to me to matter which of the parties is plaintiff and which is defendant. The foundation of the rule is the well-established principle that the position of an underwriter towards his assured is such that he is entitled to the fullest discovery.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is said on the part of the defendants that the order for wide discovery is in practice only made in actions against underwriters, and that there is no decided case in which the order has been made in an action by an underwriter. It is suggested that the history of this order is to be traced to the introduction by Lord Mansfield of the practice of consolidating actions of marine insurance, and that it was in its origin one of the terms of allowing a consolidation of actions. That may possibly have been the occasion of the first making of the order, but it does not constitute the ground of the order. The ground of the order is the principle which I have stated, though the application of the consolidation rule may have afforded the opportunity of putting the principle into effect.

The reason for asking in this case for that larger discovery which is incident to an action on a policy of marine insurance is that some of the policies of which discovery is sought are said to be in the custody of the defendants as agents for other persons, and some to be in the possession of the liquidator of certain companies. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to the discovery for which they ask. As the form of the order which the court will make will be a matter of some nicety, it would be well that the order should be drawn up by the parties and then settled by one of the members of the court.

I am of opinion that the discovery to be given ought to contain a statement on oath as to what steps the defendants have taken to produce the documents in question for inspection by the plaintiffs, and that the defendants should give all the information which they can obtain by the exercise of reasonable exertions. In my judgment the underwriters are entitled to the same measure of discovery as if they were defendants in an action on the policies.

ROMER, L.J.—I have felt some doubts as to this case which have not been wholly removed. But my brethren are of opinion that the order asked for ought to be made against the defendants, and I will not dissent from the conclusion at which they have arrived. My doubt arises from the fact that the defendants seem to have effected these policies on behalf of certain limited companies which are not defendants to the action, and that the action is for fraud alleged to have been committed by the defendants. I have the less hesitation in agreeing that the appeal should be allowed because on the merits I can see no reason why these policies should not be produced.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am clearly of opinion that the order for production ought to be made, and, further, that the defendants should be required to state on oath what they know as to the contents of the policies.

The action is brought to recover the amount of overcharges made by the defendants Houlder Brothers & Co. against the plaintiffs on policies of insurance, and paid by the plaintiffs. These defendants in their defence admit that they have recently discovered items of overcharges, and they have paid a sum into court with a denial of liability. Under these circumstances, in order that the underwriters may be fairly treated, the defendants ought to give them the fullest discovery, including the production of all ship's papers. I also think that the defendants ought to explain on oath exactly what steps they have taken to obtain the documents.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lewis & Lewis.

Solicitors for the defendants, W. A. Crump & Son.

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 20, 23.

GORDON v. GORDON AND GORDON. (a.)

Practice—Contempt of court—Married woman—Right to be heard—Costs—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—"Proceeding instituted"—Summons in divorce suit—Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 2.

If an appellant, who is in contempt of court, alleges that the order from which he is appealing was made without jurisdiction, the court will not refuse to hear him on account of his contempt, although the order appealed from was made after the contempt had been committed.

In a divorce suit, in which the husband was the petitioner, a decree was made for dissolution of the marriage and that the child of the marriage should be delivered up to the custody of the petitioner by the respondent. The respondent (the wife) applied that the decree might be varied by entrusting the custody of the child to herself, and gave an undertaking not to remove the child out of the jurisdiction. On the 10th of March, 1903, the wife's application was dismissed, and it was ordered that the husband's costs of and incident to this application should be payable out of the separate property of the wife, notwithstanding that such property was subject to a restraint on anticipation; and it was further ordered that the child be forthwith delivered up by the wife to the custody of the husband "until further order." The wife, however, in breach of her undertaking, secretly sent the child out of the jurisdiction shortly before the 10th of March, and went out of the jurisdiction herself on that day. On the 12th of March an order was made declaring the wife in contempt for breach of her undertaking. On the 12th of May the wife gave notice of appeal against so much of the order of the 10th of March as directed the payment of the costs of her application (dismissed on that day) out of her separate property, notwithstanding the restraint on anticipation. The wife was still in contempt at the time her appeal came on for hearing.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, notwithstanding her contempt, the appellant was entitled to be heard.

Held, further, that the wife's application to have the decree in the divorce suit varied—which application was dismissed on the 10th of March—was merely a step in the divorce suit, and not a "proceeding instituted by" the wife within the meaning of section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893; and consequently that so much of the order of the 10th of March as directed payment of the costs out of the separate property restrained from anticipation of the married woman was void for want of jurisdiction, and should be discharged.

Decision of Jeune, P. ([1903] P. 141, 51 W. R. Dig. 63), reversed.

This was an appeal by Lady Granville Gordon from a decision of the President (Sir F. Jeune) (reported [1903] P. D. 141, 51 W. R. Dig. 63), ordering that the costs in the divorce proceedings should be paid out of her separate estate, notwithstanding that it was subject to a restraint on anticipation.

On the 25th of November, 1901, the appellant's former husband, Mr. C. F. Gordon, obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of the marriage, Lord Granville Gordon being the co-respondent. The decree was made absolute on the 2nd of June, 1902, after which the divorced wife married Lord Granville Gordon. It was ordered by the decree nisi of the 25th of November, 1901, that the only child of the marriage should remain in the custody of the father. There was a later order, made ex parte in chambers, that the child should be delivered up to the father immediately. However, as the wife was out of England at the time this order was made, she took no notice of it. Subsequently in October, 1902, she returned to England, and on the 15th of October took out a summons to rescind the order for the custody of the child. This summons was, however, dismissed on the 10th of March, 1903, and an order was then made ordering the child to be delivered up to the father; and it was also then further ordered that the applicant (the wife) should pay to her former husband the costs of and incident to the summons, and that the same were payable out of her separate estate, notwithstanding that it was subject to a restraint on anticipation. In the meantime, the wife, the respondent to the divorce proceedings, had given an undertaking, through her counsel, not to remove the child out of the jurisdiction of the court pending the hearing of the application. As soon, however, as the order of the 10th of March was made, and it was attempted to enforce it, it was found that she had surreptitiously sent the child abroad, and gone away herself, and had not since returned.

The President, on the 12th of March, then made an order for her committal for contempt of court, and a writ of attachment for her arrest was issued against her for non-compliance with the order of the 25th of November, 1901, but as she remained out of England, she could not be arrested.

On the 12th of May, 1903, the divorced wife gave notice of appeal from such part of the order of the 10th of March as related to the payment out of her separate estate of the costs of the summons taken out by her on the 15th of October, 1902, to rescind the order for the custody of the child.

On the opening of the appeal, the preliminary objection was taken by counsel for the husband that until the appellant had purged her contempt she could not be heard.

Burgrave Deane, K.C., and Methold, for the divorced wife.—The appellant is entitled to come to the court and appeal against this order. If she can show cause against the contempt, she can show cause against a correlative order: Chuck v. Cremer, 1 Coop. (temp. Cottenham), and the cases therein cited, viz., Green v. Green, 2 Sim. 394, 430; Barker v. Dawson, 1 Coop. 207. Here, therefore, this order could be appealed from on the ground of irregularity; the judge had no power to order these costs to be paid out of the appellant's separate estate: Parry v. Perryman (in Chuck v. Cremer), also King v. Bryant, 3 Myl. & Cr. 191; Wilson v. Bates, 3 Myl. & Cr. 197, 201; Ricketts v. Mornington, 7 Sim. 200; In re Brady 1 Moll. Ch. Reps. in Ir. 254; Hawkins v. Hall, 1 Beav. 73; Anon v. Lord Gort, 1 Hog. 77; Valle v. O'Reilly, 1 Hog. 199; Morrison v. Morrison, 4 Hare 590. If the appellant is in contempt when the order for costs against her separate estate is made, then she is in contempt from the time she disobeys the injunction. Ex parte Chadwick, 15 Jurist 597, shows a person in contempt may object to anything after the contempt, if it is on the ground of irregularity. It is said the order is first, and the contempt after, and therefore these cases cannot apply, but nevertheless a person in contempt may be heard. [Stirling, L.J., referred to Chatterton v. Thomas, 36 L. J. Ch. N. S. 592, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 110.] There is no difference as to the order of dates in which the facts happened. It is said it is an invalid order, but the trustees have no power to object; supposing it were a receiving order, it would not be served on the trustees, and the result would be the trustees would keep the money in hand. This order operates as an injunction on the trustees, preventing them paying the income to her. The appellant cannot be punished by an invalid order, it must be done by law. This order should be discharged.

They also cited the following cases: Futvoye v. Kennard, 2 Giffard Reps. 110; Fry v. Ernest, 12 W. R. 97; Barnardo v. Ford, Gossage's case, 41 W. R. 333, [1892] A. C. 326; and Cattel v. Symons, 5 Beav. 396. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to In re Fernandez, Ex parte Fernandez, 9 W. R. 559 and 832, 10 C. B. N. S. 3.]

Duke, K.C., and Priestley, K.C., for the respondent husband.—On the 12th of March the appellant was admittedly in contempt of court. The rule in common law cases was to commit such a person.

They cited Cavendish v. Cavendish and Rochefoucauld, 15 W. R. 182; Garstin v. Garstin, 13 W. R. 508, 4 Sw. & T. 73; Curtis v. Curtis 5 Moore P. C. 252; Howard v. Newman, 1 Moll. Ch. Reps. in Ir. 221; Anonymous case, 15 Ves. jun. 174; Wenman v. Osbaldiston, 2 Bro. P.C. 276; Hewitt v. McCartney, 13 Ves. jun. 560; and Daniel's Chancery Practice (7th ed.), vol. 1, p. 724.

Bargrave Deane, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal against an order of the 10th of March, 1903, and a preliminary objection has been taken that the appellant is in contempt, and that therefore this appeal ought not to be heard. Now, the appeal is not against the whole of the order of the 10th of March, it is only against so much of it as orders that the costs incident to a summons which was taken out by the wife in chambers, and which was adjourned into court, should be payable out of her separate property, notwithstanding that such property is subject to a restraint on anticipation. The contempt which is relied upon as debarring the wife (the respondent in the divorce proceedings) from appealing against that part of the order is thus set forth in the 7th paragraph of the affidavit of Sir George Lewis: "Notwithstanding the undertaking of the respondent not to remove the said child out of the jurisdiction of the court, and in defiance thereof, the respondent two or three days before the decision of the court surreptitiously sent the child out of the country, and on the day the court gave judgment she herself left England." The undertaking was given antecedently to the summons being heard in court, and the question which we have to determine is whether this objection that the respondent is in contempt ought to prevail here. I think that it ought not to prevail here. We have heard of a great many cases which were decided in the Court of Chancery and of the rules and principles which were laid down by various judges, including Lord Cottenham, in reference to this matter of contempt, and when it should, and when it should not, debar a would-be appellant or a would-be applicant from being heard. The greater part of the cases are to be found set out in the notes to Chuck v. Cremer, in 1 Cooper (temp. Cottenham) 205; but I do not think it will be necessary to go through those cases. I think there are general principles which apply to this case which are not really affected by the decisions to which our attention was particularly called. What I mean by that is, that, taking it generally, it has not been disputed in this discussion that this rule about not hearing a person who is in contempt primâ facie applies to voluntary applications on his part, to cases where he comes and asks for something, and not to cases in which all that he is seeking, is to be heard in respect of matters of defence. Not that I am suggesting for one moment that it is every matter of defence which entitles a person in contempt to be heard; for instance, if there has been an order made in exercise of the discretion of the court, and someone who is oppressed, or thinks himself oppressed, by that order wants to show that the court exercised its discretion wrongly, that person, if he is in contempt, cannot be heard to say anything of the sort until he has purged his contempt. Garstin v. Garstin, 13 W. R. 508, 4 Swa. & T. 73, is an instance of that sort. But when you have to deal with an order as to which it is suggested that it may have been made without jurisdiction, then if upon looking at the order one sees that that is really the ground of appeal, it seems to me that such cases have always been treated as cases where the court will entertain the objection to the order, though the person making the objection is in contempt. It was admitted, and could not be otherwise than admitted, that if the objection was to the very order itself that created the contempt, and if the objection was of the character that I have described, the fact that the objector was in contempt did not deprive him of the right to be heard. I wish to mention here that I do not propose to go into the question of Lord Cottenham's rule as laid down in Barker v. Dawson (referred to in Chuck v. Cremer on p. 207) for this reason, that if you take the order of events here, as appearing upon Sir G. Lewis's affidavit, it will be seen that the particular case as to which Lord Cottenham laid down his rule in Barker v. Dawson was a case in which the sequence of events was different from the present sequence of events, and his rule has no application whatever to the events in the present case.

That being so, the simple point that we have to decide is this: Here is an order the objection to which is obviously of a character that does not depend upon the exercise of discretion at all. What is said is that it is unlawful to make such an order in respect of the separate property of a married woman restrained from anticipation—that is to say, unlawful for the court by which the order was made. And it is argued, on the other side, that we ought not to look at that order because this lady, the divorced wife, is in contempt. In my judgment that is not so. I think that having regard to the nature of the objection the present appellant, the respondent to the order, is merely coming here to say: "This order which has been made against me is an illegal order, and appears so upon the face of the order itself." I think, as that is so, there is no rule which has been brought to our notice which should prevent her being heard.

I have only to add this, that supposing this order is in fact an illegal order, and that we refused to hear this appellant now, it does not by any means follow that there would not be any opportunity hereafter of questioning the order. But be that as it may, I think that, having regard to the fact that the objection here is an objection to the legality of the order, it would not be right of the court to allow an order to continue in force without first determining the question of its legality. I think under those circumstances we ought to hear this appeal.

STIRLING, L.J.—I also think that this appeal ought to be heard. Counsel for the husband have relied on the decision of Lord Cottenham in Chuck v. Cremer. If our decision involved departing from what was laid down by Lord Cottenham there, I should myself desire further to consider the matter; but when the sequence of events in the present case is ascertained it appears to me that the case is not identical with Chuck v. Cremer. In that case the order of events was this. The defendant moved that an injunction granted ex parte might be dissolved; his application was unsuccessful, and then he gave notice of motion to appeal. Previous to the notice of appeal being given, an attachment was issued against the defendant, and he was in contempt; and that objection was taken to the appeal. The Lord Chancellor gave effect to the objection, but he said this: "That a party was entitled to be heard, if his object was to get rid of the order or other proceeding which placed him in contempt, and he was also entitled to be heard for the purpose of resisting or setting aside for irregularity any proceedings subsequent to his contempt." Here the contempt, according to the affidavit which the husband himself put forward, began two or three days before the order in question was made.

Therefore, in hearing the appeal, we are not doing anything contrary to what Lord Cottenham said. And here the question is not merely one of irregularity, but one of want of jurisdiction, and having regard to that, I entirely agree that the appeal ought to be heard.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. Until recently no court had any jurisdiction whatever to direct the payment of costs out of the separate estate of a married woman subject to restraint on anticipation; but in 1893 an Act was passed which in terms by section 2 declared that the court shall have jurisdiction from time to time, in certain cases, to direct payment of costs out of the separate estate of a married woman whether subject to restraint on anticipation or not—plainly a limited jurisdiction. The only object of this appeal, as I understand it, is to raise the contention that this is not one of the limited class of cases in which jurisdiction is given to the court by the express language of section 2 of the Act. That being so, I entirely agree with my brethren that this preliminary objection ought to be disallowed, but I desire to limit my judgment to a case in which the appellant is simply seeking to say that the order so far as it is complained of, is outside the jurisdiction of the court, as distinguished from the case of an order which although within the jurisdiction of the court, ought not, it is said, to have been made. So far as I can see, there is certainly no principle in opposition to the view which we have taken, nor do I think that there is any authority against it. Speaking for myself I have been unable to understand or discover what principle, if any, is at the root of all the various decisions which have been brought before us, as to the distinction between contempt committed before, and contempt committed after, the making of the order which it is sought to set aside.

Bargrave Deane, K.C., and Methold, for the divorced wife

They cited In re Lumley, Hood Barrs v. Cathcart, 42 W. R. 534, 633, [1894] 3 Ch. 376; Hood Barrs v. Heriot, 45 W. R. 1, 17, 507, [1896] 2 Q. B. 338, 375, [1897] A. C. 177; section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63).

Duke, K.C., and Priestley, K.C., for the petitioner, the husband, referred to Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 4, and Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85). The distinction is not between proceedings taken in an action and proceedings not taken in an action. A divorce is a proceeding under the Act of 1859, and the appellant as a divorced wife is in no better position than if she had been a mere relation.

They cited Nunn & Co. v. Tyson, 50 W. R. 16, [1901] 2 K. B. 487.

Bargrave Deane, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have not the slightest doubt myself that this summons was a step in the divorce suit, and that this summons did not initiate any litigation at all. Under those circumstances it is quite plain, having regard to the decision in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart and other cases, that there is no jurisdiction to make this order for the payment of costs notwithstanding the lady was restrained from anticipation. I do not think it is necessary to say any more. Everyone is agreed that these costs cannot be ordered to be paid out of these funds as to which a married woman is restrained from anticipation, unless they come within the words of section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893; and everyone is agreed that the matter is not brought within the words of section 2 unless the proceeding is a proceeding initiated by the married woman. I am of opinion that this summons was not initiated by the married woman, but was a mere step in the previous litigation.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Two orders of the Divorce Court were made on the 25th of November, 1901, one being the decree nisi in the suit, by which, after provisions with reference to the dissolution of the marriage, it was ordered that "the child, the issue of the marriage between the petitioner and the respondent, do remain in the custody of the petitioner until further order of the court, but it is directed that such child be not removed out of the jurisdiction of the court without its sanction." The other order of the 25th of November, 1901, was an order that the child "be forthwith delivered up to and do remain in the custody of the petitioner until further order of the court." Both orders were of a temporary nature, simply "until further order." Afterwards, on the 15th of October, 1902, the wife takes out a summons, or applies by summons, that those orders should be varied. The question we have to decide is this: Whether, within the terms of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, s. 2, this is "a proceeding instituted by" her. It has been held by the House of Lords, and also by the Court of Appeal that these words refer to an action or some other litigation initiated by the married woman. Now, can it be said that this summons was an action or other litigation initiated by the married woman. I think not. It seems to me simply a continuation of the old litigation which had been commenced by the husband by the institution of this suit for the dissolution of the marriage, in which, from the very first, the question of the custody of the child was a subject of litigation and was not finally determined by the two orders to which I have referred.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me both in form and in fact that the application of the lady was an application by her in the suit of Gordon v. Gordon, and was not an independent proceeding initiated by her.

Preliminary objection overruled and appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Dangerfield & Blythe; Lewis & Lewis.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. } Feb. 12.

In re ALLEN AND DRISCOLL'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Local government—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 150, 257—Expenses incurred by local authority—Charge upon premises—Date of charge—Completion of works—Vendor and purchaser.

Expenses incurred by a local authority for works executed in a street after notice to the owners of adjoining premises, and failure to comply with such notice, do not become a charge upon the premises under section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, until the completion of the works, notwithstanding that the works were executed by contractors in pursuance of a contract with the local authority under which the local authority became liable to pay for them.

Originating summons.

This was a vendor and purchaser summons, which raised the question whether expenses incurred by a local authority in paving a street adjoining certain houses had become a charge upon them prior to the completion of the works under section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The houses in question were leasehold houses belonging to the vendors situate in Rusthall-avenue, in Acton, Middlesex, and in February, 1903, the Urban District Council of Acton sent notices to the owners and occupiers of the houses to sewer, level, and pave the part of the street which adjoined the houses within five weeks of the date thereof.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

These notices were not complied with, and on the 13th of July, 1903, the council entered into an agreement with a firm of contractors to execute, among other works, the paving works in question at a certain sum.

On the 22nd of July, 1903, an order was made in an action of Allen v. Driscoll, that the defendants in that action (the purchasers and applicants on this summons) should pay to the plaintiffs (the vendors and respondents) on or before the 29th of September, 1903, the sum of £4,440 in settlement of the purchase-money and interest due in respect of the houses in question, the plaintiffs undertaking to make a good title to the houses and to assign them to the defendants, the defendants undertaking to accept the houses; and it was ordered that the plaintiffs were to receive the rents and pay the outgoings in respect thereof up to the 29th of September, 1903.

The works were not wholly completed by this latter date, and the purchasers took out this summons asking for a declaration that the vendors were liable to pay and indemnify them against the amount when apportioned of the expenses incurred by the local authority under the Public Health Act, 1875, for paving and other works in respect of these houses.

Cozens-Hardy, for the purchasers. — Although several cases have decided that the expenses became a charge upon the premises at least as early as the time of completion of the works, yet no case has decided whether or not they do not become a charge at an earlier time. I submit that when the local authority entered into a binding contract with the contractors that these works should be done at a certain price they incurred the expense, and that therefore under section 257 of the Act this expense became a charge upon the houses.

He referred to Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell, 29 W. R. 36, 15 Ch. D. 378; Mayor of West Ham v. Grant, 40 Ch. D. 331, 37 W. R. Dig. 113; Bettesworth and Richer's Contract, 36 W. R. 544, 37 Ch. D. 535; Stock v. Meakin, 48 W. R. 420, [1900] 1 Ch. 683; Surtees v. Woodhouse, 51 W. R. 275, [1903] 1 K. B. 396.

Norton, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the vendors.—Stock v. Meakin is precisely in point, and the court there decided that the date fixed by the Act for the commencement of the charge is that of completion of the works. Stock v. Meakin upon this point was also followed by your lordship in In re Waterhouse's Contract, 44 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 645. Moreover, the expenses are not recoverable until service of a demand for them, which has not been made.

Cozens-Hardy in reply.—The charge arises independently of the personal liability: see observations of Kay, J., in Mayor of West Ham v. Grant, 40 Ch. D., p. 335.

BYRNE, J.—The decision in Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell left still open the question whether or not the date of completion of the works is the actual time when the charge first arises, or whether the expenses may be said to have been incurred within the meaning of section 257 before the date fixed for completion. It is also obvious that in Mayor of West Ham v. Grant the learned judge did not determine the question; and again, in Bettesworth and Richer's Contract, although the learned judge says "it seems to me that the expenses were a charge which came into existence, at all events as early as the 26th of June, 1886"—that being the date of completion of the works in that case—yet he leaves it open to argument whether it might come into existence at an earlier period. In the later case of Scott v. Meakin it is again true that it was not necessary to decide as between the date of completion and an earlier date, yet I do not doubt that the court did determine that the former was the date at which the expenses were first incurred, and I do not see why I should put another interpretation upon the section; and again, in Surtees v. Woodhouse, although the question was not the one raised before me, yet Stirling, J., speaking of Stock v. Meakin, said "it was held that the amount of the expenses incurred under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, becomes a charge on the premises on which they are apportioned as from the date of the completion of the works, and not from the date of final apportionment." In the result it appears to me that for the purpose of ascertaining the date when the charge first arises under section 257 of the Act the local authority did not incur the expenses within the meaning of that section before the date of completion of the works.

Solicitor for the applicants, T. Blanco White.

Solicitors for the respondents, Taylor, Willcocks, & Lemon.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Feb. 6.

MORTON v. BANK OF ENGLAND. (a.)

Poor law — School district — Board — Dissolution — Transfer of Consolidated Stock—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101), ss. 40, 42, 45—Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 2), ss. 1, 12.

A school district and a board for such district were constituted under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844. The district was dissolved. At the date of the dissolution there was standing in the books of the Bank of England a sum of 2½ per cent. Consolidated Stock, which represented surplus assets of the board of management.

Held, that the corporate body remained in existence either by implication from section 1 of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 2 or according to the common law rule so long as any one of the corporators remained alive. The plaintiffs, the last acting managers, were not entitled to claim that the property was vested in them automatically under 33 & 34 Vict. c. 2, section 12, and it would be necessary that the transfer of the Consolidated Stock be executed under the corporate seal of the board.

Action.

The plaintiffs were the last acting managers of the South Metropolitan School District (dissolved).

The South Metropolitan School District was originally constituted by an order of the Poor Law Board dated the 12th of March, 1849.

By an order of the Local Government Board of the 30th of March, 1898, and by subsequent orders, the school district was dissolved from and after the 29th of September, 1902.

At the date of the dissolution of the school district there was standing in the books of the defendant, the Bank of England, the sum of £15,329 13s. 5d. 2½ per cent. Consolidated Stock, in the names of the board of management of the South Metropolitan School District.

Upon the dissolution of the school district the real and personal property belonging to the board of management (other than the said Consols) was realized under the authority of the Local Government Board, and the liabilities of the board of married woman subject to restraint on anticipation; but in 1893 an Act was passed which in terms by section 2 declared that the court shall have jurisdiction from time to time, in certain cases, to direct payment of costs out of the separate estate of a married woman whether subject to restraint on anticipation or not—plainly a limited jurisdiction. The only object of this appeal, as I understand it, is to raise the contention that this is not one of the limited class of cases in which jurisdiction is given to the court by the express language of section 2 of the Act. That being so, I entirely agree with my brethren that this preliminary objection ought to be disallowed, but I desire to limit my judgment to a case in which the appellant is simply seeking to say that the order so far as it is complained of, is outside the jurisdiction of the court, as distinguished from the case of an order which although within the jurisdiction of the court, ought not, it is said, to have been made. So far as I can see, there is certainly no principle in opposition to the view which we have taken, nor do I think that there is any authority against it. Speaking for myself I have been unable to understand or discover what principle, if any, is at the root of all the various decisions which have been brought before us, as to the distinction between contempt committed before, and contempt committed after, the making of the order which it is sought to set aside.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bargrave Deane, K.C., and Methold, for the divorced wife

They cited In re Lumley, Hood Barrs v. Cathcart, 42 W. R. 534, 633, [1894] 3 Ch. 376; Hood Barrs v. Heriot, 45 W. R. 1, 17, 507, [1896] 2 Q. B. 338, 375, [1897] A. C. 177; section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63).

Duke, K.C., and Priestley, K.C., for the petitioner, the husband, referred to Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 4, and Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85). The distinction is not between proceedings taken in an action and proceedings not taken in an action. A divorce is a proceeding under the Act of 1859, and the appellant as a divorced wife is in no better position than if she had been a mere relation.

They cited Nunn & Co. v. Tyson, 50 W. R. 16, [1901] 2 K. B. 487.

Bargrave Deane, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have not the slightest doubt myself that this summons was a step in the divorce suit, and that this summons did not initiate any litigation at all. Under those circumstances it is quite plain, having regard to the decision in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart and other cases, that there is no jurisdiction to make this order for the payment of costs notwithstanding the lady was restrained from anticipation. I do not think it is necessary to say any more. Everyone is agreed that these costs cannot be ordered to be paid out of these funds as to which a married woman is restrained from anticipation, unless they come within the words of section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893; and everyone is agreed that the matter is not brought within the words of section 2 unless the proceeding is a proceeding initiated by the married woman. I am of opinion that this summons was not initiated by the married woman, but was a mere step in the previous litigation.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Two orders of the Divorce Court were made on the 25th of November, 1901, one being the decree nisi in the suit, by which, after provisions with reference to the dissolution of the marriage, it was ordered that "the child, the issue of the marriage between the petitioner and the respondent, do remain in the custody of the petitioner until further order of the court, but it is directed that such child be not removed out of the jurisdiction of the court without its sanction." The other order of the 25th of November, 1901, was an order that the child "be forthwith delivered up to and do remain in the custody of the petitioner until further order of the court." Both orders were of a temporary nature, simply "until further order." Afterwards, on the 15th of October, 1902, the wife takes out a summons, or applies by summons, that those orders should be varied. The question we have to decide is this: Whether, within the terms of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, s. 2, this is "a proceeding instituted by" her. It has been held by the House of Lords, and also by the Court of Appeal that these words refer to an action or some other litigation initiated by the married woman. Now, can it be said that this summons was an action or other litigation initiated by the married woman. I think not. It seems to me simply a continuation of the old litigation which had been commenced by the husband by the institution of this suit for the dissolution of the marriage, in which, from the very first, the question of the custody of the child was a subject of litigation and was not finally determined by the two orders to which I have referred.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me both in form and in fact that the application of the lady was an application by her in the suit of Gordon v. Gordon, and was not an independent proceeding initiated by her.

Preliminary objection overruled and appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Dangerfield & Blythe; Lewis & Lewis.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. — Feb. 12.

In re ALLEN AND DRISCOLL'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Local government—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 150, 257—Expenses incurred by local authority—Charge upon premises—Date of charge—Completion of works—Vendor and purchaser.

Expenses incurred by a local authority for works executed in a street after notice to the owners of adjoining premises, and failure to comply with such notice, do not become a charge upon the premises under section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, until the completion of the works, notwithstanding that the works were executed by contractors in pursuance of a contract with the local authority under which the local authority became liable to pay for them.

Originating summons.

This was a vendor and purchaser summons, which raised the question whether expenses incurred by a local authority in paving a street adjoining certain houses had become a charge upon them prior to the completion of the works under section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The houses in question were leasehold houses belonging to the vendors situate in Rusthall-avenue, in Acton, Middlesex, and in February, 1903, the Urban District Council of Acton sent notices to the owners and occupiers of the houses to sewer, level, and pave the part of the street which adjoined the houses within five weeks of the date thereof.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

These notices were not complied with, and on the 13th of July, 1903, the council entered into an agreement with a firm of contractors to execute, among other works, the paving works in question at a certain sum.

On the 22nd of July, 1903, an order was made in an action of Allen v. Driscoll, that the defendants in that action (the purchasers and applicants on this summons) should pay to the plaintiffs (the vendors and respondents) on or before the 29th of September, 1903, the sum of £4,440 in settlement of the purchase-money and interest due in respect of the houses in question, the plaintiffs undertaking to make a good title to the houses and to assign them to the defendants, the defendants undertaking to accept the houses; and it was ordered that the plaintiffs were to receive the rents and pay the outgoings in respect thereof up to the 29th of September, 1903.

The works were not wholly completed by this latter date, and the purchasers took out this summons asking for a declaration that the vendors were liable to pay and indemnify them against the amount when apportioned of the expenses incurred by the local authority under the Public Health Act, 1875, for paving and other works in respect of these houses.

Cozens-Hardy, for the purchasers. — Although several cases have decided that the expenses became a charge upon the premises at least as early as the time of completion of the works, yet no case has decided whether or not they do not become a charge at an earlier time. I submit that when the local authority entered into a binding contract with the contractors that these works should be done at a certain price they incurred the expense, and that therefore under section 257 of the Act this expense became a charge upon the houses.

He referred to Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell, 29 W. R. 36, 15 Ch. D. 378; Mayor of West Ham v. Grant, 40 Ch. D. 331, 37 W. R. Dig. 113; Betteswortb and Richer's Contract, 36 W. R. 544, 37 Ch. D. 535; Stock v. Meakin, 48 W. R. 420, [1900] 1 Ch. 683; Surtees v. Woodhouse, 51 W. R. 275, [1903] 1 K. B. 396.

Norton, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the vendors.—Stock v. Meakin is precisely in point, and the court there decided that the date fixed by the Act for the commencement of the charge is that of completion of the works. Stock v. Meakin upon this point was also followed by your lordship in In re Waterhouse's Contract, 44 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 645. Moreover, the expenses are not recoverable until service of a demand for them, which has not been made.

Cozens-Hardy in reply.—The charge arises independently of the personal liability: see observations of Kay, J., in Mayor of West Ham v. Grant, 40 Ch. D., p. 335.

BYRNE, J.—The decision in Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell left still open the question whether or not the date of completion of the works is the actual time when the charge first arises, or whether the expenses may be said to have been incurred within the meaning of section 257 before the date fixed for completion. It is also obvious that in Mayor of West Ham v. Grant the learned judge did not determine the question; and again, in Betteswortb and Richer's Contract, although the learned judge says "it seems to me that the expenses were a charge which came into existence, at all events as early as the 26th of June, 1886"—that being the date of completion of the works in that case—yet he leaves it open to argument whether it might come into existence at an earlier period. In the later case of Scott v. Meakin it is again true that it was not necessary to decide as between the date of completion and an earlier date, yet I do not doubt that the court did determine that the former was the date at which the expenses were first incurred, and I do not see why I should put another interpretation upon the section; and again, in Surtees v. Woodhouse, although the question was not the one raised before me, yet Stirling, J., speaking of Stock v. Meakin, said "it was held that the amount of the expenses incurred under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, becomes a charge on the premises on which they are apportioned as from the date of the completion of the works, and not from the date of final apportionment." In the result it appears to me that for the purpose of ascertaining the date when the charge first arises under section 257 of the Act the local authority did not incur the expenses within the meaning of that section before the date of completion of the works.

Solicitor for the applicants, T. Blanco White.

Solicitors for the respondents, Taylor, Willcocks, & Lemon.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Feb. 6.

MORTON v. BANK OF ENGLAND. (a.)

Poor law — School district — Board — Dissolution — Transfer of Consolidated Stock—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101), ss. 40, 42, 45—Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 2), ss. 1, 12.

A school district and a board for such district were constituted under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844. The district was dissolved. At the date of the dissolution there was standing in the books of the Bank of England a sum of 2½ per cent. Consolidated Stock, which represented surplus assets of the board of management.

Held, that the corporate body remained in existence either by implication from section 1 of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 2 or according to the common law rule so long as any one of the corporators remained alive. The plaintiffs, the last acting managers, were not entitled to claim that the property was vested in them automatically under 33 & 34 Vict. c. 2, section 12, and it would be necessary that the transfer of the Consolidated Stock be executed under the corporate seal of the board.

Action.

The plaintiffs were the last acting managers of the South Metropolitan School District (dissolved).

The South Metropolitan School District was originally constituted by an order of the Poor Law Board dated the 12th of March, 1849.

By an order of the Local Government Board of the 30th of March, 1898, and by subsequent orders, the school district was dissolved from and after the 29th of September, 1902.

At the date of the dissolution of the school district there was standing in the books of the defendant, the Bank of England, the sum of £15,329 13s. 5d. 2½ per cent. Consolidated Stock, in the names of the board of management of the South Metropolitan School District.

Upon the dissolution of the school district the real and personal property belonging to the board of management (other than the said Consols) was realized under the authority of the Local Government Board, and the liabilities of the board of management were discharged. The Consols represented surplus assets of the board of management.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By an order of the Local Government Board of the 10th of August, 1903, the plaintiffs, as the last acting managers of the school district, were ordered to transfer the Consols to the Guardians of the Poor of St. Giles', Greenwich, St. Olave's, Stepney, and Woolwich.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that they were entitled as joint tenants to the said Consols and that they were entitled to require the bank to transfer the Consols into their joint names. Alternatively that they were entitled as the last acting managers of the school district to transfer the Consols in the books of the bank into the names of the poor law guardians mentioned in the order of the Local Government Board.

The Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act, 1870, provides:

Section 1. "When the Poor Law Board shall have dissolved or shall dissolve any district the component parts whereof shall not have been formed into one union . . . the persons who are acting as managers . . . at the time of the dissolution . . . and the survivors of them, shall continue in office for the purpose of paying and discharging the debts and liabilities of such district . . . and of receiving and recovering moneys or other property due to the said district . . . in like manner as the board of management . . . could have done if no dissolution . . . had taken place . . . and provided that no such managers or guardians shall be empowered to act in the manner aforesaid for a longer period than twelve months from the date of the dissolution . . . unless the Poor Law Board by their order shall authorize them to continue to act for some special purpose."

Section 12. "Upon the disolution of any district or union . . . the real and personal estate vested in the managers . . . of such district . . . shall be transferred to and vested in the persons who were acting as managers . . . at the time of such dissolution or addition to be held by them as joint tenants, according to the nature of such property, in trust for the parishes comprised in such district. . . ."

Bramwell Davis, K.C., and J. B. Matthews, for the plaintiffs, contended that section 12 of the Dissolved Boards, &c., Act, 1870, operated so as to automatically vest the Consols in them, and that they were entitled as shareholders to transfer the same under section 4 of the National Debt Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 37), s. 4.

Upjohn, K.C., and Howard Wright, for the defendants.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment said: It is by no means easy to find one's way through the maze of these Acts of Parliament, but I have come to a clear conclusion upon the particular one before me, which is the only one I am concerned with.

By the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834, s. 40, the commissioners formed school districts. By section 42 a board shall be constituted for every district. Now, these are obviously two different and distinct things. The district is one thing, the board for the district is another.

By section 45 every such district board is incorporated for the purpose of holding the property and suing and being sued. Then the Metropolis Poor Amendment Act of 1869 authorizes the Poor Law Board, as and when they shall see fit, to dissolve any school district. Now, that is obviously the district and not the board or the incorporated entity.

Then the Dissolved Boards of Management Act, 1870, contains a preamble, "Whereas it is expedient that better provision should be made for the proceedings of boards of management and boards of guardians when the districts or unions for which they have acted respectively are dissolved." That clearly again treats the board as existing after the dissolution of the district. It provides, section 1, that when the Poor Law Board shall have dissolved any district the persons who were acting as managers at the time of the dissolution shall continue in office for the purpose of practically winding up the affairs of the district and paying its debts and receiving and recovering its property, with a proviso that "No such managers or guardians shall be empowered to act in the manner aforesaid for a longer period than twelve months from the date of the dissolution, unless the Poor Law Board by their order shall authorize them to continue to act for some special purpose." Then, by section 12 of that Act, down to this point the district being dissolved, but the corporate board remaining, it is provided that upon the dissolution of any district the real and personal estate vested in the managers shall be transferred to and vested in the persons who were acting as managers at the time of such dissolution, to be held by them as joint tenants in trust for the parishes comprised in such district. Now, obviously the meaning of that is that you dissolve the district, splitting it thereupon into its various component parts, all of whom would have some share in the property which had formerly been held by the corporate body in trust for the district. The provision is that the real and personal estate vested in the managers shall be transferred to the district. The phrase is a little unfortunate, because it is not strictly accurate to say it is vested in the managers; it is vested in the board of management which has been incorporated, but I think, inasmuch as there may be cases in which the managers are not incorporated because this extends to various other districts, asylums, and unions, the reasonable construction is that property vested in the managers, whether it be vested in them as individuals or as a corporation, it shall be transferred and vested.

Now, in my opinion, that is not, as has been argued, an automatic vesting order, the phraseology of which we are familiar with. The words are "shall vest in." We all understand that, but when you say it shall be transferred to and vested in, it is not "vest in" but "vested in" which point to an act to be done by persons mentioned who are ordered to do the acts necessary for that purpose. That appears to me to be a simple and reasonable solution of the matter.

It has been suggested that it is absurd to leave this corporate body still existing. I do not see the absurdity. It is obvious that the property on the dissolution of the district must be somewhere or other, and if you ipso facto dissolve both districts and board at the same moment, the title to the real estate in land would, I suppose, vest in the Crown, and the title to the Consols in the bank would vest, I suppose, also in the Crown as bona vacantia. I do not know, but at any rate the Legislature appeared to me to have adopted a much more convenient course by keeping the corporate body in existence, either by implication from the first section of the Act of 1870, for so long a period as there remains anything to be done, or according to the common law rule, so long as any one of the corporators remain alive. I should prefer myself, if it were necessary to decide, that it was the first. I do not think that it is necessary for me on this particular occasion to determine to whom the property is to be transferred. On the face of it it is to be to the persons who were acting as managers at the date of the dissolution.

Now the order of dissolution in this case was dated the 29th of March, 1898, directing the dissolution to take effect as from the 30th of September, 1899. A question has been raised which is one of very considerable importance as to the power of the Local Government Board to undo that dissolution and set up the board again, and then dissolve it again, or to continue the managers for a period of more than twelve months except for a special purpose specified on the face of the order. I do not think it is necessary for me to determine that, because I think it is sufficient for me to declare that the plaintiffs are not entitled to claim as they do, that the property is vested in them under this particular section, but that it would be necessary for the transfer to be executed under the corporate seal of the board, and thereupon, when that transfer is presented to the Bank of England, the bank will, no doubt, with their usual care and skill, consider whether the persons to whom the transfer is proposed to be made are the right and proper persons. But I hope they will not come to me again; I think that is the proper thing to do.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Benjamin Avery.

Solicitor for the defendants, Freshfields.

K. B. Div. (Buckley, J.) March 4, 10.

LIVINGSTONE v. MAYOR, &c., OF WESTMINSTER. (a.)

Local government—Metropolitan borough—Compensation to existing officer on abolition of office—Amount of salary and emoluments—Resolution assessing compensation—Rescission by subsequent resolution—Validity—London Government Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 14), s. 30 (2)—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 81 (7)—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 120.

A metropolitan borough council, successors to a vestry, resolved to abolish the office of an "existing officer," and passed a resolution assessing his compensation under section 120 of the Local Government Act, 1888. The amount assessed was a proportion of a sum claimed by him as representing his emoluments. Afterwards the council being advised that this amount was excessive, and therefore illegally assessed, by reason of the fact that certain items were improperly included in his claim, passed another resolution rescinding the first, and assessing his compensation at the same proportion of a lesser sum.

Held, that the amount of his emoluments was a question of fact to be ascertained by the council, subject to an appeal to the Treasury, and that the council, having ascertained that fact, and, by the first resolution, assessed the compensation, in the absence of an appeal to the Treasury, became bound to the officer to pay to him the compensation so assessed, and could not, by a subsequent resolution, relieve itself of that obligation.

This was an action (brought before his lordship sitting as an additional judge of the King's Bench Division) to recover arrears of compensation alleged to be due to the plaintiff as the former holder of an office which had been abolished by the defendants under section 30 of the London Government Act, 1899.

Between 1874 and the 9th of November, 1900, the plaintiff was in the service of the Vestry of St. George's, Hanover-square, as a surveyor. In addition to his salary he received, under a resolution of the vestry of the 19th of August, 1875, an allowance of £20 a year and the provision of fodder, stable room, and attendance in respect of the finding by him of a horse and vehicle to assist him in superintending outdoor work. By another resolution of the vestry of the 18th of October, 1900, the plaintiff received an honorarium in consideration of certain extra services.

On the 9th of November, 1900, the Westminster City Council came into office and, under the London Government Act, 1899, the plaintiff became one of its officers. Under a resolution of the 31st of January, 1901, he was, without prejudice to the amount of his compensation for abolition of office, appointed temporarily city engineer and surveyor for three months at a monthly salary.

By a resolution of the 9th of May, 1901, the office of surveyor of the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, was abolished, and the plaintiff was requested to send in his claim for compensation for abolition of office.

The plaintiff duly sent in his claim showing the amount received and expended by him during each of the five years preceding the 31st of May on account of the emoluments for which he claimed compensation. He included in his claim the salary which he had received from the vestry, the honorarium voted to him in 1899, the amount which he had received on account of his temporary appointment by the council, the £20 a year voted to him by the resolution of 1875, and estimated amounts representing the value of the fodder, stable-room and attendance voted to him by the same resolution. The average salary and other emoluments for the five years was thereby stated to be £841.

At a meeting of the council on the 1st of August, 1901, it was resolved that the plaintiff be granted "an annual allowance of £518 12s. 4d., being $\frac{1}{60}$ for each year of service (i.e., twenty-seven years), plus $\frac{10}{60}$ for compulsory abolition of office (total $\frac{37}{60}$) of his average salary and other emoluments for the five years next before the date of the abolition of his office."

On the 6th of November, 1902, the district auditor, as a result of his audit of the accounts of the council for the year ending the 31st of March, 1902, disallowed so much of the allowance of £518 12s. 4d. as was based on the claim in respect of the horse and vehicle found by the plaintiff and the provision of the fodder, stable room and attendance.

At a meeting of the council on the 20th of November, 1902, it was resolved: "(a) that the resolution of the council of the 1st of August, 1901, granting Mr. Livingstone an annual allowance of £518 12s. 4d. be rescinded; (b) that in lieu thereof Mr. Livingstone be granted an annual allowance of £432 7s. 10d., being $\frac{37}{60}$ of the average salary and other emoluments of the office . . . which amounted to £701 12s., and that such annual allowance shall commence to be payable, subject to a proper adjustment of the same and of the amounts already paid, as from the date of such abolition."

This meeting was specially convened for the purpose of considering the report of the General Purposes Committee that the resolution of the 1st of August, 1901, should be rescinded, and there was compliance with all the requirements of the bye-laws of the council in respect of it. There was, however, no public notice of the special purpose of the meeting within section 9 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 112)—a provision relating to the proceedings of administrative vestries which is applied to those of borough councils by section 2 (5) of the London Government Act, 1899.

Subsequent payments having been made to the plaintiff on the footing that his allowance was thenceforth £432 7s. 10d., the present action was brought.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Danckwerts, K.C., and W. F. Craies, for the plaintiff.—By the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 57, a resolution of an administrative vestry, or now of a borough council, is not to be revoked at a subsequent meeting unless the subsequent meeting is specially convened for the purpose. By section 9 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1856, a necessary formality for the convention of such a meeting is the affixing notice thereof and of the special purpose for which the meeting is convened "on or near the door of any building where the said meeting is to be holden." That formality not having been observed in the case of the meeting of the 20th of November, 1902, the resolution passed at that meeting is invalid. Apart from the informality of the second meeting the council had no power to rescind the resolution of the 1st of August, 1901. The plaintiff was an existing officer of the council whose office was abolished by the council. The method of ascertaining the compensation to be paid to him is that contained in section 120 of the Local Government Act, 1888: see London Government Act, 1899, s. 30 (2), Local Government Act, 1894, s. 81 (4, 7). All the procedure indicated in section 120 was observed, and, there having been no appeal from the decision of the council to the Treasury within three months, the sum assessed by the council as compensation became, in the words of sub-section 6, "a speciality debt due to" the plaintiff from the council and enforceable "in like manner as if the council had entered into a bond to pay the same." In estimating the amount of compensation the council had regard to all the circumstances mentioned in section 120 (1), and the amount awarded did not exceed that prescribed by the Acts and rules relating to the civil service, to be paid to a person on abolition of office; that amount is fixed by the Superannuation Act, 1859 (22 Vict. c. 26), ss. 2, 7, as two-thirds of his salary and emoluments. It was for the council, subject to an appeal to the Treasury, to ascertain what his salary and emoluments were. Unless they refuse to exercise their jurisdiction, there is no appeal to this court: Rex v. Stepney Corporation, 50 W. R. 412, [1902], 1 K. B. 317. The plaintiff obtained a private advantage out of the allowances in respect of the horse and vehicle; and that is an emolument within The Queen v. Postmaster-General, 26 W. R. 322, 3 Q. B. D. 428, which the council could and did value for the purpose of assessing the compensation. In any event it was within their jurisdiction to find that it was an emolument, and this court will not review the decision to which they came; Brittain v. Kinnaird, 1 B & B. 432; The Queen v. Bolton, 1 Q. B. 66, 73; Allen v. Sharp, 2 Ex, 352; In re Holborn Land Tax Assessment, 5 Ex. 548. The council having assessed the compensation was functus officio and had no jurisdiction to rescind its previous resolution. Section 57 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, is merely restrictive of any right of rescission possessed by a council apart from that section.

Manisty, K.C., and R. C. Glen for the defendant council. The meeting of the 20th of November, 1902, was convened with sufficient regularity. The resolution of the 1st of August, 1901, was ultra vires, because it was in excess of the statutory powers of the council. In the first place, the compensation thereby assessed was based on a statement of salary and emoluments during the wrong period of five years. The words in section 120 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888, "next before the passing of this Act," must be read into section 30 of the London Government Act, 1899. Accordingly the five years must be those next before the passing of the Act of 1899, and not those next before the abolition of the office. [BUCKLEY, J.—The council is to assess, "having regard to" the statement; it is not bound to assess over a particular period of five years]. Secondly, the council had no power to take into consideration any salary or emolument which he had received as an officer of the council. Thirdly, the advantages he obtained in respect of the horse and vehicle were not an "emolument" within the Superannuation Act, 1859. Where in awarding compensation the council has acted ultra vires, this court has jurisdiction to put the matter right.

They referred to Upperton v. Ridley, [1903], A. C. 281, 51 W. R. Dig. 120, and Ashbury Railway, &c., Co. v. Riche, 24 W. R. 794, 7 H. L. 653.

Danckwerts, K.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J.—When the London Government Act, 1899, came into effect, in November, 1900, the plaintiff, Mr. Livingstone, was an existing officer of the vestry of St. George's, Hanover-square, within section 30 (1) of that Act. Under a scheme made by virtue of section 30 (4) the Westminster City Council, which, by virtue of the Act, succeeded to the vestry, had power to agree with him, as an existing officer of the vestry, that his acceptance of an office under the council for a temporary period should not prejudice any right to compensation to which he would otherwise have been entitled by or under the Act of 1899. The Act having, as I have said, come into operation in November, 1900, the council passed, on the 31st of January, 1901, a resolution for his temporary employment at a certain salary, without prejudice to the amount of his compensation for abolition of office. On the 9th of May, 1901, the council resolved that the office of surveyor to the parish of St. George's, Hanover-square, be abolished as from the 31st of May, 1901, and asked him to send in his claim for compensation. He did so, with the result that, on the 1st of August, 1901, the council passed a resolution granting him an annual allowance of £518 12s. 4d. The defendants say that the plaintiff, in sending in his claim, gave the particulars of a wrong period of five years. They say that, having regard to section 120 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888, the proper five years would have been five years next before the passing of the Act of 1899. I do not agree; but it is immaterial, for the power of the council is, by virtue of section 120 (3) of the Act of 1888, a power to assess, not in respect of any particular period, but generally. If the plaintiff did select a wrong five years the council should have asked him for another return. In fact, however, I believe it was they who named the particular five years for which he gave the particulars. At any rate, having his claim before them, the council assessed the compensation and passed the resolution of the 1st of August, 1901.

The first question for decision is whether that resolution is valid. The only ground upon which it is attacked is that, the maximum sum which could be voted as compensation being thirty-seven sixtieths of his salary and emoluments, the sum—viz., £841, of which £518 12s. 4d. is thirty-seven sixtieths, is alleged to have been in excess of his salary and emoluments. The maximum is arrived at by reference to several Acts of Parliament, of which the later in each case introduces by reference some part of a former Act. The Act of 1899, section 30 (2), brings in section 81 (7) of the Local Government Act, 1894, which in turn brings in section 120 of the Local Government Act, 1888. The concluding words of section 120 (1) of the Act of 1888 bring in section 7 of the Superannuation

Act, 1859, which in turn sends the reader back to section 2 of the Act of 1859. The result is that section 7 of the Act of 1859, coupled with section 2 of the same Act, fixes as the maximum compensation which can be given in any case forty sixtieths, or two-thirds of the officer's salary and emoluments, but having regard to the length of this officer's service, the maximum in his case is thirty-seven sixtieths of the salary and emoluments of his office. The facts which would have to be investigated in order to determine what the plaintiff's salary and emoluments were, include the following: First, what emolument within the decision of The Queen v. Postmaster-General the officer derived under a resolution of the vestry of the 19th of August, 1875, by which, in the event of his finding a horse and carriage to assist him in his outdoor work, the vestry made him an allowance of £20 a year, and provided fodder, stable-room, and attendance. Secondly, what emolument, if any, the officer received in respect of a sum of £100, which, by a resolution of the vestry of the 18th of October, 1900, was voted for certain extra services. Thirdly, what emolument or salary, if any, was to be taken into account in respect of the officer's employment under the resolution of the 31st of January, 1901 (which was passed before the resolution of the 9th of May, 1901, abolishing the office), having regard to the fact that section 120 (1) of the Act of 1888 provides that regard is to be had to (inter alia) any additional emolument "which he acquires by virtue of anything done in pursuance or in consequence of this Act," and there may have been other matters to which I need not refer. The defendants contend that the question of fact—viz., what was the amount of the officer's salary and emoluments?—is not one which was by the statute remitted to the council for determination, but that this court must in this action examine and determine it, and if this court finds that £841 is in excess of the salary and emoluments the resolution of August, 1901, is ultra vires and wholly void. In my opinion that contention is not well founded. For this purpose the salary and emoluments in question are not the average salary and emoluments for any period of five years, or any other time, but may be the ultimate salary and emoluments of the office. It was, I think, for the council to determine the question of fact what the salary and emoluments amounted to, and if they have considered and arrived at a decision upon it, it is not competent to this court to review their decision. If the decision was wrong it could have been made the subject of an appeal to the Treasury under section 120 (4) of the Act of 1888. If the council had plainly proceeded upon a wrong basis (if, for instance, they had by mistake taken the officer's salary to be £1,000 when it was only £500) I think, as presently stated, there might have been ground of defence to an action for more than the right amount; or, if they had thus plainly gone wrong, or had not fairly assessed the compensation in exercise of their powers, it may be that a mandamus would lie to call upon them to assess it anew. But, subject to the above, I think it is for the council, and not for this court, to say what was the amount of the salary and emoluments of the office abolished. The defendants contend that, having regard to the concluding words of section 120 (1) of the Act of 1888, I must examine what was the true amount of the salary and emoluments, and, if I find it to be less than £841, then the resolution of August, 1901, was ultra vires. This contention, I think, fails. Even assuming (which I think is not the case, as will presently appear) that those words could in any case give rise to a question of ultra vires, it is, I think, for the council, which has the jurisdiction if the question of fact be rightly determined, to determine the fact upon which its jurisdiction arises. If the council has jurisdiction within limits, it is for the council to determine the questions of fact, whose decision is necessary to determine the limits. An analogy, although not a perfect one, may be found in cases where the jurisdiction of a magistrate arises only if a particular fact be found to exist; say, for instance, jurisdiction under the Game Laws. The magistrate may convict if the bird be a partridge, but not if it be a thrush. It is for the magistrate to decide whether it was a partridge or not. If jurisdiction arises if an offence charged be true in fact, it is for the person whose jurisdiction is invoked to determine the fact. In Cave v. Mountain, 1 Man. & Gr. 257, 261, Tindal, L.C.J., said: "There can be no doubt but that if a magistrate commit a party charged before him in a case where he has no jurisdiction he is liable to an action of trespass. But if the charge be of an offence over which, if the offence charged be true, in fact the magistrate has jurisdiction, the magistrate's jurisdiction cannot be made to depend upon the truth or falsehood of the facts, or upon the evidence being sufficient or insufficient to establish the corpus delicti brought under investigation." As instances, I refer to Brittain v. Kinnaird, and in particular to the amusing judgment of Richardson, J., and to The Queen v. Bolton. So where there was authority to assess a duty on horse-dealers, the decision of the assessor that the party was a horse-dealer, however erroneous, could not be questioned in an action: Allen v. Sharp. Here the amount of the salary and emoluments is a fact lying at the root of the decision which is by the Act remitted to the council with a right of appeal to the Treasury. By section 120 (4) of the Act of 1888, the question of the compensation being "excessive" can be brought before the Treasury, and is to be determined by them. It is for the council or the Treasury, I think, and not for this court, to determine this question of fact. Further, the concluding words of section 120 (1) of the Act of 1888 are not, I think, words whose effect is to render the action of the council ultra vires if they by their vote exceed the amount. They are at most words which might afford a ground of defence to an action for an amount exceeding the amount which can be given under the Act of 1859. If a statutory corporation having a capital of a certain amount issues capital in excess of that amount, the excess, but not the whole issue, is invalid. If the council having statutory power to vote an officer compensation up to, say, £500, vote him £600, the vote will be good to the extent of the £500, but bad as to the excess. The question of ultra vires does not, therefore, in my opinion arise, and for the reasons already assigned, I think it is for the council to determine, acting of course fairly and honestly, the question of fact as to the amount of the salary and emoluments upon which thirty-seven sixtieths is to be calculated. I think, therefore, that the resolution of the 1st of August, 1901, was valid.

But next it is said that on the 20th of November, 1902, the council rescinded that resolution. The plaintiff argues that they had no power to do so. In my opinion the plaintiff is right. So soon as the resolution of August, 1901, was validly passed, there arose an obligation which, under section 120 (6) of the Act of 1888, was a specialty debt enforceable as if the council had entered into a bond to pay the £518 12s. 4d. I find no power in the council to go back and relieve themselves from an obligation thus rendered binding upon them. The defendants refer to section 57 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. That section is not empowering but restrictive. It provides only that a resolution shall not be revoked unless certain forms are observed and a particular majority obtained. It gives no power to revoke a resolution which has created rights as between the council and another person. Under these circumstances it is unnecessary to consider whether within section 9 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1856, the meeting of the 20th of November, 1902, was aptly summoned for the purpose.

In my judgment it is not for me to review the figure which the council on the 1st of August, 1901, adopted. I think that that resolution is valid, that it was not open to rescission, and is now effectual. It results that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the sums which he claims. The defendants must pay the costs of the action.

The defendant's counsel suggested that a decision such as I have arrived at would leave the members of the council exposed to a continuous surcharge similar to that made at the audit of 1902. This is not so. The result of this decision is that the surcharge was wrong.

Solicitors, Fowler & Co.; Allen & Son.

K. B. Div.
(Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) Feb. 7.

WARD v. HADDRILL. (a.)

County court—Costs—Money paid into court—Cross judgments in separate actions—Right of set-off—Solicitor's lien for costs—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict c. 43), ss. 113, 150.

Section 150 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides that "if there shall be cross judgments between the parties and execution has been taken by that party only who shall have obtained judgment for the larger sum, and for so much only as shall remain after deducting the smaller sum, and satisfaction for the remainder shall be entered, as well as satisfaction on the judgment for the smaller sum; and if both sums shall be equal, satisfaction shall be entered upon both judgments."

Held, that this section applied to judgments in separate actions as well as to judgments upon a claim and counterclaim in the same action, and that a defendant who had obtained judgment in an action was entitled to set off the amount of the taxed costs in that action against the amount for which judgment had been given against him in another action, and which amount he had paid into court, and that the plaintiff's solicitor had no lien for his costs on the amount paid into court as against this right of set-off.

Appeal from the judge of the Wandsworth County Court.

The facts of the case are as follows: The plaintiff brought two actions in the county court against the defendant. In the first action judgment was given for him for £21. In the second action judgment was given for the defendant with costs. Those costs amounted after taxation to £5. The defendant paid the amount of the judgment in the first action into court.

The defendant then applied for an order that the sum of £21 paid into court by the defendant in the first action be not paid out to the plaintiff or her solicitor unless or until the plaintiff had paid into court the above sum of £5, the costs in the second action; or, in the alternative, that out of the above sum of £21 there be paid to the defendant or his solicitor the sum of £5.

The county court judge ordered that the sum paid into court by the defendant under the judgment in the first action should be subject to a right of set-off in respect of the amount due under the judgment in the second action, that the balance only should be paid out to the plaintiff, and that £5 should be paid out of the £21 to the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Hogg, for the plaintiff.—The county court judge had no power to make the order. The amount paid into court was subject to the lien of the plaintiff's solicitor for costs. Section 150 does not apply to the case of a cross judgment action, but only where there are cross judgments on a claim and counterclaim in the same action.

Thorn Drury, for the respondent.—Section 150 of the County Courts Act, 1888, clearly applies here. The intention of the Act would be frustrated if the person had to wait for execution before getting the benefit of the smaller sum.

Hogg replied.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion this appeal should be dismissed. The point raised is a short one and has been well argued. What in effect the Legislature has done is to establish a different system from that which prevails in the High Court with regard to a solicitor's lien for costs.

Section 150 of the County Courts Act, 1888, establishes that where there are cross judgments in the county court if the person who has obtained judgment for the smaller sum chooses to wait for execution, thereby incurring, as he must incur, further costs, he can avail himself of the right of setting off the sum of which he has obtained judgment against the larger sum for which judgment has been obtained against him. If that right exists it is quite clear that the only sum for which execution can issue is the balance, because the section provides, not only that execution shall be for the balance, but that satisfaction shall be entered both for the balance and for the smaller sum, and if both sums are equal satisfaction shall be entered on both judgments. In view of these provisions how can it be said the solicitor's lien for costs is preserved. Then comes the question, are we to look at the substance of the enactment, which is that there shall be no enforceable judgment except for the balance against the person who has recovered the smaller sum, or are we to be limited to the very words which deal with execution, and to say that if the person who has obtained judgment for the smaller sum pays into court the larger sum for which judgment has been obtained against him, so that no execution is necessary, he loses his right of set-off. I cannot think that the Legislature meant that the person who has paid the larger sum into court must incur in respect of having execution issued against him considerably more costs than he has already incurred before he can get the benefit of the statute. If he cannot have an enforceable judgment for the sum he has himself recovered, I do not think it was meant that he should have an enforceable judgment against him for anything but the balance between that sum and the larger sum which he has paid into court. I think that the decision of the county court judge was right. Although section 150 does not in precise words cover this case, its meaning is that there shall be no process except for the balance between the larger and the smaller sum. It was suggested that the section must have been passed per incuriam. I doubt that, because the same enactment was contained in the Act of 1846 establishing county courts. I am not sure that the Legislature did not intend to prevent by this section the multiplication of actions.

It is clear to my mind that "cross judgments" must mean cross judgments in different actions, and not merely cross judgments where there is a claim and counterclaim in the same action.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. In my opinion section 150 would be rendered inoperative if we were to give effect to the arguments for the appellant.

Appeal dismissed; leave to appeal granted.

Solicitor for appellant, A. E. Cubison.

Solicitors for respondent, Corsellis, Mossop, & Berney.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) Dec. 9.

NOKES AND ANOTHER (Appellants) v. MAYOR, &c., OF ISLINGTON (Respondents). (a.)

Local government—Bye-law—Privy—Bye-law containing no provision as to notice to person complained against—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 37, 39.

A bye-law made by the London County Council under section 39 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and which provides that a person offending against it shall be liable to a penalty, is unreasonable and void if it does not contain a provision that notice shall be given to the person complained against before proceedings to recover the penalty are commenced against him.

This was a case stated by E. Tennyson D'Eyncourt, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate sitting at Clerkenwell police-court.

A complaint was preferred by one J. Jordan, a sanitary inspector, on behalf of the respondents, that the appellants, being the owners (as defined by the bye-laws of the London County Council made under section 39 (1) of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891) of a certain lodging-house (as defined by the said bye-laws), being 19, Corinth-road, within the Borough of Islington, did not provide and maintain, from the 3rd of March, 1903, to the 20th of April, 1903, in connection with the said house, water-closet, earth-closet, or privy accommodation of not less than one water-closet, earth-closet, or privy for every twelve persons, contrary to the provisions of the said bye-laws and of the said Act.

At the hearing it was proved that the appellants were agents for letting and collecting, and in fact collected the rent of the aforesaid house during the above-mentioned period, and during such period the house contained nine rooms and one closet only, and no earth-closet or privy.

In July, 1902, the house was let out in tenements to members of more than one family, and the appellants collected the rents of the several tenements from the tenants thereof. In September, 1902, the whole of the tenants of the house were ejected by the appellants. From September, 1902, to January, 1903, the house was unoccupied. In January, 1903, the whole of the house was let to one tenant, G. Gates, at the rent (which was a rack-rent) of £36 per annum, payable £3 a month in advance.

On the 5th of January, 1903, three rooms only in the house were occupied by six people. On the 3rd of March, 1903, the whole of the rooms in the house were occupied, and continued to be occupied till the 20th of April, 1903, by sixteen people, who constituted four separate families.

The rooms not required by G. Gates for his own occupation were let by him to lodgers, from whom he received rent on his own account.

On the 11th of March, 1903, an intimation under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, that a nuisance (insufficient water-closet accommodation) existed at 19, Corinth-road was left at that house and also at the appellants' office. The intimation was addressed to "the owner" of the premises, and was signed by J. Jordan, the sanitary inspector.

On the 25th of March, 1903, a letter from the medical officer of health for the borough was sent to the appellants calling their attention to the fact that they had not abated the nuisance intimated to them by the sanitary inspector, in reply to which the appellants, on the 26th of March, 1903, wrote informing the medical officer that they were not the "landlord" of the premises.

On the 26th of March, 1903, the appellants wrote to the tenant, G. Gates, informing him that the sanitary inspector stated that there were more than twelve people residing in the house, and telling him that it would be necessary for the tenant to reduce that number at once, otherwise he would be summoned at the police-court for not having sufficient water-closet accommodation.

It was objected on the part of the appellants (a) That the bye-law No. 26 of the London County Council, made under section 39 (1) of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, so far as the same required the landlord or owner of any lodging-house to provide and maintain in connection with such house water-closet accommodation in the proportion of one water-closet for every twelve persons was ultra vires and illegal, and that the magistrate had, therefore, no jurisdiction to deal with the complaint.

(b) That before any offence could be committed against the said bye-law, if valid, a notice from the sanitary authority was necessary.

(c) That the said bye-law, if valid, did not apply to the appellants, as they were not the owners of the premises within the meaning of the the said bye-law.

The learned magistrate overruled the objections and convicted the appellants.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the decision of the magistrate overruling the objections was right in point of law.

Woodfin (W. S. M. Knight with him), for the appellants.—This bye-law is unreasonable because it does not contain any provision that notice shall be given to the person against whom complaint is made before proceedings are taken against him. Sub-section 3 of section 37 clearly shows that in a case like this notice is necessary before a prosecution is instituted.

Courthope-Munroe, for the respondents.—This bye-law is not unreasonable. At the hearing of the summons it was objected that the bye-law does not apply to the appellants on the ground that they are not the owners of the premises within the meaning of the bye-law. That contention cannot be sustained. The appellants are clearly "owners" of the premises within the meaning of that bye-law.

He referred to Salt v. Scott Hall, 52 W. R. 95, [1903] 2 K. B. 245, and Pomeroy v. Malvern Urban Council, 19 Times L. R 597.

Woodfin replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C J.—I am clearly of opinion that the objection to this bye-law must be sustained. I have not the least doubt that the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 39, gives the London County Council power to make bye-laws as to water-closets, and I do not think that the contention that the bye-law we are dealing with relates to lodging-houses and not to water-closets is a sound argument. In my opinion the county council are quite competent, within the powers conferred upon them by section 39, to make laws for this purpose; but that does not decide the question before us arising upon the construction of section 37, sub-section 3, which enacts that if any house is not provided with sufficient water-closets the sanitary authority shall cause notice to be served upon the owner or occupier of the house requiring him forthwith to provide the same. The bye-law in question provides that a person offending against it shall be liable to a penalty. Now in this case the appellants collected the rent paid by the tenant Gates, and they may therefore be treated as standing in the place of the owner. Gates is the person who was responsible for allowing more than twelve persons to reside in the house, and therefore, in justice to the appellants, I think some notice should have been given to them before a prosecution was instituted against them. Now, this bye-law contains no provision that notice shall be given to a person before proceedings are taken against him, and I think that a bye-law that does not contain a provision that notice shall be given to a person before a penalty under the bye-law can be enforced against him is bad. I think this bye-law should contain a provision for some kind of notice as that contemplated in section 37, sub-section 3.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

For this reason I think the bye-law is not reasonable, and that this appeal should be allowed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

KENNEDY, J.—I concur.

Appeal allowed; conviction quashed.

Solicitor for appellants, A. D. Levi.

Solicitor for respondents, A. M. Bramall.

K. B. Div. (Phillimore, J.) Nov. 23; Dec. 8.

HAYCOCKS (LIMITED) v. MULHOLLAND. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Summons under ord. 14, r. 1—Reference to master—Costs of the action—Costs of the reference and award—Ord. 65, r. 12—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 116.

In an action brought to recover a balance of account on a tradesman's bill, the plaintiffs took out a summons under ord. 14, r. 1, for leave to sign final judgment. Upon the hearing of the summons no order was made, but the action was referred to a master for trial in accordance with rule 7 of the same order. After twenty-one days from the service of the writ the master, having tried the action, made an order giving the plaintiffs leave to sign judgment for £23 15s., "with £7 costs of the action, and also with costs of the reference to the master and his award, such costs to be taxed by the taxing-master on the High Court scale." From this order the defendants appealed to Phillimore, J., sitting at chambers.

Held, by that learned judge in court, that as regards the costs of the action, judgment not having been given within twenty-one days, and that period not having been extended by a judge under section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the plaintiffs were only entitled to costs on the county court scale, and the appeal should be allowed in that respect; but with regard to the costs of the reference to the master and his award, the order made was correct, as the master must be deemed an arbitrator, having the same discretion as to costs, including the power to certify for High Court costs, as an arbitrator has.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal to Phillimore, J., at chambers, from an order made by a master.

J. D. Crawford, for the plaintiffs.

H. Nield, for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

The facts of the case appear in the following written judgment which was delivered in court.

Dec. 8.—PHILLIMORE, J.—In this case the summons came before me in chambers, and was argued by counsel on the 23rd of November last. I took time to consider what my order should be, and, as the matter involves some questions of importance with regard to the procedure in small debt cases, I thought it as well to have information from the masters in the King's Bench Division, and to give my judgment in court.

The action is brought on a tradesman's bill for a small balance of account representing items of dispute between the tradesman and his employer in a bill of considerable amount. The summons, taken out under order 14, was heard before a master on the 29th of October last. No order was drawn up upon this summons, but the master's note upon it is as follows: "Adjourned for trial before master." Thereafter the case was tried before the same master; witnesses were examined, and the master finally decided in favour of the plaintiffs for £23 15s., which, if I recollect rightly, was either the whole or nearly the whole of the plaintiffs' claim. The master proceeded to embody his judgment in the following terms: "It is ordered that the plaintiffs be at liberty to sign judgment for £23 15s., with £7 costs of action, and also with costs of the reference to the master and his award, such costs to be taxed by the taxing-master on the High Court scale, with the certificate that the action was a fit action to be brought in the High Court."

This is the order under appeal, and the application to me is that I should vary it by directing that the plaintiff should sign judgment with costs on the county court scale. In the first place it is, I think, inconvenient that no order of reference was drawn up. The reference to the master can only be made by consent of the parties (ord. 14, r. 7). In the case before me there was some uncertainty as to whether such consent was given. I think that consent was expressed; but there ought to be no doubt in the matter. The master should explain to the parties that he can only make such order by consent, and this equally so whether it be for a town or country case. Moreover, the word "adjournment" is not correct. There should be an order drawn up, and it should recite that it was made by consent. In the second place, I do not think that the master has power to extend the twenty-one days allowed for obtaining judgment under order 14, with High Court costs. The statutory power under section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, is given only to a judge: see Cox v. Hill, 67 L. T. 26, 41 W. R. Dig. 173. I find the masters are entirely in accord as to this, and it is right to say that in this case the master has not purported to extend the time. This being so, and judgment not having been got within the twenty-one days, costs of the action, as distinct from the costs of the reference, must be on the county court scale. Here the master has given a lump sum for these costs, acting under ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 38, and the scale given under the practice rules for High Court costs under order 14, where the sum recovered is over £20 and under £50. I am far from saying that the master was wrong in giving a fixed sum. On the contrary, it seems to me the best thing to do, and it would be absurd to make out a hypothetical county court bill of costs. But, as the scale is to be county court, and not High Court scale, I think (as the master points out) special regard should be paid to ord. 65, r. 12, and it seems to me that the fixed sum should be less than the High Court fixed sum. I have no reason to suppose that the master was professing to arrive at probable county court costs; and though I was told that the difference would not be great, it was admitted that county court costs would be rather less. I propose in this case to save the expense of a further inquiry and reduce this £7 to £5 10s. The particular figure is not to be a precedent, and I should hope that the masters may arrive at some fixed sum for future occasions.

Then, as to the costs of the reference. Treating this, as I must, as a reference by consent, I think the case is governed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Street v. Street, 48 W. R. 450, [1900] 2 Q. B. 57. The master is to be deemed an arbitrator, and he has the same discretion as to costs, including the power to certify for High Court costs, as an arbitrator has. The judgment, therefore, in this respect must stand.

I have made a slight variation in favour of the appellant, and I think, as I have pointed out, that he may have been somewhat prejudiced by the informal mode in which the case was remitted to the master. In the main, however, the respondents hold what they have got. There should be no costs of the appeal.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, J. J. Edwards & Co.

Solicitors for defendant, J. Moverley Sharp.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Dec. 14.

KENT WATERWORKS, COMPANY OF PROPRIETORS OF v. LAMPLOUGH. (a.)

Water—Waterworks company—Dividend—Prescribed rate—Profits—Deficiencies in previous years—Incorporation of Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 75.

The appellant company was incorporated in 1809, and for some years paid dividends of less than 10 per cent. per annum, though there was no limit to the amount they might pay. In 1864 it obtained an Act of Parliament, which incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, by section 75 of which Act no larger dividend than 10 per cent. in any year was permissible "unless a larger dividend be at any time necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of the said yearly rate."

Held, that the company were not entitled to pay a larger dividend than 10 per cent. per annum in order to make up any deficiencies which fell short of that rate prior to the year 1864, when the Waterworks Clauses Act was first incorporated.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 535, [1903] 1 Ch. 575) affirmed.

Appeal from Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) (51 W. R. 535, [1903] 1 Ch. 675), affirming Joyce, J.

The facts are given at length in the court below; it will suffice here to state the following:

The appellant company was incorporated by an Act passed in 1809, which empowered it to raise capital in shares of £100 each, the holders of which were to be entitled to receive the profits that shall arise thereunder.

In 1864 an Act was obtained for the purpose of amalgamation with another company. This Act provided that from and after the passing of the Act the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, should apply to the whole of the undertaking and waterworks of the company. Before the passing of the Act of 1864 there was no limitation upon the rate of dividend which the company might pay, but after that date, by virtue of section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, no larger dividend upon the paid-up capital than 10 per cent. in any year was permissible "unless a larger dividend be at any time necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of" 10 per cent., and by section 76 of the same Act any excess of the amount limited was to be invested and form a reserve fund.

The company had for some years past been paying dividends in excess of 10 per cent. and had thereby made good all deficiencies or arrears which had arisen on the years from 1864 onwards. It was proposed to pay dividends in excess of 10 per cent. per annum in order to make up deficiences which had arisen prior to 1864. The present respondent applied for an injunction to restrain the company from so doing, and Joyce, J., considered such payment as outside the powers of the company and granted an injunction accordingly. The Court of Appeal affirmed this decision.

Cripps, K.C., and Haldane, K.C. (R. J. Parker with them), for the appellants.—By section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, there is no limit of time, and the words "any previous dividend" can only mean "any dividend previously declared by the company." The question is one of divisible profit, to be calculated on all the stock of the company; and the amount is not to exceed 10 per cent.

Moulton, K.C., Younger, K.C., and Ashworth James, for the respondent, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—This is a case that may be treated very shortly. It depends upon one section, and it exhibits the ingenuity of the learned counsel that a matter depending upon such a very small number of words could be protracted through three courts and argued with the ability and pertinacity with which this case has been argued. For my own part, it seems to me to be absolutely clear, without the faintest shadow of doubt.

The Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, which imposed for the first time a limit upon the amount of the dividend that might be distributed among the shareholders, contains also a provision that if that dividend which was to be limited for the future had not been arrived at, then in distributing the future profits of the company that which had fallen short of the prescribed amount, which for the first time was then imposed, might be made up if the company had made a profit sufficient to supply it. The whole language is very intelligible, and, upon the hypothesis that the true view of it is that at which both courts have already arrived, it is very simple.

If the gloss which has been put upon it by the learned counsel who argued the appeal were true, I think that it would be extremely difficult to reconcile the language with any intelligible meaning, because what is to be made up under section 75 is a "deficiency." A deficiency of what? There is no deficiency at all in any of the years previous to 1864; you can only get a deficiency by bringing in that limit which was for the first time prescribed in 1864. It is an impossible hypothesis: you cannot get a deficiency—there is nothing from which it is a deficiency—unless you import that limitation, a dividend which comes to 10 per cent. Then, if that is the only thing that is to be made up, that deficiency can only arise after 1864; and, according to the plainest rules of construction, you cannot get behind that which for the first time imposed the limit to which the deficiency is to be made up.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Under these circumstances, it appears to me abundantly plain and I move that this appeal be dismissed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case perfectly clear. I am of opinion that, for the purpose of adjusting any dividend and availing itself of the statutory provisions for compensation, the company cannot go further back than the time when the Act of 1864 came into operation. The Kent Waterworks Co. made a fresh start then, with fresh limitations and under new conditions. Before that time there was no prescribed rate of dividend, nor could there be any deficiency of dividend within the meaning of that word in the Waterworks Clauses Act.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. I have only to add that I am not surprised that Joyce, J., when he called for no argument from counsel for the respondents, stated that he did not feel any doubt about it. I agree in his judgment, in the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal, and in that which your lordships have delivered.

Lord DAVEY.—I think that there can be no doubt about this case. I am quite satisfied with the reasons which have been given by Joyce, J., and the learned judges in the Court of Appeal.

Lords ROBERTSON and LINDLEY concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley; Waltons, Bubb, Johnson, & Whatton.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) April 12.

NORMAN & BURT v. WALDER. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Reviewing award—Earnings—Business set up since accident—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule I., cl. 2, 12.

Upon an application by employers under clause 12 of Schedule I. to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, to review a weekly payment awarded to the injured workman under the Act, the arbitrator must take into consideration the fact that the workman is earning profits from a business which he set up after the accident, and which he carries on for himself.

Appeal from the decision of the late Judge Martineau, sitting at the Hayward's Heath County Court, under the Workman's Compensation Act, 1897.

The respondent, Charles Walder, was a machinist in the employment of the appellants, Messrs. Norman & Burt, who were builders and contractors. He was at the time of the accident receiving wages of 37s. a week, out of which he kept himself, his wife, his son, and his daughter. On the 22nd of May, 1901, he met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, whereby he lost the top joint of a finger of his left hand and injured another finger. On the 22nd of August, 1901, an award was made under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, for a weekly payment to him of 18s. 6d. In May, 1903, the employers applied to the county court judge, under clause 12 of Schedule I. to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, to terminate or diminish the weekly payments, upon the ground that since the date of the accident the respondent had set up in business for himself as a baker and confectioner, at which it was alleged that he was now earning money. Evidence having been given as to the business carried on by the respondent and as to the amount of the profits made by him in the business (the result of which is stated in the judgment of the county court judge given hereunder), the county court judge reserved his judgment, which he delivered as follows: "This is an application by an insurance office asking me as arbitrator to suspend or reduce the compensation awarded to the respondent by the award. The ground of the application is that since the award was made the respondent's earnings have increased to such an extent that he is no longer entitled to any compensation. The earnings are not wage earnings nor anything in the nature of wage earnings, but the profits of a trade business carried on by the respondent at Dane-hill. I reserved judgment to consider whether the earnings of a trade business can be treated as 'earnings' within the meaning of Schedule I., clause 2, of the Act. The word in the Act no doubt is 'earnings,' but I am clear that, according to the true construction of the schedule, wage-earning capacity alone is to be taken into account. I may mention here that the earnings of the business carried on by the respondent are obtained in a peculiar manner. The respondent carries on the business in question with the labour and assistance of his wife, who has the principal share in the work, his daughter, who serves in the shop, and his son, who goes out with the horse and cart. He himself goes out with the horse and cart and has a general control of the business. As head of the family he appropriates the labour and assistance of his wife, son, and daughter, and takes the whole of the profits and maintains them. He does not receive any wages, nor is he in the service of any employer. It would be difficult to say what proportion of the total earnings in the business ought to be attributed to the respondent's own labour. I have had some difficulty in arriving at the total earnings in the business, but I estimate them at £2 a week. In the view I take of the case it is immaterial. It is to be observed that the compensation to the workman for personal injury is, in my opinion, clearly assessable with reference to weekly wages or earnings earned before the injury and weekly earnings or wages earned after the injury, and, in my opinion, trade profits in a business are no more to be taken into account than income of real estate. It may well be that the work in respect of which wages were earned after the accident need not be ejusdem generis with the work in respect of which wages were earned before the accident, and there is authority in the Court of Appeal for that view, but, in my opinion, earnings in trade are not earnings within the meaning of Schedule I., clause 2, of the Act. The application fails and must be refused with costs."

The employers appealed.

Arthur Powell, K.C. (W. Addington Willis with him), for the employers.—The question turns upon the meaning of the words in clause 2 of Schedule I.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident." The average weekly earnings before the accident mean wages earned by the workman in his employment. But "the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident" is not limited to wages received from an employer. Those words include all earnings of any kind, whether in a business carried on by the workman or otherwise. The county court judge was wrong in ignoring the fact that the respondent was now earning money in his own business. He should have ascertained how much the respondent was earning for himself in his business, and taken that fact into consideration in determining whether the weekly payment ought or ought not to be ended or diminished. The case ought, therefore, to go back to the county court.

He referred to Irons v. Davis & Timmins (Limited), 47 W. R. 616, [1899] 2 Q. B. 330; Chandler v. Smith, 47 W. R. 677, [1899] 2 Q. B. 506; and Pomphrey v. Southwark Press, [1901] 1 K. B. 86, 49 W. R. Dig. 114.

Stuart Bevan, for the respondent.—Clauses 1 (b) and 2 of Schedule I. refer solely to wages earned by service with an employer. There must be an employer. The sole test to apply is the wage-earning capacity of the workman. If the earnings of a workman in his own business can be considered a wide field of inquiry will be opened up. For instance, the medical examination under clause 2 of Schedule I. must go beyond the injured workman's wage-earning capacity.

He referred to Crossfield & Sons v. Tanian, 48 W. R. 609, [1900] 2 Q. B. 629.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by the employers from the decision of the late Judge Martineau, and the question is whether, upon an application under clause 12 of Schedule I. to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, to review a weekly payment for the purpose of ending or diminishing it, the fact that the workman is making money by means of a business carried on by him ought or ought not to be taken into consideration. The learned county court judge held that it was not an element to be taken into consideration, and that, however prosperous the workman had become as a tradesman, it was no ground for reducing the amount of the weekly payment awarded in the first instance as compensation. The county court judge arrived at the conclusion by reason of the construction which he placed upon the Act. The question really turns upon the meaning of one clause in Schedule I. to the Act, though it is necessary to refer to another clause as well. Clause 1 (b) provides that the amount of compensation shall be, "where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, a weekly payment during the incapacity after the second week not exceeding 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed, but if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, such weekly payment not to exceed one pound." As I pointed out during the argument, that clause assumes that, in dealing with that stage of the proceedings, the workman has been earning wages from an employer. Then comes paragraph 2 of the schedule, which raises the present question: "In fixing the amount of the weekly payment, regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident, and to any payment not being wages which he may receive from the employer in respect of his injury during the period of his incapacity." In the present case the respondent was at the time of the accident earning wages of 37*s.* a week. The award was for a weekly payment of 18*s.* 6*d.* It now appears that the respondent since the accident started a small business as a baker, out of which apparently a return comes to him of £2 a week. He is assisted in that business by his wife, his son, and his daughter. The county court judge does not purport to tell us with any exactness the portion of the profits attributable to the respondent as the earnings arising from his exertions, as he held that, whether it was great or small, it had nothing to do with the discussion of the matter before him, and that, unless the employers could show that that which the workman received after the accident was "wages" paid by an employer, the amount of any such earnings had no relevancy to the discussion. In my opinion that is much too narrow a view of the Act to take. Clause 2 does not in terms exclude earnings other than those earned from an employer. The average weekly earnings before the accident specified in the first part of clause 2 clearly mean wages earned from an employer. When one considers the object which the Legislature had in view, it is obvious that the later words ought not to be limited to that which the workman earns in the employment of an employer after the accident. It must be kept in mind that the Act is seeking to adjust compensation for loss of the workman's earning power. The most that the Act allows as compensation is one-half of the workman's average weekly earnings, showing that the compensation is not intended to be complete compensation. An application may subsequently be made to review the weekly payment under clause 12, and then the whole situation must be looked at, and the arbitrator has then to say how far the money-earning capacity of the workman has been altered, and if it is as good as it was before the accident, that is a fact which is not to be ignored, though the source of income may not be wages earned from an employer. The county court judge ought not to have excluded it from his consideration. The appeal must therefore be allowed, and the case must go back to the county court to be considered upon all its merits.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears upon the evidence here that the respondent is earning something by carrying on the business. How much is to be attributable to him as his earnings in that business should be inquired into, and the matter must be referred back to the county court for the judge to consider the whole position of affairs. Where clause 2 of the schedule to the Act speaks of "the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident," it does not limit the earnings to wages earned from an employer. The man may be his own master.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Here the respondent employed himself as a workman in his own business, and his earnings therefrom must be taken into consideration by the county court judge.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Treadwell & Aylwin.

Solicitors for the respondent, J. K. Nye & Treacher, Brighton.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.) March 14.

SOCIÉTÉ GÉNÉRALE, &c., DU COMMERCE ET DE L'INDUSTRIE EN FRANCE v. JOHANN MARIA FARINA & CO. (a.)

Practice—Execution—Judgment against corporation—Examination of officer—Past officer—Ord. 42, r. 32.

An order may be made, under ord. 42, r. 32, where judgment has been recovered against a corporation, for the examination of a past as well as of a present officer of the corporation.

Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., at chambers.

On the 9th of October, 1902, the plaintiffs, who were a French société anonyme, brought an action against the defendants as acceptors of a bill of exchange for 5,000 francs. On the 18th of October, 1902, an appearance was entered by the defendants as follows: "Enter an appearance for Compagnie d'Installation pour l'eclairage et le chauffage par le gaz à Bale, a société anonyme trading as Johann Maria Farina et Cie., Gegenhuber dem Josephsplatz, and sued as Johann Maria Farina & Co. in this action."

Upon an application by the plaintiffs for judgment under order 14 an affidavit was made by one Staenglen on behalf of the defendants wherein he described himself as a director of the above-named Compagnie d'Installation pour d'eclairage, &c., and as being authorized by the company to make an affidavit on their behalf. Unconditional leave to defend was given, but on the 24th of April, 1903, the defendants withdrew their defence, and judgment was signed by the plaintiffs for the amount claimed and costs. The judgment remaining unsatisfied, the plaintiffs on the 5th of November, 1903, obtained an order, under ord. 42, r. 32, for the examination of Staenglen as a director of the defendant company as to what debts were owing to the company, and whether they had any and what property or means of satisfying the judgment. This order was served on Staenglen who did not appeal from it. On the 5th of February, 1904, Staenglen attended before the master, who was appointed examiner, when he admitted that he was a director of the Compagnie d'Installation at the time when judgment was signed, but he said that on the 30th of June, 1903, he ceased to be a director of the company, and upon the advice of his solicitor he refused to answer any further questions or to give any information as to the debts due to or property of the company on the ground that he had ceased to be a director of the company. The master ruled that Staenglen was bound to answer the questions, and upon his still refusing to do so he adjourned the examination to enable an application to be made to the judge. The plaintiffs thereupon applied to Phillimore, J., at chambers, for an order of commitment against Staenglen for contempt of court. Phillimore, J., ordered Staenglen to attend at his own expense before the master to be examined.

Staenglen appealed.

By order 42, rule 32, "when a judgment or order is for the recovery of money, the party entitled to enforce it may apply to the court or a judge for an order that the debtor liable under such judgment or order, or in the case of a corporation that any officer thereof, be orally examined as to whether any and what debts are owing to the debtor, and whether the debtor has any and what other property or means of satisfying the judgment or order, before a judge or an officer of the court as the court or judge shall appoint; and the court or judge may make an order for the attendance and the examination of such debtor, or of any other person, and for the production of any books or documents."

C. F. Hohler, for the appellant.—Ord. 42, r. 32, gives no power to examine a past officer of the company. It has been held that the words at the end of the rule, "any other person," mean in the case of a corporation an officer of the corporation: Irwell v. Eden, 35 W. R. 511, 18 Q. B. D. 588. When the rule speaks of "any officer thereof," it means an existing officer. Otherwise an order might be made for the examination of an officer of a corporation who had ceased to be an officer many years before. When the Legislature intended to include persons other than present officers of the corporation they expressly said so: see section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862. There was, therefore, no jurisdiction to make the order.

He also referred to Republic of Costa Rica v. Strousberg, 29 W. R. 179, 16 Ch. D. 8; and Hood-Barrs v. Heriot, 45 W. R. 1, [1896] 2 Q. B. 338.

F. M. Abrahams, for the plaintiffs.—"Any officer thereof" includes past as well as present officers of a corporation. A past officer may have assets or books of the corporation in his possession, and the rule will be rendered almost useless if a director, hearing that an application for his examination is going to be made, can resign his directorship and thus escape examination. The order for examination is discretionary, and the court will only make the order in a proper case. Secondly, it does not appear whether the appellant has taken all necessary steps to complete his resignation as a director.

Hohler replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from an order made by Phillimore, J., at chambers, who directed the appellant to attend before the master for examination at his own expense. The action was brought against a company, and an appearance was entered by the Compagnie d'Installation, a société anonyme, trading as Johann Maria Farina et Cie, and sued as Johann Maria Farina & Co. That appearance had the effect of substituting the Compagnie d'Installation for Johann Maria Farina & Co., which was merely a name under which they traded, as defendants in the action. On the 24th of April, 1903, judgment was recovered against the defendant company, and on the 5th of November, 1903, the plaintiffs obtained an order for the examination of the appellant as a director of the defendant company under ord. 42, r. 32. The appellant had in an affidavit which he made upon an application for judgment under order 14, stated that he was a director of the Compagnie d'Installation and that he was authorized by the company to make the affidavit on their behalf. The appellant attended before the master, who was appointed examiner, but when the examination came to the critical point he refused to answer any questions or to give any information as to what debts were owing to the company or whether it had any and what other property or means of satisfying the judgment, upon the ground that he had ceased to be a director on the 30th of June, 1903, since the date of the judgment. An application was thereupon made to Phillimore, J., who made the order now under appeal.

It is said that there is no power under ord. 42, r. 32, to order the examination of a person who at the time is not an officer of the defendant company. In my opinion that is too narrow a view of the rule. There is nothing in the rule which says that the officer must be a present officer of the company. The examination is for the purpose of finding out whether any and what debts are owing to the company, and whether the company has any and what other property or means of satisfying the judgment, and for that purpose the court may make an order for the examination of "any officer" of the company. There is nothing in that rule to limit the examination to an existing officer of the company. If it were so limited, an officer might conceivably, hearing that an application was about to be made for his examination, resign his position as officer and then claim to be free from examination. Further, in the present case we do not know whether there has been a complete resignation of the appellant's position as director. However that may be, it is too narrow a construction of the rule to limit it to persons who at the time of the order are officers of the company. The somewhat analogous section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, is not so limited. An officer of a company, who has ceased to be an officer because the company is being wound up, can be examined under that section. Rule 32 when speaking of "any officer thereof" is not referring to a period of time but to the character of the person to be examined. Upon the fair construction of that rule there is, in my opinion, power to order the examination of a person who has ceased to be an officer of the company, and such examination may be useful to see if he has in his power and control any property or assets belonging to the company.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. At the time of the judgment the appellant was a director of the defendant company, but he alleges that he ceased to be a director at the time when the order for examination was made. Without taking any steps to set aside the order for examination be attended before the master, when he refused to answer certain questions which were put to him. I prefer not to take a technical view of the matter, but to look at the question on its merits, and I therefore ask myself whether the appellant could have succeeded in setting aside the order for examination. The object of ord. 42, r. 32, is to enable persons connected with the company to be examined as to its property and assets. I can see no reason why the company should escape this investigation by means of the resignation of a director. I should be sorry to place such a construction on the rule. The order for examination was, in my opinion, rightly made.

Appeal dismissed

Solicitor for the appellant, J. Carnegie.

Solicitor for the respondents, Michael Abrahams, Sons, & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) March 9.

WARR & CO. (LIMITED) v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Compensation—Interest in land—Right to sell refreshments at theatre—Use of premises—Right to affix advertisements—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.

The lessees of a theatre, by an agreement in writing, granted to the plaintiffs for the term of their lease the free and exclusive right to sell refreshments at the theatre, with the necessary use of the refreshment-rooms and bars and cloak-rooms and wine cellars, together with the free right of access to all parts of the house as might be necessary, and also the free and exclusive right during the term of supplying to the visitors and other people attending the theatre wines, spirits, cigars, and refreshments of all kinds, programmes and all other articles, and of providing cloak-rooms and other accommodation, and also the sole and exclusive privilege of advertising and letting spaces for advertisements in the refreshment and cloak-rooms and on programmes. The defendant county council having taken the theatre under their statutory powers,

Held, that the plaintiffs had not acquired an interest in land within the meaning of section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and were therefore not entitled to compensation under that section.

Appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was to recover the sum of £2,568 9s. payable under an award and interest thereon.

In May, 1900, the Countess of Kilmorey let the Globe Theatre, Strand, to William Greet and E. C. Engelbach for twenty-one years.

By an agreement in writing dated the 16th of June, 1900, and made between Greet and Englebach, therein described as the landlords, and Frank Warr & Co. (Limited), the plaintiffs, therein described as the tenants, it was provided as follows: "The landlords hereby grant and let, and the tenants hereby take for the term of the landlords' lease commencing the 1st day of September, 1900, the free and exclusive right to sell refreshments at the Globe Theatre . . . with the necessary use of the refreshment-rooms and bars and cloak-rooms and wine cellars of the said theatre, together with the free right during the usual hours of the tenants, their servants and agents, of free access to and from all parts of the house, including the front of the theatre and premises, as may be necessary and is usual and proper according to the custom of the theatres, for the purpose of exercising the rights granted by this agreement, and also the free and exclusive right during the aforesaid term of supplying to the visitors and other people attending the theatre wines, spirits, liqueurs, cigars, cigarettes, flowers, scent, and refreshments of all kinds, programmes, books of words, books of music, opera glasses, and all other articles, and of providing cloak-rooms and other accommodation, and also the sole and exclusive privilege during the aforesaid term of advertising and letting spaces for advertisements, which shall be confined to the refreshment and cloak-rooms and on all programmes used and offered for sale at the said theatre." The rent was to be £35 per week and £2 for each matinée, subject to deductions in cases when there was no performance. The tenants were to supply at their own expense suitable programmes to be approved by the landlords, and the advertisements were to be confined to the refreshment bars and rooms and cloak-rooms, and were to be of such a nature as would not injure the character of the theatre and as were usually found in first-class theatres. The tenants were to provide and maintain a proper and sufficient staff of attendants for the service of the refreshment bars and rooms and cloak-rooms and for the sale of programmes, &c. If from any cause whatever no performance should be given in the theatre on any day or days other than a Sunday in any week, the tenants were to be entitled in respect of each such day or days on which no performance should be given to a remittance of one-sixth part of the week's rent, such remittance to be deducted and allowed from the next payment of rent.

The plaintiffs acted on this agreement from the 1st of September, 1900.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a notice dated the 17th of February, 1902, the defendants gave notice to the plaintiffs that, under powers conferred upon them by the London County Council (Improvements) Act, 1899, they required to take the premises for the purposes of works authorized by that Act, and required particulars of the plaintiffs' estate and interest in the premises. On the 4th of March, 1902, the plaintiffs served notice claiming compensation in respect of their exclusive right to sell refreshments, with the necessary use of the refreshment-rooms, &c., and they also claimed compensation on account of the fittings, &c.

On the 1st of April, 1902, the defendants took possession of the premises. On the 16th of April an arbitrator was appointed to determine the amount of purchase-money and compensation to be paid to the plaintiffs for the interest (if any) of the plaintiffs in the lands and hereditaments or the interest (if any) therein which the plaintiffs were enabled to sell under the London County Council (Improvements) Act, 1899, and the Acts incorporated therewith, and also the amount of damage (if any) for disturbance or loss of value in furniture and fixtures or expenses of removal or other loss incidental to the taking of the land.

The defendants did not admit that the plaintiffs had any interest in the lands and hereditaments, but concurred in the appointment of the arbitrator without prejudice to their right to dispute their liability to pay any compensation awarded.

The arbitrator awarded the sum of £2,568 9*s.* as purchase-money and compensation for the plaintiffs' interest (if any) in the lands and hereditaments.

The plaintiffs having brought this action on the award, the defendants pleaded that no purchase-money or compensation was payable, on the ground that the plaintiffs had no interest in the lands and hereditaments within the meaning of section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.

Wright, J., held that the agreement created merely a licence and not an interest in land within section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, and that the action therefore failed. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Witt, K.C., and J. D. Crawford, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs acquired an interest in land by this agreement. They had the actual user of the premises themselves. The agreement gave them "the necessary use of the refreshment-rooms and bars and cloak-rooms and wine cellars of the said theatre." That is a user of land and amounts to an interest in land: Temple Pier Co. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 12 L. T. 369, and Bird v. Great Eastern Railway Co, 19 C. B. N. S. 268. The sole right to affix advertisements to the walls was an interest in land. The right to carry on trade on the premises and make a profit therefrom was an interest in land. In Webber v. Lee, 30 W. R. 866, 9 Q. B. D. 315, it was held that the right to shoot over land and take away the game killed was an interest in land and a profit à prendre. The case of Edwardes v. Barrington, 85 L. T. 650, is distinguishable from this case. The agreement there was similar to the present agreement, but the question was whether the lessee of the theatre had, by granting that agreement, committed a breach of a covenant not to assign or demise without consent. The decision was that there had been no breach of that covenant because the lessee had not parted with the possession.

Dickens, K.C., E. Morten, and H. M. Sturges, for the defendants, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action on an award which has been made in favour of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to compensation, under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, in respect of lands, or an interest therein, which had been taken for, or injuriously affected by, the execution of certain works by the London County Council. The question is whether, having regard to an agreement whereby the plaintiffs acquired the right to supply refreshments at the Globe Theatre, the result of that agreement was to confer on them an interest in land or not. It was argued on the part of the plaintiffs that they took more than a mere licence by the agreement, that they took an interest in land within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Act. But there is a decision of the House of Lords in the case of Edwardes v. Barrington, 50 W. R. 358, 85 L T. 650, which the learned judge at the trial thought bound him to give judgment against the plaintiffs. I see no escape from this conclusion. The decision in that case was on a similar agreement, and is, in my opinion, conclusive of this case. The point to be determined there was whether there had been a breach of a covenant not to assign or demise without consent, but the only question was whether the refreshment contractor, who was described in the agreement as the tenant, took an interest in land. The only substantial difference between the agreement in that case and the agreement in this case is that this is more artificially drawn than the other and shows more clearly an absence of any intention to grant a demise. The House of Lords came to the conclusion that in that case no interest in land had been transferred to the so-called tenant. Taking the whole of this agreement together, I am of opinion that it shows an intention to confer a licence only, and not an interest in land; and I think this case is concluded by the authority of the House of Lords decision. I desire to point out the distinction between a profit à prendre and an ordinary licence such as we are dealing with in this case. It was contended that a right to trade on land and make a profit amounted to a profit à prendre. I do not think that is so. A profit à prendre means a right to take something out of the land itself.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Hannay & Reynolds.

Solicitor for the defendants, W. A. Blaxland.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 10.

BELL (SURVEYOR OF TAXES) v. NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Business of bank—Purchase by another bank—Succeeding to business—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D, cases 1 and 2, r. 4.

The National Provincial Bank of England, whose head office was in London, acquired by purchase the premises and business of the County of Stafford Bank, which was carried on at Wolverhampton. After the purchase the business of the Stafford Bank was carried on as usual, but for the benefit and at the expense of the purchasing bank until a certain date, when the premises were opened as the Wolverhampton branch of the purchasing bank, who had never previously carried on any business at

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wolverhampton. The manager and the staff of the Stafford bank were taken over by the purchasing bank, but none of the books of the Stafford bank were taken over except that the ledgers were continued in use until the end of the current year. All new cheque-books and new pass-books were issued in the name of the purchasing bank. From the date of the purchase the profits, if any, of the Wolverhampton branch of the purchasing bank were merged in and formed part of the general profits of the bank, without any distinction as to source or origin of profit, and there were no means of ascertaining whether there were any profits or the proportion of increase or decrease in the profits, if any, of the bank which had arisen from the business purchased. Assessments to income tax were made on the purchasing bank's returns for the three years following the date of the purchase, based on the average of the profits of the whole business for the three preceding years respectively, and an additional assessment was made upon them, based upon the assumed profits of the Stafford bank during those three years, under section 100, Schedule D, cases 1 and 2, r. 4, of the Income Tax Act, 1842.

Held, that the purchasing bank had succeeded to the business of the Stafford bank, and that the additional assessment was rightly made.

Judgment of Ridley, J. ([1903] 2 K. B. 249, 51 W. R. Dig. 67), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Ridley, J., on a case stated by the Commissioners of Income Tax (reported in 1903, 2 K. B. 249).

At a meeting of the commissioners for the general purposes of the Income Tax Acts and for executing the Acts relating to the Inhabited House Duties for the City of London, the National Provincial Bank of England (Limited) appealed against an assessment of £4 818 beyond their assessment on their own return of £228,493 for the year ended the 5th of April, 1900, against an assessment of £3,218 beyond their assessment on their own return of £299,768 for the year ended the 5th of April, 1901, and against an assessment of £1,634 beyond their assessment on their own return of £300,253 for the year ended the 5th of April, 1902, under Schedule D to the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, in the following circumstances:

The National Provincial Bank of England (Limited), which was established in the year 1833, and is now registered under the Companies Acts with a nominal authorized capital of £15,900,000, on which £3,000,000 has been paid, has since its foundation transacted and transacts banking business at the head office in Bishopsgate-street, in the City of London, and at a large number of branch establishments in London and various parts of England and Wales, such branch establishments now numbering 199. The County of Stafford Bank (Limited) was established in the year 1836 under the name of the Bilston District Banking Co., with a deed of settlement. In 1873 the company was registered under the Companies Act, 1862, as a company with unlimited liability, and the name of the company was changed to that of the County of Stafford Bank. In 1882 the company was incorporated as a company with limited liability under the name of the County of Stafford Bank (Limited), the registered capital being £800,000, divided into 20,000 shares of £40 each. The head office and banking house of the company was at Wolverhampton, and under the regulations registered as the articles of association the business of the company was to be carried on there and at such other places as the board might from time to time appoint. The company was also empowered to establish such branch banks, agencies, and local boards in the United Kingdom as the directors thought proper. As a matter of fact, however, the business was only carried on at Wolverhampton, and the powers conferred on the company under these regulations of establishing other business branch banks, agencies, and local boards were not exercised.

By agreements made respectively in February, 1899, and March, 1899, the whole of the business of the County of Stafford Bank (Limited), which had carried on business for some sixty-two years previously on the same premises and without any branches, its business premises, furniture, and fixtures, and such of its assets and liabilities as were and are provided by the agreements and shown in the balance-sheet annexed to the latter of the said agreements, was and were, as from the close of business on the 31st of December, 1898, purchased by the National Provincial Bank of England for the sum of £225,000 under and upon the terms of the agreements.

By clause 9 of the agreement of February, 1899, the directors and the general manager of the County of Stafford Bank, on behalf of themselves and also on behalf of the bank, and of any liquidator who might be thereafter appointed, covenanted with the National Provincial Bank that if the said business of the County of Stafford Bank should be sold and transferred to the purchasing bank in pursuance of the aforesaid or any other agreement, they would not at any time or times thereafter hinder or interrupt the person or persons who on the part of the purchasing bank should conduct the said banking business at Wolverhampton in the management and carrying on of the same, and would not at any time or times before the 1st of January, 1910, directly or indirectly, either by themselves or himself, or with any other person or persons, without the permission of the purchasing bank, carry on or be engaged in carrying on the business of a banker in Wolverhampton or within seven miles thereof, nor become a director or directors of any joint stock bank carrying on business at Wolverhampton or within seven miles thereof, but would use their best endeavours to secure the business of the County of Stafford Bank to the purchasing bank, and to promote the interests of the banking business carried on by them. The business of the County of Stafford Bank was carried on as usual, but for the benefit and at the expense of the National Provincial Bank, until the close of the business at 4 p.m. on the 5th of March, 1899, when the premises were closed. On the following morning—viz., the 6th of March—the same premises were opened as their Wolverhampton branch by the National Provincial Bank, who had never previously had any branch or carried on any business at Wolverhampton. The manager and the whole of the former staff were taken over by, and have, subject to necessary and ordinary changes, since continued to remain there in the employ of the National Provincial Bank of England (Limited). Business has since been carried on by that bank at the same premises; none of the books of the County of Stafford Bank (Limited) were taken over or continued in use by the National Provincial Bank, except that the ledgers, being found to be in the same form as those used by the bank, were continued in use by them to the end of the current year. In such of the pass-books as were continued in use a notice was inserted by means of a rubber stamp to the effect that as from the 1st of January, 1899, the account was with the National Provincial Bank of England (Limited), but all new cheque-books and pass-books were issued in the name of the National Provincial Bank of England (Limited). From the 31st of December, 1898, the profits, if any, earned at and by the National Provincial Bank's Wolverhampton branch merged in and formed part of the general profits of National Provincial Bank of England (Limited) without any distinction as to source or origin of profit, and there are no means for ascertaining whether there were any profits or the proportion of increase or decrease, if any, in the profits of the bank which has arisen from the business, &c., so purchased as aforesaid. The ultimate profits divisible among the shareholders of the National Provincial Bank of England (Limited) are the result of the trading of the company as a whole, including the head office and all the branches, irrespective of the profit and loss arising from he business done at the head office or any particular branch. At and from the head office of the bank the general affairs of the company are transacted, and the working of the branches is regulated and supervised by the board of directors and general manager through various departments. All profits are received and dealt with by the head office. There are many classes of expenditure which are not and cannot be definitely allocated in any way, such as general management and departmental and establishment expenses which cannot be definitely attributed to any particular branch.

The general assessments of the National Provincial Bank for the years ended the 5th of April, 1901, and the 5th of April, 1902, include some portion of the profits made by the Wolverhampton branch of the bank, if any were made—viz., the assessment for the year ended the 5th of April, 1901, the profits on average for the preceding year 1899, and the assessment for the year ended the 5th of April, 1902, the profits on average for the preceding years 1899 and 1900; but as the accounts were merged in the general accounts of the bank it is impossible to differentiate between the profits made by the Wolverhampton branch of the bank and the general profits of such bank from the time the County of Stafford Bank was taken over. There are no means or accounts which would enable the bank to make a return under the Income Tax Acts of the profits of the said Wolverhampton branch (if any), or apply for the benefit of section 133 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, in respect of such profits if less than the estimate.

Profits were made by the County of Stafford Bank (Limited) from the business at Wolverhampton for each of the three years ended the 31st of December, 1896, 1897, and 1898 respectively, when the accounts were made up as follows: 1896, £4,801; 1897, £4,750; 1898, £4,904; and the present assessments of £4,818, £3,218, and £1,634 respectively for the years ended the 5th of April, 1900, the 5th of April, 1901, and the 5th of April, 1902, appealed against, are assumed profits made by the National Provincial Bank, based on an estimate for the first year on the average of the profits of the County of Stafford Bank of the three preceding years—viz., 1896, 1897, and 1898—after the usual allowances for dividends, rents, &c., on which income tax had been paid by way of deduction, based for the second of the said years on one-third of the profits of the years 1897 and 1898, and based for the third of the said years on one-third of the profits of the year 1898. An assessment was made on the County of Stafford Bank (Limited) for the year ended the 5th of April, 1899, based on the average profits of the three preceding years ended the 31st of December, 1897, and the duty was paid by the said company. There was no assessment for any one of the years ended the 5th of April, 1900, the 5th of April, 1901, or the 5th of April, 1902, on the County of Stafford Bank (Limited). Assessments on their own returns had also been made for the year ended the 5th of of April, 1900, the 5th of April, 1901, the 5th of April, 1902, respectively, on the National Provincial Bank at its head office in London, on amounts based on the average of the profits of its whole business for the three years ended respectively on the 31st of December, 1898, on the 31st of December, 1899, and on the 31st of December, 1900, as shown by the published accounts and balance-sheets for each period of three years respectively, and the duty on such assessments was duly paid by the bank.

The National Provincial Bank of England (Limited) duly appealed against such assessments to the Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London. On the hearing of such appeals the surveyor of taxes contended that the National Provincial Bank were liable to the additional assessments in order to cover such estimated profits, and further contended that there was a succession on the part of the bank to the business of the County of Stafford Bank (Limited) according to the terms of the fourth rule of the first and second cases, Schedule D, of section 100 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and that consequently the bank should be assessed to include the estimated profits of the business purchased from the County of Stafford Bank (Limited), estimated upon the average of the profits of the said periods of three years respectively of the said County of Stafford Bank (Limited). The National Provincial Bank contended that the profits, if any, of the business carried on at Wolverhampton during the period covered by such additional assessments could not be made or included in the basis of any assessment against the bank for that period, which was by the Act limited to the years 1896, 1897, and 1898, during none of which did the National Provincial Bank carry on any business at Wolverhampton; that such profits, if any, were merged in the general profits of the bank and were liable to be extinguished or diminished by reason of losses elsewhere or general expenses; and in any event would, in due course, form part of the basis of assessment. Further, that if the additional assessment was to be allowed the bank would be doubly assessed on such portion of their profits, if any, as arose from the business purchased from the County of Stafford Bank. Further, in reply to the contention of the surveyor, they contended that the acquirement by purchase of the business of the County of Stafford Bank was not a succession or such a succession as was contemplated by the Income Tax Acts.

The commissioners were of opinion that there was no succession within the meaning of the said fourth rule, also that the said business when purchased was not sufficiently, generally or separately, identified after merger in the National Provincial Bank's business to render the profits, if any, properly subject to separate assessment, and that the bank were or would be charged with a fair proportion of the profits and were not liable to be additionally assessed over and above the ordinary assessments on the profits of the National Provincial Bank, and they discharged the assessments accordingly.

Ridley, J., affirmed the decision of the commissioners.

The surveyor of taxes appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the Crown.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Sir John Paget, K.C., for the National Provincial Bank.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Ridley, J., upon a question under the Income Tax Acts, and the facts are shortly these: In 1899 the National Provincial Bank of England acquired by purchase the business of the County of Stafford Bank as from the beginning of the 1st of January, 1899, and the question we have to determine is whether, for the purpose of assessment to income tax, there has been a succession within section 100, Schedule D, r.

4, applicable to the first and second cases, of the Income Tax Act, 1842. The first case deals with "duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, not contained in any other schedule of this Act." Rule 1, applicable to that case, provides that "the duties to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern upon a fair and just average of three years ending on" the 5th of April preceding the year of assessment. By rule 4, applicable to both the first and second cases, "if amongst any persons in any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or in any profession, in partnership together, any change shall take place in any such partnership, either by death, or dissolution of partnership as to all or any of the partners, or by admitting any other partner therein, before the time of making the assessment, or within the period for which the assessment ought to be made under this Act"—now comes the part of the rule that is material to the present case—"or if any person shall have succeeded to any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or any profession, within such respective periods as aforesaid, the duty payable in respect of such partnership, or any of such partners, or any person succeeding to such profession, trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern shall be computed and ascertained according to the profits and gains of such business derived during the respective periods herein mentioned, notwithstanding such change therein or succession to such business as aforesaid, unless such partners shall prove to the satisfaction of the respective commissioners that the profits and gains of such business have fallen short or will fall short from some specific cause, to be alleged by them, since such change or succession took place, or by reason thereof." That means that in the case of a succession the ordinary rule as to three years' average prescribed by rule 1 of the first case is to be applied. That raises the important question upon the facts here, because if there is a succession the profits of the old County of Stafford Bank would have to be assessed in the manner described in rule 1 on the average of the three preceding years. Upon the other hand, if there has been no succession, the National Provincial Bank have the right to treat the acquisition of the old County of Stafford Bank as the opening by them of a new branch at Wolverhampton, and to treat it as part of the National Provincial Bank; and as no profits were made by the National Provincial Bank at the bank at Wolverhampton in the three preceding years, no such profits could come into the calculation, and the amount to be assessed would be smaller than if the average of the profits of the County of Stafford Bank for the three preceding years were brought into account. The question is whether there has been a succession. If there has, the judgment of the learned judge is wrong. If, however, there has not been a succession, it does not follow that some other rule does not apply. The learned judge has held that there has been no succession, and that the profits of the County of Stafford Bank in the three previous years do not come into the calculation. It seems to me that the language of rule 4 which I have read is plain. If the National Provincial Bank had not been in existence prior to the acquisition of the County of Stafford Bank, but was a new company formed to take over the County of Stafford Bank, the case would have come directly within rule 4. A new company formed for the first time and acquiring the County of Stafford Bank would clearly succeed to the concern which it had acquired. What difference can it possibly make that the company was then already in existence and carrying on business? The company has none the less succeeded to the business because it already has another business. A person might buy an existent business for the purpose of annihilating it because he desired to get rid of the competition and to carry on his own business more successfully. Nothing of that kind took place here. The business of the County of Stafford Bank is carried on by the National Provincial Bank pretty much as before, except that the profits are merged in the profits of the National Provincial Bank. The commissioners have found that there was no succession within the meaning of rule 4. That is not a finding of fact, but a statement of a proposition of law that in such a case as the present there is no succession within the meaning of the rule. It is not like the case of an old bank opening a new branch in Wolverhampton. Here we have the acquisition of an existing business which has become part of the business of the National Provincial Bank. Mr. Danckwerts contended that the question of succession or no succession was a question of fact, and that the commissioners had found the fact, and for that he relied upon the case in Scotland of Ferguson v. Aikin, 4 Tax. Cas. 36. In some cases, no doubt, it may be a question of fact. In the present case, if it is a question of fact for the commissioners they have not decided it. They have given us the benefit of a problem of law, and have asked us whether their decision is right. I think that their decision is wrong. I need not go into other cases where, the commissioners having found that there was no succession in fact, the court refused to go behind the finding. In Prescott, Dimsdale, & Co. v. Bank of England, [1894] 1 Q. B. 351, which was relied upon by the respondents, the only question was whether certain banks which were amalgamated continued respectively to carry on their business, and it was held that they did not. That case is no authority inconsistent in any way with our decision in the present case. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is suggested that upon our decision the National Provincial Bank will be taxed twice over in respect of these sums. I cannot accept that in face of the facts stated in the case. It seems to me that there is a succession within rule 4 referred to by the Master of the Rolls. The goodwill and the whole concern of the County of Stafford Bank were acquired by the National Provincial Bank. It seems to me to be clear that the case comes within the terms of this rule. There is no difficulty in ascertaining the profits of the County of Stafford Bank for the last three years. The commissioners say that there is no succession within the meaning of rule 4. That seems to me to be a decision upon a question of law, and I am unable to agree with it.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. When one looks at the agreement of February, 1899, it seems clear that the National Provincial Bank were to pay a large sum of money for the whole of the business premises belonging to, and the business carried on by, the County of Stafford Bank at Wolverhampton, and by clause 9 of the agreement, the directors and general manager covenanted that if the said business of the County of Stafford Bank should be sold and transferred to the purchasing bank they would not hinder or interrupt the purchasing bank in the management and carrying on of the same, and would not carry on a banking business within a certain distance of Wolverhampton for ten years, but would use their best endeavours to secure the business of the County of Stafford Bank to the purchasing bank. That is what has been done. The National Provincial Bank have conducted the same business with the same staff of clerks. It is, to my mind, impossible to say that there has not been a succession within the meaning of the fourth rule of cases 1 and 2 in Schedule D, section 100, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, unless we can say that that rule does not apply where the successor carries on another similar business as well, or only applies where the business which is acquired is kept separate and distinct from the rest of the business. I see no reason for so holding. In my opinion the National Provincial Bank are the successors to the business of the County of Stafford Bank within the meaning of rule 4.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the bank, Wilde, Moore, & Wigston.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Feb. 17.

PLEWS v. SAMUEL. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Vendor receiving rents while in possession after time for completion—Arrears of rent—Trusteeship.

A vendor remaining in possession after the day fixed for completion of the sale by no default of the purchaser, and receiving the rents of the property after electing to take interest in lieu of rents, is not at liberty as against the purchaser to allocate any part of such rents to arrears of rent due to himself from tenants either at the date of the contract or subsequently before the day fixed for completion.

This was in form an action for specific performance, but the only question calling for a report was whether the vendors, who had remained in possession of the property after the day fixed for completion and received the rents, were under the circumstances mentioned below entitled to deduct any part of such rents before handing them to the purchaser.

The case came on for hearing on admitted facts which so far as material were as follows: By an agreement dated the 24th of February, 1902, the plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendant to purchase certain leasehold houses in Cardiff, including Nos. 172 and 174, Bute-street, subject to certain conditions of sale modified so as to apply to private contract. The premises Nos. 172 and 174, Bute-street were stated to be then let to weekly tenants at £1 2s. 6d. and £1 7s. 6d. weekly respectively, the landlord paying all outgoings.

The day fixed for completion was the 18th of March, 1902, and the conditions provided that if the purchaser then failed to complete he should pay interest on the unpaid purchase-money at 6 per cent. till payment, or the vendors might at their option take the rents during the like period.

Owing to a question being raised by the defendant shortly after the date of the agreement a vendor and purchaser summons was taken out, upon which the defendant's contention was not sustained, but it was not suggested that the point was not properly raisable.

Pending the hearing of the summons completion of the purchase stood over and the plaintiffs accordingly remained in possession, having elected to receive interest and not rents, and their title having been accepted.

At the date of the agreement sums amounting to £31 1s., which by the 18th of March, 1902, had increased to £34, were owing by tenants for arrears of rent. The defendant made no inquiries as to this and did not in fact learn it until long afterwards.

Just before completion in March, 1903, the plaintiffs rendered an account of the rents they had received, drawn upon the footing that they were entitled to retain the £34 for themselves in respect of the arrears due as aforesaid.

This claim being resisted, the plaintiffs brought this action, and shortly afterwards they informed the defendant for the first time that £2 9s., part of the £34, grew due between the date of the agreement and the 18th of March, 1902.

The question raised for decision was whether the plaintiffs could retain out of the rents received by them the sum of £34, or alternatively that sum less the sum of £2 19s.

McSwinney, for the plaintiffs.—The vendor having taken care of the property is entitled to appropriate these rents to the arrears; this is clear as between himself and the tenants; it is also right as between himself and the purchaser. This is not a matter affecting what may be called the corpus of the property to which his fiduciary character is limited. There is no breach of duty to a purchaser who does not prove wilful default. The vendor may be a quasi-trustee for the purchaser, but if so, he has taken all proper care within the rule mentioned in Fry on Specific Performance (4th ed.), p. 590, s. 1394, and by not distraining for rents he has saved the purchaser from entering on a vacant property; at any rate if there was an "appropriation" of rents amounting to wilful default, that could only apply to the £2 19s. which grew due between the date of the contract and the day fixed for completion.

He cited Lysaght v. Edwards, 24 W. R. 778, 2 Ch. D. 499; Foster v. Deacon, 3 Madd. 394; and Sherwin v. Shakespear, 5 De G. M. & G. 517.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C. (with him Ashton Cross), for the purchaser.—If the vendor elects, as he did elect, to take interest in lieu of rents and profits, he thenceforward becomes a trustee for the purchaser of every item of income from the property. Up to the day fixed for completion the vendor of course takes everything, and he can manipulate the incomings as he pleases. If he had elected to take the rents and profits after that date in lieu of interest, he could have continued the manipulation and have allocated any receipts to any portion of rent which might be in arrear, but having elected for interest his position is changed, and henceforward he is a trustee not merely of the corpus of the property so as to keep that intact, but also of the rents and profits.

He cited Phillips v. Silvester, 21 W. R. 179, 8 Ch. 173; Royal Bristol Permanent Building Society v. Bomash, 35 Ch. D. 390, 35 W. R. Dig. 69.

KEKEWICH, J.—The statement of facts in this case raises a nice point which is not covered by authority. Several modern cases lay down rules as to the relation of vendor and purchaser as to land agreed to be sold. Perhaps Lysaght v. Edwards is one of the most instructive: there the question was whether land included in a contract for sale passed under a devise by the vendor of trust estates, and it was held that it did so pass, as the vendor was a trustee for the purchaser; the relation was further illustrated by Phillips v. Silvester, showing that a vendor may be made liable for neglect to take care of the property; and there are other cases showing that he may be charged with wilful default. But all those cases dealt with the contract of sale and the relations arising therefrom, and in them everything was laid down subject to the contract being performed; of course if the contract were not performed the relationship would be dissolved, and nothing could then be said against the vendor on the score of neglect, misfeasance, or otherwise, for he would be and remain owner of the estate; that shows how peculiar is the position of a vendor in such a case; he is no doubt a trustee, but only so in a modified sense.

(a.) Reported by ALAN C. NESBITT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The present case, however, raises a new question, and I have to deal with relations arising from and the position subsisting after the expiration of the time or the day "fixed for completion," after which day the purchaser was to be entitled to the rents and profits. Of course any other day might have been chosen to limit or mark the time from which the purchaser was to take the rents and profits; but here, as in very many cases, the day taken was the day fixed for completion—viz., the 18th of March, 1902. Completion did not take place on that day and the vendor remained in possession—not that there was any default in him or the purchaser, for the point the purchaser raised was a proper one to take. The vendor also elected to take interest in lieu of rents and profits, as he was entitled to do, but continuing in possession, he continued to receive the rents and profits. The property was let to weekly tenants, and after the 18th of March, 1902, the vendor received rents which he now wishes to appropriate or allocate to arrears of rent due in respect of weeks prior to the contract of sale, and as a result to put into his own pocket the rents so received as being moneys belonging to himself. If there were nothing else in it, it would seem that the vendor could properly say, as against the tenants, "I can appropriate these moneys to answer any rents due to me. I choose the period prior to the 18th of March." But then his relation to the purchaser comes in, and the question arises whether he can do that as against the purchaser; it is clear he still owed a duty to the purchaser—viz., the duty of getting in the rents and holding them for the purchaser, although he also had an interest in the rents as vendor in case the purchaser failed to complete; his duty lay one way and his interest another; there was a conflict. But when there is a conflict of duty and interest arising out of a fiduciary position, duty must prevail, and if it has not in fact prevailed the court must insist upon it.

The vendor cannot set up his interest as against his duty, and although he may have received these rents in respect of the earlier period, I feel bound to hold that, as against the purchaser, he must bring them into account. The vendor must pay the costs.

Solicitors, Bower, Cotton, & Bower, for Stephens, David, & Co., Cardiff; Windybank, Samuell, & Lawrence, for Lewis, Morgan, & Box, Cardiff.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } Aug. 5, 1903.

In re COTGRAVE.
MYNORS v. COTGRAVE. (a.)

Will — Forfeiture — "Alienate or incumber"—Bankruptcy—Petition by debtor—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52).

Property was given under a will to life tenants with a gift over in the event of any of them "alienating or incumbering, or agreeing to alienate or incumber," their shares or interests. One of the life tenants presented a petition in bankruptcy, which was followed by adjudication on his own application.

Held, that this constituted an alienation, and that the gift over took effect.

In re Amherst, 20 W. R. 290, 13 Eq. 464, followed.

Adjourned summons.

By his will, dated the 17th of July, 1866, Edward Stone Cotgrave directed his trustees to set apart a sum of £15,000 to hold upon trust for his grandson, Richard de Malpas Cotgrave Farmar, for his life, and after his decease upon trust as to the principal for his children, and after bequests to other grandchildren of his own, the testator declared that in the event of any of his grandchildren on coming of age or at any subsequent time "alienating or incumbering or agreeing to alienate or incumber" their shares or interests in either capital or income of the trust funds to which they became entitled, such grandchild should from thenceforth for themselves or their issue absolutely forfeit all benefit to which he or they would otherwise be entitled, and that the money should go to the eldest son of the testator's brother.

The testator died in 1868, and his will was duly proved by his executors.

Richard de Malpas Cotgrave Farmar, pursuant to a direction in the will, assumed the name of Richard de Malpas Cotgrave only.

In 1877 R. de M. Cotgrave married Amelia Farmar Cotgrave, and by her had eight children, of whom seven were living and were infants.

By an order of the court, dated the 8th of April, 1902, made in an action of In re Cotgrave, Cotgrave v. Whitehead, the forfeiture clause relating to alienation in the will was declared to include the interest in remainder of the child or children of the testator's grandchildren.

By an indenture dated the 16th of March, 1903, Thomas Manson Cotgrave absolutely assigned to A. Cotgrave, the wife of R. de M. Cotgrave, his contingent interest in this sum of £15,000.

On the 16th of March, 1903, R. de M. Cotgrave filed his own petition in bankruptcy, and a receiving order was made against him on that day, and on his application he was adjudged bankrupt and the court subsequently ordered his estate to be administered in a summary manner.

This was a summons taken out by the trustees of the testator's will to determine whether the defendant R. de M. Cotgrave had forfeited his interest in this sum of £15,000 by his bankruptcy.

A. Adams, for the trustees.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Rooth, for parties claiming under the gift over.—The presentation of his own petition by the beneficiary amounts to alienation: Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), p. 552. In re Amherst's Trusts, 20 W. R. 290, 13 Eq. 464. Ex parte Dawes, In re Moon, 34 W. R. 752, 17 Q. B. D. 275, is distinguishable, as there the clause ran "do or suffer anything whereby the income, if payable to him absolutely, would become vested in any other person," and no adjudication was made in that case, but a composition was entered into, but here an adjudication has taken place.

Tyrrell, for the children of the bankrupt.

Roscoe, for other parties interested.

J. G. Wood, for the official receiver.—There has been no forfeiture. The clause relating to forfeiture must be strictly construed. Here the words are "alienate or incumber," not "part with," as in In re Amherst's Trusts. The alienation in bankruptcy is by operation of law, and is not the act of the bankrupt, as bankruptcy is not the necessary result of a petition: Graham v. Lee, 23 Beav. 388, and Croft v. Lumley, 6 H. L. C. 672, 743.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KEKEWICH, J.—I do not think it is necessary to go into the case of Croft v. Lumley, for we have the distinct authority of Bacon, V.C., in In re Amherst's Trusts that under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the presentation of his own petition by a debtor was sufficient to work a forfeiture. True, the words of the forfeiture clause were not exactly the same in that case as in this. They were "assign over, assure, mortgage, or in any manner incumber, or by any instrument in writing, parol agreement, or otherwise howsoever, part from" the income; here what is contemplated is "alienate or incumber or agree to alienate or incumber"; here it is alienation, there it was assigning over; but there is no real distinction between the two cases, and Bacon, V.C., a judge of great experience, as chief judge in bankruptcy, in his judgment in In re Amherst's Trusts, says: "The presentation of the petition is undoubetdly an act of bankruptcy, although it is uncertain when the petition is presented whether bankruptcy will ensue or not. Presentation of the petition may be followed by a liquidation by arrangement, and, if it be so followed, then, upon the appointment of a trustee, the whole of the debtor's estate vests in the trustee; and the title of the trustee to the debtor's property relates back if and when necessary to the date of the presentation of the petition." So that under that Act in either event, whether bankruptcy ensues or liquidation by arrangement, there would be a vesting of the bankrupt's property in some person other than himself. There would be no occasion to go further, were it not that that case was decided under the Act of 1869, whereas this case arises under the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, and the two Acts are somewhat different. As is pointed out by Wright, J., in Ex parte Lovell, [1901] 2 K. B. 16, 22, where after distinguishing In re Amherst's Trusts on the ground that in In re Amherst's Trusts the words of the forfeiture clause were more comprehensive than in the case before him, the learned judge goes on to say: "Moreover, all those cases, except In re Amherst's Trusts, were determined upon statutes under which the debtor's petition, ipso facto, effected an assignment of the debtor's property for the benefit of creditors, but under the Act of 1883, even upon a debtor's petition asking for adjudication, it does not follow automatically. The court has a discretion in the matter, and, unless the court in its discretion adjudicates, the creditors may prefer to accept a composition. Therefore Cave, J., in In re Dawes, Ex parte Moon, held that a debtor's petition under the Act of 1883 did not of itself amount to an assignment. In that case the creditors accepted a composition, so that there was no adjudication and no vesting of the debtor's property in a trustee; but the case seems to be an authority that the mere filing of a petition by a debtor is not of itself an assignment. And, if so, there is in any view no assignment until adjudication." The learned judge therefore thought that the presentation of his own petition by a debtor did not amount to assignment unless followed by adjudication; but, however that may be, that distinction is not applicable here, because this petition has been followed by adjudication, and, although adjudication is not the necessary or automatic consequence of filing a petition, nevertheless it is the natural consequence contemplated by the bankrupt, and in this case it has been the actual consequence. Moreover, in In re Riggs, Ex parte Lovell, the prohibition was against assignment only, whereas here it is against alienation or incumbering. I must therefore hold that the principle of In re Amherst's Trusts applies, and that the bankrupt has alienated his interest within the meaning of the forfeiture clause, and has consequently forfeited it.

Solicitors, Burch, Whitehead, & Davidsons; Ravenscroft, Woodward, & Co., for Crompton & Co., Exeter; Coode, Kingdon, & Cotton; Field, Roscoe, & Co.

Chan. Div.
Byrne, J. } Feb. 11, 27.

In re BROWN & GREGORY (LIMITED).
ANDREWS v. BROWN & GREGORY (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Debenture-holders' action—Debentures held by a trustee for creditors of lenders—Debt owed by lenders to company—Right of participation in fund available for debenture-holders.

P. was general assignee of the property of a firm, S., for the benefit of its creditors. As such assignee P. was entitled to certain debentures issued by a company, and was registered as holder thereof. The firm S. was indebted to the company in a sum which formed part of the property secured by the debentures. The debentures were indorsed with a condition that the moneys secured should be paid without regard to any equities between the company and the original or any intermediate holder. A debenture-holders' action having been brought against the company, and the usual judgment given, there was a fund in court in the action available for distribution among the debenture-holders.

Held, that P., not being a bonâ fide purchaser for value of the debentures, could not claim to share in the fund until the debt due from the firm to the company had been paid or brought into account, notwithstanding that he was the registered holder.

In re Goy & Co. (Limited), 48 W. R. 425, [1900] 2 Ch. 149, distinguished.

Further consideration.

This was the further consideration of a debenture-holders' action upon which a question arose as to the right of a debenture-holder who was the assignee of the property of a firm to participate in the assets of a company which consisted partly of a debt owed by the firm to the company.

The above action was commenced in January, 1902, by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other debenture-holders of the above company for the usual accounts, for the sale of the property of the company, and for division of the proceeds.

In 1898 the company had issued debentures of £100 each to one Samuel Smith by which the company bound themselves to pay the moneys secured to Smith, or the registered holder for the time being, and charged all its property with such payments, subject to the conditions indorsed thereon. The following were among the conditions:

"2. The principal moneys, bonus, and interest hereby secured will be paid without regard to any equities between the company and the original or any intermediate holder of this debenture.

"3. The receipt of the registered holder of this debenture, his executors or administrators, shall alone be a good discharge for the principal moneys and bonus hereby secured, and the interest payable from time to time on the £100 secured by the debenture.

"11. The registered holder hereof will be regarded as exclusively entitled to the benefit of this debenture, and all persons may act accordingly, and the company shall not be bound to enter on the register notice of any trust, or to recognize any right in any other person, save as therein provided."

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

These debentures, or the thirty of them about which the question arose, belonged beneficially to the firm of Samuel Smith & Co., and were on the 3rd of February, 1902, assigned by the firm to one A. C. Palmer by a deed whereby, except onerous property, and the separate property of Samuel Smith, all the joint and several property of the firm of Samuel Smith & Co. and its members was assigned to Palmer as trustee for the creditors of the firm. Palmer was subsequently registered as the holder of these debentures. On the 22nd of February, 1902, the usual judgment in the action was given. In July, 1902, the master certified that the sum of £1,666 8s. 11d. was due from Samuel Smith or his firm to the defendant company, and that this was part of the property subject to the debentures in question. The above sum was (as his lordship found) in fact due from the firm to the company. There was a fund in court in the action which was available for distribution in payment of a dividend in respect of the amounts due to the debenture-holders under their debentures. Palmer claimed to be entitled to receive dividend in respect of the debentures assigned to him and of which he was the registered holder. The other debenture-holders contended that he could not share in the dividends until the whole debt of £1,666 8s. 11d. due to the company as aforesaid had been paid. It was stated in the course of the argument that the company was being wound up voluntarily.

Rowden, K.C., and Hon. T. H. Watson, for the plaintiffs.—Palmer is not an independent transferee. He is really none other than the firm of Samuel Smith & Co. Hence he cannot upon settled principles participate in the fund until he has paid into the fund everything which he owes to it: In re Akerman, 40 W. R. 12, [1891] 3 Ch. 212; In re Watson, 44 W. R. 571, [1896] 1 Ch. 925; In re Auriferous Properties (Limited), 47 W. R. 75, [1898] 2 Ch. 428; and see the observations of Stirling, J., in In re Goy & Co. (Limited), [1900] 2 Ch. 149, 48 W. R. 425.

Norton, K.C., and Hon. M. Macnaghten, for Palmer.—Mr. Palmer being the registered holder of the debentures, is entitled to his dividends out of the fund without regard to the debt owed by his assignors, the firm of Samuel Smith & Co., to the defendant company, as under the conditions indorsed on the debentures no notice is to be taken by the company of any trusts, and no regard is to be paid to any equities existing between the original holders and the company: In re Goy & Co. (Limited). Even if the company did take notice of the trust these dividends could not be set off against the debt due from the firm. The other debenture-holders cannot sue for the debt. The only person to sue is the company by its liquidator, and when they do that the firm can set off its debentures against the debt. In re Akerman was only a case of retainer by executors in respect of a statute-barred debt. In re Auriferous Properties (Limited) was a case where the debt was due by and not to the company.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 27.—BYRNE, J.—There is no question of set-off arising, and I do not see that there is any difference in point of principle because the item of property charged happens to be a debt rather than some other item, as, for instance, a sum of Consols in the name of Palmer as trustee by virtue of the assignment. The contention on the part of the other debenture-holders is that Palmer cannot, as assignee, share in the dividend without paying or bringing into account the whole amount of the debt. There is no doubt as to the general principle applicable. It is stated by Stirling, J., in the case of In re Goy & Co.: "It has repeatedly been held inequitable that a person entitled to a share of a fund should receive anything in respect of that share without paying what he may be bound to contribute to the same fund. Under such circumstances the court in effect says to the person claiming to be paid, 'You have in your own hands that which is applicable to the payment—pay yourself out of that!'" But it has been argued on behalf of Palmer that he is in the position of holder of the debentures, that he owes nothing to the company, and that therefore the doctrine to which I have referred does not apply. When the facts are arrived at, the real question resolves itself into this—namely, whether or not Palmer, as assignee of the firm's assets, can be in a better position than the firm would have been if they had never assigned, and had been the registered owners of the debentures. Now, Palmer is entitled to be registered as owner of the debentures, and is so by virtue of the assignment by Smith and his co-partners as trustee for them subject to satisfying creditors who may execute the deed, and Smith and his co-partners are liable to pay the debt. In my opinion Palmer, as assignee, is in no better position than his assignors, being simply a general assignee in trust for creditors—neither the company nor the debenture-holders having come in under it—and he can only be entitled subject to the same equities as his assignors were subject to. He is not in the position of a bonâ fide purchaser for value, as was the assignee in In re Goy & Co. The debentures are issued with the following conditions: [His lordship read conditions 2 and 11.] These conditions do not, in my opinion, prevent the company or the debenture-holders from insisting upon their right as against Palmer, just as they would have been entitled to do against his assignors. He only holds, under the deed of the 3rd of February, 1902, as trustee for them as against those creditors who have not come in under the deed. I think that Palmer must bring into account the £1,666 8s. 11d. before he can claim to share in any dividend, which means that he cannot share in the amount now to be divided. The right method of division appears to me to be to add £1,666 8s. 11d. for the purposes of computation to the amount available for division, and then to pay the other debenture-holders all they are entitled to upon that footing, so far as the actual fund will extend. If there should be any future distribution the payment now made will be brought into account, regard being had to the then state of circumstances. I can easily imagine the rights being altered by other events, as, for instance, by the company or the debenture-holders receiving some payment under the deed, there being a release contained in it by assenting creditors.

Solicitors, Collyer-Bristow, Hill, Dods, & Booth, for Stone, Simpson, & Mason, Tunbridge Wells; James & Mellor.

Chan. Div. } Feb. 22.
Farwell, J. }

CARL BROTHERS (LIMITED) v. WEBSTER. (a.)

Goodwill—Sale of business—Soliciting old customers.

The goodwill of a business was sold to the C. Co. W., one of the vendors, who had been a partner in the business, subsequently formed the N. Co., which competed with the C. Co. W., on behalf of the N. Co., solicited custom from persons who had been customers of the original business.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the rule which prohibits the vendor from soliciting customers applies when the customers, although remaining customers of the purchaser, have in fact become customers of the new firm started by the vendor. It is immaterial whether a particular individual who is solicited has also of his own accord done business with the vendor.

In May, 1899, the firm of Carl Brothers sold the business of wholesale drapers and warehousemen carried on by them at Norwich, and the goodwill thereof, to the plaintiff company, Carl Brothers (Limited). The defendant Webster was a partner in the firm of Carl Brothers.

The defendant in accordance with the agreement for sale acted as managing director of this company until the 3rd of January, 1903. Subsequently he formed a company called the Norwich Warehouse Co. (Limited), which carried on business in competition with the plaintiffs. The defendant was interested in this company and on its behalf he solicited custom from persons who had been customers of the original firm of Carl Brothers.

This action was brought by the plaintiff company to restrain the defendant from soliciting custom from persons who had been customers of the original firm of Carl Brothers.

It was contended that the persons solicited by the defendant had, before such solicitation, become customers of the Norwich Warehouse Co. (Limited) of their own accord, although they were also customers of the plaintiffs.

Eldon Bankes, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiffs.

Upjohn, K.C., and Jessel, for the defendant.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: The only question on which I propose to express an opinion is the general question, without condescending to particular instances, which may be put in this way: Does the rule which prohibits the vendor of a business from soliciting customers disappear when those customers, although remaining customers of the old firm—i.e., the purchaser, have in fact dealt with the new firm started by the vendor, so that they have become also customers of the new firm—i.e., the vendor? In my opinion it would make no difference.

The test, to my mind, is whether they are properly to be called customers of the old firm, the goodwill of which has been bought by the purchaser.

The principle which governs this class of cases is unfortunately so wide that it is difficult to apply by reason of its generality. I suppose it really is the old principle that a man cannot derogate from his own grant, but it is complicated by the fact that it is now well settled, notwithstanding that principle, that it is competent for a man who has sold his business to set up a similar business next door the next day and do the best he can—short of representing that he is still carrying on the old business or soliciting the customers of the old business—to attract away all the business he has already sold. I take the law as I find it, but as Lord Davey puts it in Trego v. Hunt, 44 W. R. 225 [1896] A. C. 7, the difficulty of doing complete justice ought not to prevent me meting out such scanty measure of protection to the purchaser as I can manage to do. It seems to me that this is the very smallest measure of protection that the unfortunate purchaser is entitled to get. It is unfortunate that he cannot get more, but he is entitled on the authorities to say: "You have sold me this business and you shall not actively solicit the customers who made that business, who formed the value of it, to leave me and come to you." That being the principle, it appears to me it is really a matter of indifference whether a particular individual who is solicited has also of his own accord done business with the vendor. Assuming, he has, if a customer has still remained the customer—as in the instance before me is the case with every witness—if the customer has remained throughout and still is a customer of the old firm, the mischief done by the solicitation is the same whether he has also dealt with the firm of his own free will or whether he has not. What the purchaser is entitled to say is "You shall not actively solicit your old customers, who became mine, so long as these are my customers, to come to you, whether they have or have not of their own accord come to buy goods from your new firm."

I think I should be wrong to limit the small amount of protection which the purchaser of a business can get by any such restriction as is suggested.

The injunction will go without any qualification as to Mr. Webster and his agents. I cannot grant an injunction against the company, but the injunction against Mr. Webster must restrain him from directing or suggesting solicitation by travellers or other agents of the company.

Solicitors, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, & Co., for Stevens, Miller, & Jones, Norwich; Christorer & Roney.

Chan. Div. } Jan. 19, 20, 21, 22; Feb. 2.
Joyce, J. }

CHRISTY & CO. v. TIPPER & SON. (a.)

Trade-mark—Invented word—Passing off—Infringement.

No word can be said to be an invented word if it is like any known word; it must be one coined for the first time, and must not be descriptive. But if it is an English word with merely the suffix "ine" added it is not an invented word.

The plaintiffs, Christy & Co., were the agents in this country of Wilbur F. Young, also a plaintiff in the action, who carried on business in America, and as such agents sold under the name "Absorbine" a medicinal preparation used for curing certain complaints of horses and cattle.

The defendants were also manufacturers and vendors in the United Kingdom and abroad of horse and cattle medicines. At a date almost contemporaneous with the application by the plaintiffs for registration of their trade-mark "Absorbine," the defendants adopted, without any knowledge of the plaintiffs' user, the same word "Absorbine."

The present action asked for an injunction restraining defendants from offering for sale any veterinary preparation under the name "Absorbine," and to restrain the defendants from infringing the rights of the plaintiffs in their registered trade-mark. Plaintiffs also claimed an injunction to restrain defendants from passing off their goods as and for those of the plaintiffs.

Defendants applied to have the trade-mark "Absorbine" struck off the register as its registration as a trade-mark was improper.

The question for the court was whether the word "Absorbine" was an invented word so as to be capable of being registered under section 10 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, which provides that "a trade-mark must consist of or contain one at least of the following essential particulars . . . (d) an invented word or invented words; (e) a word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods, and not being a geographical name."

(a.) Reported by ALFRED C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hughes, K.C., and Sebastian, for the plaintiffs.—The question was whether the registered trade-mark is good or not. Before "Solio" case, [1898] A. C. 571, it was assumed that Patents, &c., Act, 1888, s. 10, sub-sections (d) and (e) were to be read together, but this assumption was negatived in the above case; the result of this is, that if it is an invented word it matters not whether it has reference to the character or quality of the goods: see p. 576 of the "Solio" case (Lord Halsbury). And sub-section (d) of section 10 can be read by itself: "Pirle" case, In re Ripley, 15 Pat. Rep. 151, and see the "Savonol" case, Field v. Wagel Syndicate (Limited), 17 Pat. Rep. 266. "Ine" in this case has no more meaning than "ol" in the "Savonol" case: Linotype Trade-Mark, [1900] 2 Ch. 238, 48 W. R. Dig. 188; Paine v. Daniels & Sons' Breweries, [1893] 2 Ch. 567, 41 W. R. Dig. 253. In the "Yorkshire Relish" case, In re Powell, [1894] A. C. 8, the name was taken off the register. After 1883 the judges at first decided to let all fancy words through, but now the rule laid down by Lord Herschell in the "Solio" case must be followed.

Younger, K.C., and Hewitt, for the defendants.—For the law prior to the "Solio" case, see "Satinine" case, In re Meyerstein, 38 W. R. 440, 43 Ch. D. 604; "Eboline" case, In re Salt, 42 W. R. 666, [1894] 3 Ch. 166; and "Somatose" case, In re Farbenfabriken, 42 W. R. 488, [1894] 1 Ch. 645. These sub-sections (d) and (e) of section 10 of the Patents and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, are independent of each other. The word cannot be said to be an invented word if it is like any known word; it must be one coined for the first time, and must not be descriptive. But if it is an English word with merely a flourish "ine" it is not an invented word; a word might be an invented word if of foreign origin, and so likely to be known only to scholars; it is not necessary that the word should be wholly meaningless. A judge might say it was invented if remotely descriptive: "Savonol" case, "Nourishing Stout" case, Ragget v. Findlater, 22 W. R. 53, L. R. 17 Eq. 29. "Absorbine" is not an invented word, since before 1901 it was used in America, so it cannot be used here afterwards as an invented word: British Electrozone case, 13 R. P. Cas. 447. The real effect of the "Solio" case was that sub-sections (d) and (e) of section 10 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1888, are independent: Edwards v. Dennis, 30 Ch. D. 454, 34 W. R. Dig. 197; Kerly on Trade-Marks, p. 371; Davis & Co. v. Stribolt & Co., 59 L. T. 854, 37 W. R. Dig. 186.

Hughes, K.C., in reply.—In regard to the "Electrozone" case, it seems contrary to principle; and to say that a man is less entitled to a mark because he has used it himself must be wrong: Payton & Co. v. Snelling, Lampard, & Co., 16 R. P. Cas. 283; Manchester Brewery Co. v. North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Co., [1898] 1 Ch. 539, [1899] A. C. 83.

Feb. 2.—JOYCE, J.—In November, 1901, the plaintiff applied for and afterwards obtained the registration as a trade-mark of the word "Absorbine" in class 2 in respect of chemical substances prepared for use in medicine and pharmacy. The uses of the word appeared to have been solely in connection with and as a designation of a liquid preparation professing to be especially prepared to remove wind-puff, capped-hock, thorough-pin, fatty tumours, enlarged glands, and all puffs and swellings. The defendants, who were well-known manufacturers and vendors of veterinary preparations, had previously made and sold an ointment — "Tipper's Absorbent Ointment" — for application in cases similar to those for which plaintiffs' liquid remedy was advertised to be specially prepared or appropriated. At a date practically contemporaneous with the plaintiffs' application for their trade-mark "Absorbine" the defendants, who appeared to be perfectly honest tradesmen, without any knowledge of what the plaintiffs were doing, changed the title of their absorbent ointment to "Absorbine," and they had sold the same under the title of "Absorbine Tippers" ever since, though perhaps not in very large quantities. The plaintiffs having discovered what the defendants were doing, on the 30th of November, 1903, instituted this action, not only for the usual relief in respect of the trade-mark, but also for an injunction restraining the defendants from passing off their goods as and for those of the plaintiffs. The defendants replied with a motion to expunge the trade-mark from the register. At the conclusion of the trial, if not before, it was virtually admitted on behalf of the plaintiffs that the only ground for the passing-off action was the use of the word "Absorbine," and I then intimated, and, if necessary, decided, that if "Absorbine" were allowed to remain on the Register of Trade-Marks the action for passing-off as distinguished from infringement of trade-mark was unnecessary. It was quite clear that the word "Absorbine" had obviously reference to the character or quality of the goods. It could only be registered, if at all, under section 64, sub-section 1 (d), of the Patents, &c., Act, 1888, as being an invented word. Whether it was or was not an invented word within the meaning of the statute is the single question that remains for me to decide.

The first two syllables of the word under consideration were beyond all question the common English word "absorb." I have not been told how the whole word was invented. In the application for its registration in America it was spoken of by the applicant as an arbitrary or arbitrarily chosen word. It might simply be a misspelling of the present participle of the verb absorb, or it might represent that participle pronounced in a careless, slovenly fashion. If it were that, it was certainly incapable of registration in respect of such a veterinary medicament as that of the plaintiffs; or it might be the common English word "absorb" with a common termination thereto. Such a termination was found in very many words designating chemical substances, chlorine, glycerine, &c., also in medicinal preparations as maltine, phosphorine, &c. When so used I am not aware that the syllable "ine" had any meaning at all of itself, nor has it any here. It was little if anything more than a sort of flourish rounding off the word or expression to which it was attached in order to make a euphonious name. In the "Solio" case, Eastman, &c. v. Comptroller-General, [1898] A. C. 571, it was decided, contrary to what had previously been held, that a word might be a good invented word, although it might have some reference to the quality or character of the goods, and that the word "solio" was an invented word. But the present Lord Chancellor said: "My lords, I desire to give my opinion with reference to the particular word and not to go behind it. I can quite understand suggesting other words—compound words or foreign words—as to which it would be impossible to say that they were invented words, although perhaps never seen before, or that they did not indicate the character or quality of the goods, although as words of the English tongue they had never been seen before. Suppose a person were to attempt to register as a single English word 'cheapandgood,' or even without taking so gross an example, using a word so slightly differing from an ordinary and recognized word as to be neither an invented word nor avoiding the prohibited choice of a word indicating character or quality. The line must be sometimes difficult to draw; but to my mind the substance of the enactment is intelligible enough, and the comptroller has to make up his mind whether in substance there had been an infringement of the rule. Of course also words which are merely misspelt, but which are nevertheless in sound ordinary English words, and the use of which may tend to deceive, ought to not be permitted." And Lord Herschell, a very high authority on the subject, said: "It may no doubt sometimes be difficult to determine whether a word is 'invented' or not. I do not think the combination of two English words is an invented word, even although the combination may not have been in use before, nor do I think that a mere variation of the orthography or termination of a word would be sufficient to constitute an invented word if to the eye or ear the same idea would be conveyed as by the word in its ordinary form." And Lord Shand in the same case said: "At the same time I agree with your lordships, and especially with what has been said by my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten, in thinking, especially after the decision to be given in this case, that the comptroller will be fully warranted in taking care that there shall not be admitted under the guise or cover of words called invented by the applicant, words really in ordinary use which might in a disguised form have reference to the character or quality of the goods. There must be invention, and not the appearance of invention only; it is not possible to define the extent of invention required; but the words should, I think, be clearly and substantially different from any word in ordinary and common use; a word with a diminutive or a short and meaningless syllable added to it, or a mere combination of two known words would not be an invented word; and a word would not be 'invented' which, with some trifling addition or very trifling variation, still leaves the word one which is well known or in ordinary use, and which would be quite understood as intended to convey the meaning of such a word."

I know of no authority which requires me to hold that such a word as "Absorbine" was an invented word. None of the syllables or parts of which the word was composed was invented, and I see no invention in the combining of them so as to form the whole. The case of Linotype Co.'s Trade-Mark, [1900] 2 Ch. 238, and also that of Savonol (Pell's Trade-Mark), 17 Pat. Rep. 266, were materially different from the present. In the circumstances I am bound to hold that "Absorbine" was not an invented word, and consequently it must be expunged from the Register of Trade-Marks and the action must be dismissed.

Solicitors, Lionel E. Townroe; Belfrage & Co., for T. W. Robinson, Birmingham.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } April 13, 14.

GEORGE v. THOMAS. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Vendor's title—Adverse claim—Practice.

When a bonâ fide claim has been made by a third party affecting the vendor's title, although no action to enforce such claim is actually pending, the court will not make a decree for specific performance of a contract for sale against the purchaser, but will order the vendor's action for specific performance to stand over for a reasonable interval, to see whether the third party will meantime institute proceedings to enforce his claim.

On a sale of house property the vendor represented that rates were payable by the tenant. At the date of the sale the vendor knew that the tenant claimed that rates ought to be paid by the landlord. Before completion of the purchase the tenant brought an action against the vendor to enforce his said claim, but this action was dismissed on a technical ground. The tenant, however, expressed an intention of taking further proceedings in the matter against the vendor. The purchaser refused to complete on the ground that the vendor did not show a good title. In an action for specific performance brought by the vendor,

The Court refused to make an immediate decree for specific performance, and ordered the case to stand over for a definite period in order to see whether the tenant would in the meantime institute new proceedings to enforce his claim.

Action.

The plaintiff was the owner of the leasehold property known as Nos. 118 and 119, Cheapside, in the City of London, under an indenture of lease dated the 29th of September, 1883, at a ground-rent of £250 per annum.

The property was sub-let, as to the ground floor of No. 119 to Walter Whiffen, at a yearly rent of £300, and as to the remainder thereof to another tenant.

By the terms of his lease Whiffen was liable to pay rates and taxes amounting to about £125 per annum in respect of the ground floor of No. 119.

Rates and taxes had, in fact, been paid in respect of the entire property by the plaintiff, or his predecessors in title, during a period of twenty-five years up to the end of February, 1903. At that time the plaintiff first became aware of Whiffen's liability under his lease to pay rates and taxes.

On the 21st of July, 1903, the plaintiff put the property up for sale by auction described as a "profit rental." The particulars of sale after deducting outgoings, including therein payment of rates and taxes in respect of the property other than that portion let to Whiffen, showed a clear annual profit of £550.

The defendant bought the property at the price of £5,500 and paid to the plaintiff a deposit of £550. The completion of the purchase was fixed for the 29th of September, 1903.

Whiffen had, to the knowledge of the plaintiff, repudiated his liability to pay rates and taxes since February, 1903.

On the 29th of September, 1903, the day fixed for the completion of the purchase, Whiffen commenced an action against the plaintiff for the rectification of his lease on the ground that the provision therein contained relative to the payment of rates and taxes by the tenant had been inserted by mistake.

This action came on for hearing before Buckley, J., and was dismissed on the ground that Whiffen, by purporting to sub-let to a third party for all the residue of his term, had in fact assigned, and no longer had any interest.

It appeared from the evidence that Whiffen, by his solicitor, had expressed the intention of taking further proceedings with a like object against the plaintiff.

The defendant refused to complete on the ground that the value of the profit rental was not as described in the particulars of sale, and alleged that the plaintiff did not show a good title.

The plaintiff, the vendor, thereupon instituted the present action for specific performance of the contract against the purchaser.

(a.) Reported by H. WOLCOTT WARNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Eve, K.C., and Methold, for the plaintiff.—The defendant has no ground for rescission or compensation. Whiffen has failed in the action he brought against the plaintiff, and is not now in a position to make any claim against the plaintiff.

Vernon-Smith, K.C., and Duke, for the defendant.—The plaintiff knew that Whiffen denied his liability to pay rates before the sale to the defendant. Whiffen's action was not decided on its merits. The court should not make an order for specific performance, but should, at least, take time to determine if Whiffen intends to prosecute his claim: Bentley v. Craven, 1 W. R. 401, 17 B. 204, and Pegler v. White, 12 W. R. 455, 33 Beav. 403.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The plaintiff brings this action relying on his title. He says that Whiffen's claim against him is illusory, and urges the court to disregard it.

I ought not, as against the defendant, to assume that that is so. The claim is an honest one; and for a long time the landlord has paid the rates. I ought not to-day to enforce specific performance against the defendant, because sufficient time has not elapsed to enable the court to determine if Whiffen intends to take further proceedings. This might be done either by Whiffen's sub-lessee reassigning to him or by joining with him in bringing an action.

On the other hand, I ought not to dismiss the plaintiff's action. If, after a reasonable interval, Whiffen fails to take further action, I may be forced to regard his claim as illusory. The action will stand over in order that I may have an opportunity of judging if Whiffen's claim is a substantial one.

Further hearing adjourned until the 24th of June.

Solicitors, Coldham & Birkett; Phillips, Cumming, & Mason.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — March 8.

TAYLOR v. HAMSTEAD COLLIERY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Scheme of compensation—Right to take proceedings independently of Act—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 2 (b); s. 3, sub-section 1.

A workman contracted with his employers to accept a scheme of compensation in substitution for the benefits which he might claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The scheme, which was duly certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies under section 3, sub-section 1, of the Act, made provision for payments in cases of fatal and non-fatal accidents, and provided that the contributions made by the employers to the fund were to be in lieu of and to exempt them from any further claims which otherwise the workmen might be entitled to prosecute as the result of accidents occurring during their employment. The workman having been killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, his widow received certain weekly payments under the scheme, and then brought an action against the employers under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, to recover damages for the death of her husband.

Held, that she was precluded from suing by section 1, sub-section 2 (b), and section 3, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Wills and Kennedy, JJ.), reversing the judgment of Judge Whitehorne, K.C., at the Birmingham County Court.

The action was brought in the Birmingham County Court by the widow of a deceased workman to recover damages from the defendants under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. The defendants at the trial took the preliminary objection that, the plaintiff having received compensation under a duly certified scheme, she was precluded by section 1, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from bringing an action for damages under the Employers' Liability Act. After taking evidence on the question of fact raised by the preliminary objection, the county court judge found as facts: (1) That there was a duly certified scheme within section 3, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act; (2) that the deceased workman in each case had accepted the scheme willingly and under no compulsion whatever, and with full knowledge of its terms, in substitution for and in place of benefits which he might claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act; (3) that this was a legal and effectual contract with the deceased workman and the defendants; (4) that the plaintiff had received, was receiving, and would in future receive the full benefits under the scheme thus contracted for.

On these findings the judge held that compensation under the scheme was by section 3, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the same as compensation under the Act, and that therefore the employers were, under section 1, sub-section 2 (b), not liable both to pay that compensation and also to proceedings under the Employers' Liability Act. The Divisional Court held that taking the benefit of a scheme under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, was not the same as taking proceedings to recover compensation under the Act, and that the plaintiff was not debarred by section 1, sub-section 2 (b), from claiming damages under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880; but that the payments received under the scheme would probably have to go in reduction of the damages awarded. The defendants by leave appealed.

By section 1, sub-section 2 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employer, or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this Act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this Act, or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this Act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this Act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this Act, except in case of such personal negligence or wilful act as aforesaid." By section 3, sub-section 1, "If the Registrar of Friendly Societies, after taking steps to ascertain the views of the employer and workmen, certifies that any scheme of compensation, benefit, or insurance for the workmen of an employer in any employment, whether or not such scheme includes other employers and their workmen, is on the whole not less favourable to the general body of workmen and their dependants than the provisions of this Act, the employer may, until the certificate is revoked, contract with any of those workmen that the provisions of the scheme shall be substituted for the provisions of this Act, and thereupon the employer shall be liable only in accordance with the scheme, but save as aforesaid, this Act shall apply notwithstanding any contract to the contrary made after the commencement of this Act." The scheme, which was entitled "Rules of the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire Mining District Compensation Fund," was applicable to a number of collieries in the district, including the defendants' colliery, and rule 3, which was headed "Objects and purposes," was as follows: "The objects of this society are the raising of funds by certain specified contributions from the employers and workmen of the collieries and ironstone mines of the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire mining district (see rule 33) to make provision in cases of fatal and non-fatal accidents, as follows:—(a) A sum at the death of any member; (b) a weekly allowance to the widows and children of married members whose death was the result of an accident; (c) a weekly allowance to the dependants of members over sixteen years of age whose death is the result of an accident, such dependants being members of a workman's family as specified in the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846; (d) a weekly allowance to members who suffer non-fatal accidents. The society is formed under the powers given by section 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the contributions made by the employers to this society are to be in lieu of and to exempt them from any further claims which otherwise the members of this society may be entitled to prosecute as the result of accidents occurring during their employment."

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

W. Shakespeare (A. Powell, K.C., with him), for the defendants.—A workman can only make a claim either under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, or independently of it. The scheme, by section 3, sub-section 1, of the Act, is a scheme of compensation, benefit, or insurance for the workman, if and when he would otherwise become entitled to compensation under the Act, and by the agreement with the workman the provisions of the scheme have been substituted for the provisions of the Act. The scheme derives its force from the Act, or has a close connection with it, and therefore compensation under the scheme is compensation under the Act within section 1, sub-section 2 (b), of the Act. That being so, the employers cannot also be liable independently of the Act. They are only liable, by section 3, sub-section 1, in accordance with the scheme. The decision in Edwards v. Godfrey, 47 W. R. 551, [1899] 2 Q. B. 333, shows that a workman cannot, except by adopting the procedure specified in section 1, sub-section 4, claim to recover compensation under the Act and independently of it. [MATHEW, L.J., referred to Beckley v. Scott & Co., [1902] 2 I. R. 504.] Secondly, apart from the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, no one can be called upon to pay twice for the same wrong. A workman cannot, after having made a contract with his employers for a scheme of compensation for injuries by accident, and having received compensation under the scheme, bring an action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, or at common law. Rule 3 of the scheme is a contract not to sue the employers. There is no statutory prohibition against contracting out of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880: Griffiths v. Earl of Dudley, 30 W. R. 797, 9 Q. B. D. 357. The defendants are therefore not liable.

James Wilson, for the plaintiff.—The scheme provides for compensation which under the Act of 1897 is to be in lieu of compensation under the Act. The provisions of the scheme are for that purpose only "substituted for the provisions of this Act," within section 3, sub-section 1. The scheme leaves untouched the workman's remedies independently of the Act. No doubt the workman or his dependants cannot claim compensation both under the scheme and under the Act of 1897. At the same time taking compensation under the scheme is not made by the Act a bar to bringing an action at common law or under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. If the Act had intended to deprive the workman of his other remedies it would have said so in clear terms. Rule 3 of the scheme has not the effect of contracting out of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

Shakespeare replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court overruling the decision of Judge Whitehorne at the Birmingham County Court. The case is of importance, because it involves a point which, we have been told, is common to many other large collieries in the district.

A workman in the defendants' employment met with his death by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. His widow brought an action in the county court under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. At the hearing it was proved that there was a duly certified scheme within section 3, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in operation at the defendants' colliery, which prescribed certain compensation in all cases of accident arising out of the employment, including accidents causing death. The point was taken that the existence of the scheme was an answer to the action. The county court judge arrived at certain findings of fact, and he held that as the workman had agreed to the scheme, and as the widow had received compensation under the scheme, she was not entitled to bring an action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. The section upon which the decision of the Divisional Court turned was section 1, sub-section 2 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. That enactment is an expression by the Legislature that the remedies open to the workman—namely, his remedy at common law, his remedy under the Employers' Liability Act 1880, and his remedy under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—are not concurrent, but separate, remedies, as to which the workman must exercise his option, and the exercise of the option is conclusive. Effect was given to that view of the section in Edwards v. Godfrey, the headnote of which is as follows: "Where a workman, who has been injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, brings an unsuccessful action to recover damages against his employer, and is desirous of having compensation for his injury assessed under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, he must follow the procedure prescribed by section 1, sub-section 4, of that Act, and must apply then and there to the judge trying the action for an assessment of compensation; he cannot at a subsequent date initiate independent proceedings against his employers by a request for arbitration under that Act." A. L. Smith, L.J., who delivered the leading judgment, said: "Our decision must depend upon the true construction of sub-sections 1, 2 (b), and 4 of section 1, and some light is thrown upon them by clause 14 of Schedule I. As I read section 1, sub-section 2 (b), it gives to the workman, in cases where he would previously have had a right of action, an option, which he may exercise as he likes, of bringing an action at common law, or of resorting to the procedure for the assessment of compensation given by the Act itself; this seems to me to be the clear meaning of the sub-section. The respondent has availed himself of the right given him by that sub-section; he has exercised his option in favour of bringing a common law action, which has failed. Having been defeated in this action, there would, but for the provisions of section 1, sub-section 4, have been an end of any claim by the respondent against the appellant in respect of the injury. That sub-section, however, is in favour of the workman, and gives him a very great advantage where he has exercised his option and finds too late that he has exercised it in the wrong way; it gives him a locus penitentiæ, and enables the county court judge before whom the action is tried, if applied to by the plaintiff at the time, to assess compensation under the Act. That is a clear benefit to the workman, and while giving it to him the sub-section also confers a benefit upon the employer by giving the county court judge power to deduct from the compensation which he awards all the costs caused by bringing the action instead of taking proceedings under the Act; that is a fair enactment, giving something to master and man alike." That is a decision that the two proceedings are not consistent; that in one sense they are inconsistent; and that there must be an election which proceeding to adopt, the workman not being at liberty to pursue the two remedies. I now come to the provisions as to contracting out contained in section 3, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1897. That section allows a scheme of compensation to be agreed upon between the employer and his workmen, and it provides that the scheme must fulfil certain conditions before it can be certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies. The scheme here has been certified by the registrar, and the county court judge has found that the contract with the workman adopting the scheme is a valid and binding contract. The result is that in the case of a workman who agrees to the scheme, as the workman in the present case did, the provisions of the scheme are substituted for the provisions of the Act. If the workman had taken his remedy under the Act he could not then have taken proceedings under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. But it is said that the plaintiff here did not take proceedings under the Act, but under the scheme. The answer to that is that the scheme, when a valid one, is substituted for the Act. Is there any difference in the position of a workman because he has taken that which is substituted for the rights given by the Act instead of those rights themselves? In my opinion he is in precisely the same position in both cases. The Divisional Court decided the case upon a different ground. They decided the case upon section 1, sub-section 2 (b), of the Act, which was mainly relied upon before them, the last clause of which provides that "the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this Act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this Act, except in case of such personal negligence or wilful act as aforesaid." The Divisional Court said that the action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, was a proceeding independent of the Act of 1897, and that that proceeding would be barred by previous proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; but that under that section proceedings under a scheme were not proceedings under the Act. Up to that point I do not know that I am prepared to differ from the Divisional Court. But there is the additional point that, though compensation under the scheme is not compensation under the Act, acceptance of compensation under the scheme does undoubtedly bar any proceedings being taken under the Act, because the scheme by section 3, sub-section 1, is substituted for the provisions of the Act, and a workman who has taken the benefits under the scheme is in the same position as if he had taken compensation under the Act. By the workman's assent to the scheme, and by the receipt of compensation under it, he is put in the same position as if he had sought for and received compensation under the Act. The widow of the workman is in no better condition than the workman. In my opinion the judgment of the learned county court judge was right, and must be restored, and the decision of the Divisional Court must be reversed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Where under section 3, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, one finds a scheme certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and one also finds a contract made between the workman and the employer such as is referred to in that sub-section, then in my opinion the workman and those claiming through him, who come under the provisions of the scheme, and are bound by the contract to accept the provisions of the scheme as substituted for the provisions of the Act, are in the same position as if he or those claiming through him had availed himself or themselves of the provisions of the Act by claiming compensation under it, in which case neither he nor they can subsequently take advantage of any other remedies either at common law or under other Acts. I think that this appears from those parts of the Act which have been referred to by the Master of the Rolls, and particularly from the words of section 3, sub-section 1, "the provisions of the scheme shall be substituted for the provisions of the Act, and thereupon the employer shall be liable only in accordance with the scheme." In the present case there is a scheme certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and there is a contract between the employers and the workman which contains this provision in rule 3: "The society is formed under the powers given by section 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the contributions made by the employers to this society are to be in lieu of and to exempt them from any further claims which otherwise the members of this society may be entitled to prosecute as the result of accidents occuring during their employment." The employers contributed to the funds of the society and the workman was a member of the society, and so the clause applies. The county court judge has found—and his finding is binding upon us and final—that the workman accepted the scheme willingly and under no compulsion whatever, and with full knowledge of its terms, in substitution for and in place of the benefits which he might claim under the Act, and that this was a legal and effectual contract. That being so, I think, upon the true construction of this contract, that the words at the end of rule 3, which exempts the employers from any further claims which otherwise the members of the society may be entitled to prosecute as the result of accidents, cannot properly be cut down, and they in effect carry out the provisions of section 3, sub-section 1, of the Act, and are valid and binding. The wording of rule 3 is clear. It follows that, if those words have to receive their ordinary meaning and cannot be cut down, those who come under the scheme are debarred from bringing an action at common law or under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, the contract exempting the employers from any further claim. The scheme, therefore, is an absolute bar to an action. As the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, this point was not really brought to the attention of the Divisional Court, and consequently was not dealt with by that court in their judgment. The appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section

3, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, specifies the terms and conditions under which a workman can agree to contract himself out of the Act. In the present case the workman elected to take compensation under the scheme, and the exercise of that option is final under section 1, sub-section 2 (b) of the Act. If a workman, who has not agreed to a scheme, elects to bring an action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and he fails in that action, section 1, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1897, entitles him to ask the court which tries the action, to assess compensation under the Act of 1897. In Edwards v. Godfrey it was decided that, if the plaintiff does not follow the procedure prescribed by that sub-section, he cannot subsequently take proceedings to recover compensation under the Act of 1897. It seems to me to be impossible to give effect to the decision in Edwards v. Godfrey without holding that the option is limited as I have said. The workman here was bound by the scheme. I should like to say, with reference to the case of Beckley v. Scott & Co., in the Court of Appeal in Ireland, that I am much struck by the cogent reasoning of Holmes, L.J., in that case.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, A. H. Arnould, for E. J. Stanbury-Eardley, Birmingham.

Solicitors for the defendants, Timbrell & Deighton, for W. Shakespeare & Co., Birmingham.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 24.

KAUFMAN v. GERSON. (a)

Conflict of laws—Contract made and to be performed abroad—Contract obtained by moral coercion—Agreement to stifle prosecution—Validity according to law of foreign country—Enforcement in England.

The defendant's husband having misappropriated money which had been entrusted to him by the plaintiff in France for a specific purpose, the parties being all domiciled in France, the plaintiff induced the defendant, by threats to prosecute her husband and thus to dishonour her name and that of her children, to sign an agreement to pay the money by instalments out of her own property. The agreement was made in France, and was intended to be performed there, and, according to the evidence, was valid according to the law of France. The defendant paid some of the instalments due under the agreement, and having come to reside in England an action was brought against her in England to recover further instalments under the agreement.

Held, that, as the agreement was obtained from the defendant by moral coercion, it was not enforceable in England, even though it might be valid according to the law of France.

Judgment of Wright, J. (51 W. R. 683, [1903] 2 K. B. 114), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of the action without a jury (reported in 51 W. R. 683, [1903] 2 K. B. 114).

The action was brought to recover a sum of £152, the balance of £654, from Augusta Gerson under a written guarantee whereby she guaranteed the payment of the £654 due from her husband, Emile Gerson, to the plaintiff.

The facts were, shortly, as follows, as found by the learned judge: The plaintiff, Kaufman, in France placed in the hands of Gerson, as a friend whom he wished to assist, a sum of money to be used in buying skins to be dressed and sold for their joint benefit. Gerson appropriated part of the money to his own use instead of applying it in buying skins. His conduct was criminal in France, and a prosecution was threatened. In order to avoid a prosecution and protect the good name of Gerson's children, the defendant under the influence of Kaufman's threat to prosecute her husband and, as the Court of Appeal found, to dishonour her name and her children's names, and at his instance, agreed in writing to make good by instalments out of her own property the amount of the defalcation on the express terms that there should be no prosecution on the part of Kaufman. This agreement was made in France, and it was intended by the parties to be governed by the French law and to be wholly performed in France. The defendant was English by birth, her husband a German by birth; both were at the time of the agreement domiciled in France. According to the uncontradicted evidence of the only witness called as an expert in French law, and to some authorities which he cited, the agreement was not invalidated in France either on the ground of the compromise of a criminal charge or on the ground of oppression or undue influence, or on the ground of want or illegality of consideration. The defendant paid some instalments, and being now resident in England and having property here, this action was brought against her to recover instalments due and payable under the agreement. It was contended on her behalf that the consideration for the agreement was, according to English law, illegal and contrary to public policy, and that the agreement was obtained by means of undue influence and threats, and therefore ought not to be enforced in the English courts.

Wright, J., held that the contract being valid according to the law of the country where it was made and intended to be performed, though invalid in England, was enforceable here the undue influence or duress under which the contract was obtained not being such as would avoid the contract under any but unreasonable and uncivilized institutions of law. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Montague Shearman, K.C., and Eustace Hills, for the defendant.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Israel Davis, for the plaintiff.

COLLINS, M.R.—This in appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., and it raises an important question. The appellant, who is the wife of a man named Gerson, was induced by threats of a criminal prosecution in France against her husband to give an undertaking to the plaintiff to pay him a sum of money. The money was to be paid over a series of years, and a balance remains unpaid. The plaintiff and the defendant both being now in England, the plaintiff sues the defendant for the balance. Two points are raised. First, that the agreement is bad on the ground that it is an agreement to stifle a criminal prosecution. Secondly, that the agreement is bad on the ground that it was obtained by duress or undue pressure. The learned judge, after having heard the evidence of a French avocat, came to the conclusion, on the first point, that there is nothing wrong according to French law in an agreement for value to stifle a prosecution; and he held that, as the contract was made in France by persons who were domiciled there and was intended to be performed there, the defence that the contract was bad on the ground that it was an agreement to stifle a prosecution was not one upon which an English court would stay its hand. The second point is that the circumstances here were such that the contract was obtained by coercion, and is therefore one which the English courts would not enforce. That involves a question of fact—namely, whether the defendant has established that the contract was obtained by coercion. The learned judge seems to me to have so found. He said: "Gerson appropriated part of the money to his own use instead of applying it in buying skins. His conduct was criminal in France, and a prosecution was threatened. In order to avoid a prosecution and to protect the good name of Gerson's children, his wife, the present defendant, under the influence of Kaufman's threat and at his instance, agreed in writing to make good by instalments out of her own property the amount of the defalcation, on the express terms that there should be no prosecution on the part of Kaufman." Upon looking at the wife's evidence it seems clear that she signed the guarantee under threat of her husband's prosecution, and of the dishonour of her name and her children's names. Two answers are given to that. It is said in the first place that the lady and her husband were married in France without a settlement, but with community of goods under the French code, and that the wife was civilly liable with her husband for his debts. Even, however, if that were so, it is clear that in this case the plaintiff was not content with any such remedy as that, but wanted something more, and he got it by the strongest possible moral pressure under a threat to dishonour her name and her children's names. Yielding to that threat, the wife was constrained by it to sign the guarantee, and she paid sums of money under it from time to time under continual threats to prosecute her husband. It was not until she was driven by these civil proceedings in England that she set up the defence and refused to make any further payments.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The real question is whether the agreement thus obtained can be enforced in this country. I will not deal with the first point stated above—namely, that a contract to interfere with the course of justice cannot be enforced in this country. The law of France is said to differ from the law of England upon that point, and I do not say that such a contract, valid in that country, might not be enforced here. I am not prepared to give any final opinion upon that point. I am, however, not prepared to say that such a contract might not be enforced in this country. I propose to decide this case upon the second point. It is said that by the law of France an agreement brought about by moral pressure or coercion can be enforced in that country. The learned judge seems to take that view. He seems to have thought that it was coercion according to the law of England, but that it was not coercion according to the law of France, and that, therefore, the agreement was enforceable here. The learned judge said: "The second ground on which the contract in the present case is impeached is that it was obtained by the undue influence or duress of a threat to prosecute the husband for crime. If this objection is to be regarded as based on considerations of public policy, the same answer applies as in the case of the first objection. It seems, however, to be more in the nature of an objection to the proof of consent of the defendant to the contract, a consent induced by duress or undue influence being by English law treated as no consent. If this be the correct view, it would seem that the law of the country in which the contract is made and is to be performed and in which the parties are domiciled ought to prevail, unless there is such duress as must be considered to avoid the contract under any but unreasonable and uncivilized institutions of law—a description which would be applicable to such a case as that of consent obtained—e.g., by physical torture or by the use of drugs, but which cannot properly be applied to this case." The whole point is contained in the last few lines. The learned judge admitted that if the contract had been obtained by physical violence, as, for example, by the use of a pistol, it would not have been enforceable here, whatever view courts in other countries might take. If that be so, what does it matter what form the coercion takes? Some persons are more easily coerced by moral than by physical threats. Why is it not coercion if the threat is to dishonour the wife and her children by prosecuting her husband? It is said that the case must come within some principle universally recognized in all civilized countries under which the courts of those countries will refuse to enforce such a contract, and that, unless that be so, the English courts are not entitled to refuse to enforce the contract which is valid and enforceable in the country where it was made. The authorities, however, are opposed to that view. Mr. Lush cited two passages from Story on Conflict of Laws. Story says, in section 258, that contracts which are founded in moral turpitude and which are inconsistent with good order and the solid interests of society, even though they might be held valid in the country where they are made, would be held void elsewhere, or at least ought to be, if the dictates of Christian morality, or even of natural justice, are allowed to have their due force and influence in the administration of international jurisprudence. The principle of the English courts is that persons asking for their assistance must come with clean hands. If a suitor is obliged to aver something which is contrary to public morality and which would debar him from obtaining relief if the contract was made here, then he is debarred from suing here, though he might not be debarred from suing in the foreign country where the contract was made; and the fact that that other country allows him to sue cannot control the action of the English courts. In Westlake on Private International Law (3rd ed.), s. 215, it is said: "Where a contract conflicts with what are deemed in England to be essential public or moral interests, it cannot be enforced here, notwithstanding that it may have been valid by its proper law. The plaintiff in such a case encounters that reservation in favour of any stringent domestic policy, with which alone any maxims for giving effect to foreign laws can be received. . . . The difficulty in every particular instance cannot be with regard to the principle, but merely whether the public or moral interests concerned are essential enough to call it into operation; and where a breach of English law is not contemplated this is necessarily a question on which there is room for much difference of opinion among judges." The question is whether the contract obtained by such moral pressure is one which the courts here will enforce. Whether a foreign court would enforce it or not, the principle applicable is one which ought to exist universally, and an English court will not violate its own principle by giving effect to a contract brought about by moral coercion. Our decision is not contrary to any authority, and is consistent with the weighty dicta of Turner, L.J., in Hope v. Hope, 8 De G. M. & G. 731, with which Knight-Bruce, L.J., agreed. In Rousillon v. Rousillon, 28 W. R. 623, 14 Ch. D. 351, Fry, J., said very much the same. Upon this broad general principle the defendant is entitled to the protection afforded by the English courts in refusing to give effect to a contract which ought never to have been made. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The principle of law is succinctly and accurately stated by Mr. Westlake in the passage from his book which has been read by the Master of the Rolls. The only difficulty lies in the application of the principle there stated. Shortly, the facts amount to this—that the plaintiff extorted a contract from a wife by threats of criminal proceedings against her husband if she did not comply. Those proceedings were such that if taken they would probably have resulted in the ruin of the husband and the social disgrace of the wife and children. By these means the plaintiff obtained the contract he is now seeking to enforce. That being so, in my opinion the principle stated in Mr. Westlake's book applies. To enforce a contract made under such circumstances would be for the court to do something which would conflict with the essential moral interests concerned. The court ought not to, and cannot, be asked by the plaintiff to assist him in enforcing a contract so arrived at. A suggestion was made that the defendant had affirmed the contract after the improper pressure and its effects had been removed. As to that I will only say that it was neither pleaded nor proved.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The policy of the English courts in cases like the present is that a person who has obtained an agreement by means which are unfair or unjust cannot be permitted to arm himself with rights under it. What were the means used by the plaintiff to obtain this contract? On the evidence it appears that there was a form of moral torture—nothing less—applied to secure it. It would be a violation of essential moral principles if the court were to allow their powers to be used to enforce a contract of that kind. I agree that there is no evidence of any ratification of the contract by the defendant.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Leggatt, Rubinstein, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, Dixon, Weld, & Dixons.

In Lunacy.
(Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Jan. 25, 26.

In re GIST (A PERSON OF UNSOUND MIND). (a.)

Lunatic—Real estate—Permanent improvements—Application that sums so expended may be a charge on such real estate for the benefit of persons entitled to personally—Nature of improvements—Administration in lunacy—Jurisdiction—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 118.

Under section 118 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the court has discretion to consider not only the benefit of the lunatic personally, but also the question of what is fair as between his real and personal property; and the court has jurisdiction under that section to order that money already expended under a previous order in permanent improvements should be charged upon the real estate improved. Repairs incidental to the ordinary course of management would not come within the category of permanent improvements, and therefore ought not to be made a charge upon the real estate.

Attorney-General v. Marquis of Ailesbury, 36 W. R. 737, 12 A. C. 672, discussed.

This was an appeal from an order of a master in lunacy.

The appellant was the heir-at-law of the lunatic, who was unmarried and was seised as tenant in tail in possession of considerable real estate in the Midlands; and the appeal was against an order of the master, dated the 8th of December, 1903, which in substance directed that the amount expended upon what were said to be permanent improvements of the lunatic's real estate, which was being administered in lunacy, and a moiety of the costs and expenses incurred in the matter might be declared a charge upon such realty for the benefit of the persons entitled under the statutes of distribution to his personal estate, and that a mortgage of the real estate to secure the amount of the charge to the lunatic's personal estate should be made to trustees.

As long ago as 1877 an order had been made by Baggallay, L.J., directing that the sums of money necessary for the expenses and permanent improvement of the estates should be a charge on those estates, and could be raised by mortgage (In re Gist, 5 Ch. D. 881, 25 W. R. Dig. 151), and similar orders were made in 1886 and 1888. By an order, dated the 14th of March, 1894, it was, amongst other things, ordered that J. H. Belfrage, the then committee of the estate of the lunatic, should be at liberty to make certain improvements therein mentioned, such as to cut and sell timber of the estimated value of from £700 to £800 upon the estate, and also to execute certain permanent improvements such as repairs to the farmhouses and buildings specified in his affidavit, "and to expend thereon so much as shall be necessary of the proceeds of the said sale of timber."

By another order dated the 12th of May, 1898, the committee was again authorized to expend a sum of money in substantially repairing and rebuilding some cattle sheds on part of the lunatic's estate, and to cut some more timber, the repairs to be paid for out of the proceeds of the sale of timber.

Also by another order of the 1st of August, 1900, it was amongst other things ordered that E. G. Righton, who had been appointed committee of the estate in the place of J. H. Belfrage, deceased, as such committee as aforesaid should be at liberty to expend a sum not exceeding £400 upon certain repairs and improvements referred to in an affidavit, and which included the felling of timber, sundry repairs, and laying pipes for the water supply and sinking wells.

On the 9th of July, 1901, directions were given to Righton authorizing the expenditure of a further sum for certain improvements and repairs upon the estate, such as new roofs to barns. The costs of the improvements under the various orders after being taxed were directed to be paid out of any moneys in the hands of the committee of the estate available for the purpose. These sums were expended in addition to the ordinary repairs and maintenance of the estate, and the expenses amounted to about £3,010 18s. 10d., and were, as a matter of fact, paid out of the personal estate of the lunatic for permanent additions and improvements of the freehold estates, of which the lunatic was, as stated above, tenant in tail in possession, and also a moiety of the costs. All the above-mentioned orders were made in the presence of the next-of-kin and the heir-at-law. The entailed estates were equal to about three-fourths of the whole of the lunatic's property.

On an application being made to the master that these sums should be a charge on the real estate for the benefit of the next-of-kin, it was strongly contended on behalf of the heir-at-law that the matter was res judicata; the master on the previous occasions having in the exercise of his judicial discretion decided definitely the parts of the estate out of which the improvements and costs to which the application referred were to be paid, and that he was now precluded from rehearing the matter on what was practically an appeal from his previous orders which were final.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The master, purporting to act under section 118 of the Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), pointed out that the principle laid down by Baggallay, L.J., in the order of June, 1877 (referred to above), which related to contemplated expenditure only, was extended in an order of Lindley, L.J., in June, 1886, to amounts that had already been expended, and he accordingly decided to follow those orders and declare that the entailed estates should be charged as desired, the amount to be certified by the master if the parties could not agree, and an order was therefore in substance made accordingly. The majority of the above-mentioned orders had been made before the same master as in the present case.

Section 118, sub-section 1, of the Lunacy Act, 1890, provides as follows: "The judge may order that the whole or any part of any moneys expended or to be expended under his order for the permanent improvement, security, or advantage of the property of the lunatic, or any part thereof, shall, with interest, be a charge upon the improved property or any other property of the lunatic, but so that no right of sale or foreclosure during the lifetime of the lunatic be conferred by the charge."

From this order of the master the heir-at-law appealed.

Younger, K.C., and Wace, for the appellant.—They stated the facts and read the various orders and affidavits. Reference was made to section 27 of the Lunacy Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 65), with respect to the jurisdiction of the masters in lunacy. [They were stopped.]

H. Terrell, K.C., and H. B. Howard, for the next-of-kin.—The court can alter its record: In re Swire, Mellor v. Swire, 33 W. R. 785, 30 Ch. D. 239. The master did in fact vary his order; what better evidence is there when the judge says himself, "I did not intend that order to be as it is." [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to ord. 28, r. 11, "It means the accidental omission of the ministerial officer." His lordship further referred to the judgment in In re St. Nazaire Co. (Limited), 27 W. R. 854, 12 Ch. D. 88.] [STIRLING, L.J., referred to Attorney-General v. The Marquis of Ailesbury, 36 W. R. 737, 12 App. Cas. 672.] No one here will be injured by making this amendment: Hatton v. Harris, [1892] A. C. 547, 41 W. R. Dig. 162. If the appellant says this is irrevocable, the respondents say it is merely a question of administration of the lunatic's estate, and on a question of administration the court has ample jurisdiction, when nobody will be injured. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Has the master in exercising his jurisdiction in lunacy a right of rehearing? I myself do not know. Under the old Court of Chancery before the Judicature Act he had such a right, but I do not myself know whether that Act took it away from the Commissioners in Lunacy or not.]

They also cited the following cases: In re Vavasour, 29 Ch. D. 306, 33 W. R. Dig. 130; Attorney-General v. The Marquis of Ailesbury, 36 W. R. 737, 12 App. Cas. 672; Lawrie v. Lees, 30 W. R. 185, 7 App. Cas. 19, at p. 35; [by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., In re Badcock, 4 My. & Cr. 440]; also section 118 of the Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5).

Younger, K.C., in reply.—If there is anything in section 118, it is that it is a discretionary section; there is no question whatever that the court has authority to make the order. Primâ facie the respondents assume that the permanent repairs and improvements are to be charged on the estate, that is, those amounting to permanent improvements. It is neither the law nor the practice in lunacy. The order of 1877 was made because of the exceptionally large scheme there sanctioned, so the particular method there adopted was employed: Oxenden v. Lord Compton, 2 Ves. jun. 69. Under section 116, sub-section 4, of the Lunacy Act, 1890, it is provided: "The powers of this Act relating to management and administration shall be exerciseable in the discretion of the judge for the maintenance or benefit of the lunatic . . . or where it appears expedient in the due course of management of the property of the lunatic." [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Does not section 118 empower the court either to enable real estate to be charged with these expenses, so that it would not be true to say that the heir at law of the lunatic, without the improvements, would take the real estate? His lordship referred to section 118 in the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 70).] The object of section 118 in the earlier and this Act we are now dealing with was not for the court to create an equity for the next-of-kin, but for the lunatic, and these sections were inserted in these Acts for the court to act as a bonus paterfamilias for the lunatic. Compare section 123 with section 118, the jurisdiction under section 118 is a matter of special application, outside of the ordinary course; in the words of Lord Loughborough, "It is something extraordinary." In the case of the first two orders, the fund out of which these improvements were to be effected was a fund by the sale of timber to be cut down: Ex parte Phillips, 19 Ves. jun. 118; Unless it is established that the improvements are of an extraordinary character, they will not be a charge on the real estate. With regard to the first two orders, the master directed they should be paid out of a particular fund; under the last order, the moneys were paid by the committee out of moneys in his hands. It is only under exceptional circumstances the court will go back, and rehear or alter past orders under section 118.

He cited also Lord Leitrim v. Enery, 6 Ir. Eq. Reps. 357. [By STIRLING, L.J., In re Harris, 49 L. J. Ch. (C. A.) 327.]

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal against an order of the master dated the 8th of December, 1903, and the question which is raised in this case is rather a curious one. A lunatic, Samuel Gist, is tenant for life of some very considerable estates somewhere in the Midlands, and he has been a lunatic for many years. His property has been administered in lunacy, and this is not the first occasion on which questions arising in respect of this administration have been before the court. As long ago as 1877 there was a question before the court, which is reported under the name of In re Gist, 5 Ch. D. 881. I shall have to refer to that decision later on. But the question which is raised at present is this: There have been a series of orders made with regard to the raising and expenditure of money in respect of repairs of one character or another on this estate. It is suggested that some of those repairs which have been done have partaken of the nature of permanent improvements. Now when these orders were made they were such that the money was raised out of the personal property, and it was out of personal property that the expenses were paid. I may as well take for example an order of March, 1894. And that order runs "That the said John Henry Belfrage" [his lordship read the order]. The object of the summons that we have to deal with now, really was to charge this expenditure, or part of it, on the real estate, as having been expenditure in the nature of permanent improvements which as between those entitled in futuro to the real estate and those entitled in futuro as next-of-kin to the personal estate ought, it is said, to be borne by the real estate. We have gone to a certain extent into the authorities before the Lunacy Act of 1853 and the present Act of 1890, with regard to the practice of those who had then to administer the jurisdiction in lunacy, and how far they would in the course of administration of the lunatic's estate have to go into the equities as between the next-of-kin, and the heir-at-law of the lunatic; but I do not think myself that that practice is of very great importance now, because whatever was that practice, it seems to me that it has been modified by the subsequent legislation.

Generally, the Act of 1890 in section 118 reproduces the legislation contained in section 118 of the Act of 1853. I shall assume for the purposes of my judgment here that whatever may have been the practice in lunacy under the jurisdiction in lunacy prior to the passing of the legislation to which I have been referred, yet after the passing of the Act of 1853, it was competent to those administering lunacy jurisdiction to entertain this question as between the next-of-kin and the heir-at-law, and dispose of the same. In my view of the decision of Baggallay, L.J., in In re Gist it is tolerably manifest that he intended to do so. It seems to me that, having certain repairs and permanent improvements to provide for, and some of these repairs and improvements being in respect of this estate of which the lunatic was tenant in fee, and the others being in respect of the estate of which he was tenant in tail in possession, the Lord Justice dealt with the costs of such repairs differently in the case of these two estates. He made an order for charge in respect of the repairs done to the settled estate on that settled estate; but in respect of the costs of repairs done to a farm of which the lunatic was owner in fee the Lord Justice made no such order; and under these circumstances the inference which I draw is that the Lord Justice really did in arriving at that conclusion not only consider the benefit of the lunatic but what was fair as between these two estates. Under these circumstances I assume for the purposes of my judgment, that there is such a power under section 118 of the Act of 1890, and that when the order of 1894 and the other orders were made, it was within the power of the master or judge to take these matters into consideration, and to determine this question, having regard not only to the benefit of the lunatic, but also to what was fair and right as between the expectant owners of the real and personal estate respectively, and I propose to deal with this case upon the admission of the counsel for the appellant that in so far as they are concerned, they are not prepared in any way to suggest that when these orders were made, the master took into consideration the question as between the personal and real estate, independently of the individual benefit of the lunatic. If this is so, and one looks at the orders, and one finds the orders consistent as far as the words are concerned, with the master not having taken this into consideration, then I think we ought to look at section 118 and see what can be properly done in the exercise of the jurisdiction in lunacy in the making of these orders. Notwithstanding the case of In re Swire, which was so much urged upon us, in my opinion, if the orders had made it clear that this question was really dealt with by the master at the time of making the orders, he would have had no jurisdiction which he could now properly exercise under section 118. I think that when once the jurisdiction given by that section has been exercised by the master or the judge—and that the fact that they exercised jurisdiction was made manifest upon the order—the jurisdiction could not be exercised a second time. But now I am assuming for this purpose that there is nothing in these orders which shows that the court did have this question before it, or that the master did then have this question before him. On that view, if one turns to section 118, it reads: [His lordship read it.] It seems to me that the construction of this section is that pointed out by Stirling, L.J., in the course of the argument, and I think the master, in the absence of any order already made by him in the exercise of this jurisdiction, would have the power to exercise it subsequently by making an order in respect of moneys already expended. In the first place I agree with the observation of Lord St. Leonards in Lord Leitrim v. Enery. I think this jurisdiction is one that should not be exercised after a considerable lapse of time. It seems to me that it is a jurisdiction the exercise of which ought to be asked for promptly, and that in this case the next-of-kin having chosen, ever since the dates of these respective orders to stand by and acquiesce in an order which primâ facie threw the incidence of these costs on the personal estate, ought not to come now and ask us to alter the incidence of these costs and expenses. If the lunatic here had died very shortly before this last order had been made, I very much doubt whether our jurisdiction would have continued to make an order under that jurisdiction. Be that as it may, in my judgment these persons have come forward too late to make this application, but I should be sorry to decide this case only upon that ground, that the application was made too late. But it is not necessary to rely upon that narrow ground. We have before us the affidavits and the orders, and we know what is the nature of the repairs and works which were done under these various orders, and it is common ground that the great bulk of this work was work which had properly been paid for out of the personal estate; but it is suggested with regard to one or two of the items, which came to a very small proportion of the total sum expended, that they were in the nature of permanent improvements which the real estate ought to bear. Now I take the strongest of all these instances, the case of a mill-house or something which was converted into cottage. It is said that that is like the purchase of new estates mentioned in In re Badesch, 4 M. & C. 440. I do not agree. It seems to me that you ought in dealing with these matters to take into consideration the magnitude of the estate and the nature of the estate. It may be very well the case that in the ordinary management of a large agricultural estate like this it was necessary in the ordinary course of management to expend such money as each new tenant may ask for, as a condition of paying the rent. One knows that in truth and in fact the way in which this alteration from a mill-house to cottages came about was this—that some old tenancy had expired, and the person who ultimately became the new tenant made it a condition of the new tenancy that he should have his farm so modified. It seems to me that such expenditure is in the ordinary course of management of this estate. The very instance which I have just taken seems to me to go very strongly to show how really unfortunate it would be to allow an order of this sort to be made after the lapse of such a great time from the original orders. One is not in a position now to ascertain all the facts about this expenditure. Amongst the things that one observes is this—that the master had before him the fact that of the moneys to be provided for this expenditure, a considerable part came from the cutting of timber on the estate. The master might very well have thought that under these circumstances, in the absence of any objection, it was a reasonable order to make, that this expenditure should be provided for as it was. Be that as it may, I do not think that, having regard to the small proportion of this expenditure, that it can be even suggested that it should be thrown on the real estate, and that after this lapse of time we ought to allow such an order to stand. It seems to me, therefore, that this appeal ought to be allowed; and, to put it on two short grounds, first, because the order appealed from is not an order which ought to be made after this lapse of time; and, secondly, because, even giving the go-by to lapse of time, I am of opinion that, looking to the nature of these repairs, the order of the master for the immediate payment of this expenditure and of these costs out of the personal estate would be a perfectly reasonable and proper order, if this matter now came before us for the first time. With regard to the costs, in my judgment, having regard to the expenditure for the repairs, it is perfectly impossible that the incidence of these costs should be dealt with or altered at all, or that it should be dealt with in a different way simply by saying that these repairs relate partly to real and partly to personal estate. The appeal must be allowed and the order of the master discharged.

STIRLING, L.J.—I also think the appeal ought to be allowed. The order which was made by the master gives the lunatic a charge upon certain estates of which he is tenant in tail for sums which under four orders have been expended in permanent improvements of that estate. Now, the principles on which the court acts with reference to these matters are very clearly set out in Attorney-General v. Marquis of Ailesbury, 36 W. R. 737, 12 A. C. 672, at p. 688, by Lord Macnaghten, and he cites the following passage from Lord Loughborough: [His lordship read the passage, and continued:] The rule there laid down is that it is the duty of the court, so far as possible, not to interfere with the administration of a lunatic's property, and the illustrations I have given of Lord Loughborough are cases where property is to be bought or sold. The application of these cases is limited to cases of purchase and sale. In In re Harris it is said that where it was absolutely necessary to expend money in re-building the court would order that the sum expended should be taken as charged on the lunatic's real estate. And in In re Badcock, Cottenham, L.J., who declined to hear objections on the part of the next-of-kin, said that if money were laid out in the purchase of land, or what would amount to the same thing, in building a farmhouse, it would be right that the sum so laid out should retain its character of personalty. Now it is sought on behalf of the next-of-kin of the lunatic to bring the present case within those decisions to which I have last referred, and that one ought to say there has been expenditure of an extraordinary kind made which would give rise to a right to say that an order might be made under section 118, for a charge upon the settled estate, for the amount of expenditure. Now, it is to be observed that all these orders were made both in the presence of the heir-at-law and the next-of-kin. They had therefore an opportunity of pointing out to the master that the expenditure was an extraordinary one, and following upon it to ask him to exercise this jurisdiction. That could be done by the insertion of a few words within the order authorizing a payment to be made, or by a declaration that the order was made without prejudice as to how the expenditure was ultimately to be borne. Nothing of that kind was intended in the order. That being so, it seems to me that the burden lies on the present applicants to make out that extraordinary expenditure has taken place. Now it seems to me that the evidence in support of that is of a very shadowy description. The greater part of the expenditure sanctioned by these orders was for repairs of an ordinary character. In the first order, which is that of 1894, the sum expended in alterations is £600, and of that, the item which was relied on was one of £150 for the conversion of a mill-house into cottages, and which is described in the affidavit. ["It was stipulated as one of the terms," his lordship read.] Now that is all that is said in the matter, and it is said very fairly that the master might have treated it as an ordinary case, and one not calling for the exercise of any discretion on his part. Upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that the applicants have not made out that which it was necessary for them to make out. That being so, it seems to me the application fails. If it were proved that the court had not exercised a jurisdiction which is undoubtedly vested in it in a proper case, it would be open to the court, in my judgment, to make an order under section 118. But if the jurisdiction is once exercised, and the court has decided that the powers vested in it for the benefit of the lunatic ought not to be exercised, then the court cannot go back upon its own order and make such an order as is asked for by this summons.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question before us is not one of amending the old orders. No such question as that ought to be listened to for a moment. Section 118 seems to give us jurisdiction to give a charge on the real estate of the lunatic unless the judge or master making these former orders had section 118 in his mind. I am not satisfied that any one of the four orders is of such a nature as to prevent us from now exercising the jurisdiction under section 118. I do not take the narrow view of section 118 taken by counsel for the appellant. Any such contention seems to me to be negatived by Baggallay, L.J., in In re Gist. There are, however, two grounds which prevent our exercise of the jurisdiction. The first is delay. I do not, however, attach much importance to that. But the other consideration which influences my mind in exercising this jurisdiction under section 118 is really this—that regard must be had to the nature of the estate in exercising the jurisdiction under section 118. It is an estate the rental of which was £5,000 a year, and it is now reduced to £3,500. In approaching a question of this sort regard should be had to the fact that it is almost impossible to draw a line between repairs and permanent improvements, and we are asked to say that certain items on the border-line are to be regarded as improvements. Now, there are three items—one that referred to the mill-house converted into a cottage; the second was a new iron to the well in place of a wooden wheel; and the third was a new roof to an old barn. Not one single item was of such a nature that the master could not have said, under section 118, "This is not a charge in lunacy." It is generally a good rule that masters should, in making such orders, either take into consideration section 118, and express that in the orders drawn up, or add that the order is without prejudice to any question as to how the expenses should be borne ultimately. If neither course is adopted I think a very clear and strong case ought to be made out. Costs to be costs in lunacy.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Routh, Stacey, & Castle, for Stapleton & Son, Stamford.

Solicitors for the respondents, Bloxam, Ellison, & Co., for Bryan & Helps, Gloucester.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Kekewich, J. } Feb. 3.

In re SPARK'S TRUST.
MASSEY v. SPARK. (a.)

Deed — Construction — Settlement — Separation deed — Trust for wife and children on separation—Resumption of cohabitation—Continuing validity.

A deed made in contemplation of the separation of a husband and wife which assigns property of the husband to a trustee upon trusts for the benefit of the wife and children is a good voluntary settlement, and though caused by the contemplated separation, is not put an end to by the reconciliation and subsequent resumption of cohabitation of the husband and wife.

Adjourned summons.

On the 31st of March, 1889, John Ernest Hunt Spark, was married, and on the 25th of February, 1893, the three infant defendants were the issue of the marriage, and on that date he was entitled under the will of his grandmother, Hannah Sarah Bewsher, to an undivided moiety of her residuary estate.

Differences having arisen between Spark and his wife, it was decided that they should separate and live apart from one another, and accordingly on the 25th of February, 1893, articles of agreement between Spark of the first part, his wife of the second part, and the plaintiff as trustee of third part were entered into, in which, after reciting that the said J. E. H. Spark had been guilty of misconduct towards his wife, and in order to prevent proceedings being taken against him by her, and as a condition of mutual separation which had been agreed upon between them, and also in consideration of the wife taking the care and custody of the three children of the marriage, the husband had consented to enter into the following agreement, and the said wife the following covenant, namely, "the said J. E. H. Spark doth hereby as beneficial owner assign to the said R. H. Suffield Massey" (the plaintiff) "all his share and interest under the will of his late grandmother, H. S. Bewsher (save the sum of £200 and a sum sufficient to pay the costs of and incidental to this assignment), upon trust to pay the annual interest and proceeds thereof to the said M. E. Spark, his wife, for her life, and from and after her decease to divide the sum equally between such of the said children as shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters marry under that age, and in consideration of such assignment the said M. E. Spark hereby covenants not to molest the said J. E. H. Spark or to compel him to pay directly or indirectly for the maintenance of herself or the said children. And all the said parties hereby mutually agree to execute any further deed that may be necessary to carry out the assignments and covenants herein contained." These articles were duly signed, sealed, and delivered by the parties thereto.

Mr. and Mrs. Spark then separated, Mrs. Spark having the custody of the children. The share of Mr. Spark under his grandmother's will was received by the trustee and invested, and the interest was henceforth paid to the wife.

Toward the end of 1893, however, they became reconciled and resumed cohabitation, and three other children were born to them after they had done so.

In November, 1903, wishing to make provision for all of their children, the husband and wife applied to the plaintiff to treat the agreement of the 25th of February, 1893, as at an end, as the separation therein contemplated was at an end and the parties had become reconciled, and requesting him to transfer the funds and property subject to the agreement to the defendant, J. E. H. Spark, discharged from its operation.

The plaintiff thereupon took out this summons for the direction of the court as to whether the agreement of the 25th of February, 1893, constituted a revocable deed of separation or a voluntary settlement the trusts of which were still subsisting.

H. Greenwood, for the plaintiff trustee.—If this agreement is a separation deed it is put an end to by reconciliation, but if it is a voluntary settlement it is still subsisting and valid, and the resumption of cohabitation by the husband and wife will not affect it: H. v. W., 3 K. & J. 382; Nicol v. Nicol, 34 W. R. 283, 31 Ch. D. 524; Westmeath v. Salisbury, 5 Bli. N. S. 339; Brindley v. Mulloney, 17 W. R. 510, 7 Eq. 343.

Ward Coldridge, for the husband.—This is a separation deed. The only case which suggests that such a deed is a settlement and not a deed of separation is Ruffles v. Alston, 23 W. R. 465, which is distinguishable, as there the property was the wife's. In Westmeath v. Salisbury, the daughter, a beneficiary under the deed, was held not to be bound by evidence to prove cohabitation given when she was absent; if it had been a voluntary settlement evidence of cohabitation would have been immaterial. Consideration is necessary to support the provision for children, and here the provision for children is based on separation. There is nothing to show that this deed varies in any respect from ordinary separation deeds.

Leonard Mossop, for the wife and defendant children.—This is a voluntary settlement. As soon as you have an ultimate trust in favour of children which takes effect after the death of the wife you have a deed which goes beyond the scope of a mere separation deed. In Hulme v. Chitty, 9 Beav. 437, the child born after the reconciliation was held not to be entitled under the deed. In Brindley v. Mulloney no separation took place. Ruffles v. Alston applies; there the deed having provisions for children was held not to be void on reconciliation. The trustee has continued to pay the interest to the wife, and rebuts the evidence that reconciliation is intended to end the deed: Webster v. Webster, 5 W. R. 725, 4 De G. M. & G. 437.

KEKEWICH, J.—This is a point of some interest to persons who have to advise husbands and wives as to arrangements with regard to separation. The point to be decided in this case depends really upon the proper effect to be given to and the proper construction of the agreement of the 25th of February, 1893. It is desirable to look at this agreement for a moment apart from the motive which led to its execution; that motive was no doubt a separation. Now, under this agreement we find that there was an assignment to the trustee by the husband of "all his share and interest under the will of his late grandmother, Hannah Sarah Bewsher, upon trust to pay the annual interest and proceeds thereof to Mary Edith Spark, his wife, for her life, and from and after her decease to divide the same equally between such of the said children as shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughter marry under that age. Now that is a perfectly good voluntary settlement within all the authorities to which reference is always made, such as Kekewich v. Manning, 1 De. G. M. & G. 176, in which a perfect trust is declared. There is a parting with by the husband of his interest under his grandmother's will, which gives the trustee the right to sue for the share and hold it when received upon the trusts contained in the agreement. It is a perfectly voluntary settlement, and if so it can only be worked out after the performance of the trust—that is, the ultimate handing over of the property to those entitled to it. So that if it can be regarded from that point of view, there is no doubt that it is enforceable by the court. It has been argued that this is not the proper view to take of this deed, because it was made in view of a separation. It provides for the wife's maintaining herself and three children, therefore it seems that it is simply as a provision for the wife during the separation; then, the parties having been reconciled, the consideration fails, and there is no reason why the settlement should not be declared void. There are two points of view from which this transaction can be regarded: on the one hand, separation is the paramount cause without which this agreement would never have existed; on the other, though brought into existence by that cause on the occasion of a separation between the husband and wife, it does contain an assignment of the share of the husband under the will upon his wife and children in the way I have mentioned. Which view ought I to hold with regard to this agreement? Can I say that the trustee is safe in departing from the terms of the deed and giving up this property. The judgment of the House of Lords in Westmeath v. Salisbury does not decide this point. The same question did not arise there for decision, and the deed was held to be void on different grounds. The case of Brindley v. Mulloney, before Romilly, M.R., seems to me to be entirely different from this case on account of the ground of the decision there. The deed was similar to the one in this case, and might have been held to have been a separation deed, and there is no doubt that it might have been held to constitute a settlement by the Court of Chancery. But Romilly, M.R., held that the consideration failed. He says: "Separation was the consideration upon which it was based." I do not mean to say that he did not say more than that, but that was the main point of the decision. I must, of course, assume that he was correct in coming to that conclusion. No separation had taken place, and so the consideration failed. Here the consideration has not failed, and I am not asked to set aside the deed on that ground. Romilly, M.R., held that the consideration had failed, and he also held that it was a separation deed. The precise point was before Malins, V.C., in Ruffles v. Alston. There the deed took the form of a voluntary settlement, and as such was within the doctrine of Kekewich v. Manning. Under these circumstances the Vice-Chancellor held it to be more than a separation deed. The case was argued on demurrer to the bill, so as to set aside the settlement on the ground of reconciliation, and the demurrer was overruled on the ground that the child was entitled to maintain a bill for enforcing the settlement. The same principle applies to this deed here. The separation was the cause of it, and it resulted in the settlement of this share. That being so, I cannot see that reconciliation affects the voluntary settlement thereby created, and I declare to that effect. All costs to come out of the fund, those of the plaintiff to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Mossop & Rolfe.

Solicitor for all other parties, J. T. Campion.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Feb. 24, 25; March 26.

KIRKDALE BURIAL BOARD v. LORD MAYOR, &c., OF LIVERPOOL. (a.)

Local government—Transfer of powers of other authorities—County borough—Urban sanitary district—"Urban district"—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), ss. 21, 35, 62.

A county borough, if it be an urban sanitary district under the Public Health Act, 1875, is an "urban district" within section 62 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1894, and its council can exercise the powers of that section. Section 21 of the Local Government Act, 1894, which by the operation of section 35 is inapplicable to a county borough, is not to be read as if it were a definition of "urban district" excluding county boroughs.

This was the trial of an action raising a point of considerable interest in connection with the Local Government Act, 1894—namely, whether the area of a county borough is an "urban district" within the meaning of the Act, and whether its council as a district council is qualified to pass a resolution under section 62 (1) for transferring to itself the powers, duties, property, debts, and liabilities of an authority constituted under any of the adoptive Acts mentioned in section 7 (1), which include the Burial Acts.

The plaintiffs were an authority duly constituted under the Burial Acts, 1852 to 1900, and the area under their control was entirely situated, together with areas under other burial boards, in the county borough of Liverpool, of which the defendants were the urban sanitary authority.

The defendants had long been anxious to become the burial authority for the whole of the county borough, and had on more than one occasion been in communication with the various burial boards on the subject; and they now proposed that a resolution under section 62 (1) should be passed by the city council for transferring to the defendants, acting by such council, the powers, duties, property, debts, and liabilities of the plaintiffs.

To this the plaintiffs objected, and they brought this action asking by their statement of claim for a declaration that the area of the county borough of Liverpool was not an "urban district" within the meaning of the Local Government Act, 1894, or otherwise, and that the said resolution or any resolution to that or a similar effect (if passed) would be ultra vires and void; they also claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from passing any such resolution, and other consequential relief.

Section 62 (1), which gives power to pass such a resolution, commences as follows: "Where there is in any urban district or part of an urban district any authority constituted under any of the adoptive Acts, the council of that district may resolve . . ."

Section 21 (1), which forms part of Part II. of the Act, commences as follows: "Urban sanitary authorities shall be called urban district councils, and their districts shall be called urban districts. . . ."

Section 35, which is also contained in Part II., is as follows: "Save as specially provided by this Act, this part of this Act shall not apply . . . to a county borough."

Eve, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., and R. B. Lawrence, for the plaintiffs.—The corporation propose to take over the duties of these various burial boards, and a scheme will be necessary in order to settle the rights of the several parishes and their contributions to the expenses. The boards will cease to exist, and there will be no authority to represent the parishes. In two of these the parishioners have not provided themselves with burial grounds. The boards think that any scheme ought to precede their extinction. This is not a test case by arrangement, but we are nevertheless supported by other burial boards having the same interests. Nothing in the Act of 1894 constitutes a county borough an "urban district." There is no definition of "urban district" in the Act, except in section 21. If that section could be read into section 62 it would bring what was an urban sanitary authority within the powers of section 62, but directly section 35 is referred to it becomes apparent that this cannot be done in the case of a county borough, since none of the sections in Part II. can apply to a county borough save as specially provided. In support of this view we rely on section 32 in Part II., where certain provisions are made applicable to "a county borough as if it were an urban district," thus showing clearly that it is not so, while the phrase "county boroughs and other urban districts" in section 33 (1) may be explained as an instance of the special provision referred to in section 35. The corporation, therefore, cannot exercise the powers of section 62 (1), and must obtain, under section 10 (1) (b) of the Local Government Act, 1888, a provisional order from the Local Government Board for the transfer which they desire.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They referred also to sections 1, 31, 34, and 100 of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41); sections 7, 16 (1), 20, 23, 26, 36 (2), 67, 68, and 75 of the Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73); and sections 5 and 6 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55).

Vernon Smith, K.C., Alexander Glen, K.C., and J. Rutherford, for the defendants. — In section 53 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1894, there is mention of an "urban district," and the Legislature, when passing the Local Government (Joint Committees) Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 40), had it in view that the term as used in that section included a county borough. Again, section 54 (2) (c) of the Act of 1894, as to extension of areas, refers to section 54 of the Act of 1888, and when we turn to that section we find it includes a "borough," which is obviously inclusive of "county borough." This is equivalent to using the term "county borough" in section 54 (2) (c), and brings it into connection with the phrase "urban district" there employed. If the view taken by the plaintiffs be adopted it would result in this—that whereas section 62 (2) forbids the adoption of adoptive Acts for any part of an urban district without the approval of the council of that district, the council of a county borough, as not being the council of an urban district, would have no such veto. It would be a strained construction of section 21 to read it as if the words "other than a county borough" were included throughout.

They cited Wilson v. Strugnell, 7 Q. B. D. 548, 30 W. R. Dig. 50, and referred to sections 1 (1) and 4 of the Local Government (Transfer of Powers) Act, 1903 (3 Ed. 7, c. 15).

Danckwerts, K.C., in reply, referred to section 22 of the Local Government Act, 1894, and sections 154 and 155 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), and cited Rex v. Amos, 2 B. & A. 533, 541, 542, per Bayley, J.; Mayor, &c., of Reigate v. Hart, 16 W. R. 896, L. R. 3 Q. B. 244; and The King v. Overseers, &c., of Connahs Quay, 49 W. R. 463, [1901] 2 K. B. 174.

Cur. adv. vult.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The question to be determined in this action is whether the area of the county borough of Liverpool is an "urban district" within the meaning of section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1894. If the answer to this question should be in the affirmative, it is not disputed that the defendants, acting by the city council, are entitled to resolve that the powers, duties, property, debts, and liabilities of the plaintiffs, the burial board for the township of Kirkdale, shall be transferred to the defendants acting by the city council, as from a date to be specified in such resolution, and that thereby upon the said date the said powers, duties, property, debts, and liabilities will be transferred accordingly, and that the plaintiff burial board will cease to exist and the defendants will be successors of the plaintiffs.

The definition of "urban district" contained in the Act of 1894 is in section 21. It is the district of an "urban sanitary authority." The defendants are an urban sanitary authority, and therefore if this section were applicable, their district would be an "urban district"; but section 21 is contained in Part II. of the Act, and by section 35 it is enacted that save as specially provided by that Act, that part of that Act shall not apply to a county borough.

It is contended that the effect of section 35 is to exclude a county borough from the definition of "urban district" contained in section 21 except where specially otherwise provided by some other section of the Act, but I only read section 35 as meaning that an "urban district," where mentioned in Part II. of the Act, does not include a county borough, except where expressly so provided. There is no provision that other parts of the Act shall not apply to a county borough save as specially provided, and section 21 cannot, in my opinion, be read as if it was a definition of "urban district" excluding county boroughs.

If section 21 is to be treated as defining "urban district" for all the purposes of the Act, including section 62 (1), then county boroughs are within the definition. If section 21 is excluded by section 35 and is not applicable to section 62 (1) in Part IV., then section 75 (1) meets the case, which provides that expressions used in the Act of 1894 shall, unless the context otherwise requires, have the same meaning as in the Local Government Act, 1888. The expression "urban district" occurs in section 57 (1) (c) of that Act, and, having regard to section 100—interpretation of "district council" (b)—the expression there means the district of an urban sanitary authority within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875. By sections 5 and 6 of that Act, England (except the metropolis) is divided into urban and rural sanitary districts, and urban districts and urban authorities are described, and the county borough of Liverpool is an urban district.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the county borough of Liverpool is an urban district within the meaning of section 62 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1894.

Moreover, a contrary decision would lead to this result—which would certainly be a curious one—that in every urban district other than a county borough, the adoptive Acts cannot be adopted for any part of an urban district without the approval of the council of that district; but in county boroughs, which are probably more populous and important, there is nothing to prevent the various portions of the borough, after the appointed day, adopting adoptive Acts without any consent or approval whatever of the council of the borough.

The expression "urban district" is also used in section 54 in Part IV. of the Act of 1894, and in my opinion the expression is used there as including a county borough. Thus section 54 (1) provides: "Where . . . the area of an urban district is extended, then," &c.; and section 54 (2): "The provision aforesaid shall be made—(c) Where the area of an urban district is extended by an order of the Local Government Board under section 54 . . . of the Local Government Act, 1888."

Now, the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 54 (1) provides (inter alia) for the alteration of the boundary of any county borough by the Local Government Board, and in my opinion the provision made by section 54 of the Act of 1894 in the case of an extension or diminution of the area of an urban district applies where the area of a county borough is altered under section 54 of the Act of 1888.

The plaintiffs placed considerable reliance on the definition of "parochial elector" in section 75 (2) of the Act of 1894. "The expression 'parochial elector,' when used with reference to a parish in an urban district, or in the county of London, or any county borough, means," &c., and it was contended that "urban district" could not include a county borough, as, if it did, it would not have been necessary to add the words "or any county borough," but the answer to this argument is that in this particular instance the context shows that it was not intended to include a county borough in the expression "urban district."

Again, the Local Government (Joint Committees) Act, 1897, is to be construed as one with the Local Government Act, 1894, and it is clear from section 1 (1) of the Act of 1897 that the statute contemplates that one of the councils appointing a joint committee for the purposes of the Burial Acts may be the council of a county borough. But it only has power to do that if it is a district council, and if its district is an "urban district" within the meaning of section 53 of the Act of 1894.

Reading these two statutes together, I am of opinion that the Legislature itself has afforded an exposition of the sense and meaning in which the expression "urban district" is used in the earlier Act: see Battersby v. Kirk, 2 Bing. N. C. 584, at p. 606; Morgan v. London General Omnibus Co., 32 W. R. 416, 12 Q. B. D. 201, at p. 207, and on appeal 32 W. R. 759, 13 Q. B. D. 832.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the claim of the plaintiffs fails. The judgment will be as follows: The court, being of opinion that the area of the county borough of Liverpool is an "urban district" within the meaning of section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1894, dismiss the action with costs.

Solicitors, Sharpe, Parker, & Co., for Cleaver, Holden, & Co., Liverpool; Venn & Co., for E. R Pickmere, Town Clerk, Liverpool.

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) March 10, 11, 14, 21.

GRANGE & Co v. TAYLOR. (a.)

Bill of lading—Construction—Undivided portions of a bulk cargo—Error in apportioning damaged grain—Duty of shipowner—Rights and duties of consignees inter se.

Bills of lading for undivided portions of a bulk cargo contained the following clause: "If the parcel herein signed for constitutes part of a larger bulk shipped without separation into parcels, as per bills of lading, each bill of lading shall bear its due proportion of shortage or damage and or sweepings, if any." Impressed in the margin was the following note: "Part of a parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any." One consignee received a full quantity of sound grain. On the apportionment of the unsound grain the plaintiffs refused to accept more than their proportion of unsound grain, and sued for short delivery.

Held, that the clause and note in the bill of lading did not impose any duty on the shipowner to apportion the grain, and that the error was caused by the consignee's agents.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

The endorsee of two bills of lading claimed for short delivery of a quantity of maize shipped under those bills of lading on board The Palestrina and discharged at the Victoria Docks, and also for breach of contract contained in the bills of lading and for conversion of the plaintiffs' goods.

The facts sufficiently appear in the following considered judgment.

J. A. Hamilton, K C, and Leck, for the plaintiffs.

Carver, K.C., and Adair Roche, for the defendants.

The following cases were cited: Porteus v. Watney, 3 Q. B. D. 534; Petrocochino v. Bott, L R. 9 C. P. 355; Spicer v. Martin, 14 A. C. 12; and Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 15 Q B. D. 261.

London and St. Catherine Dock Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 178) s. 120, was also referred to.

BIGHAM, J.—This is an action by endorsees of bills of lading against shipowner to recover damages for short delivery of a quantity (108 quarters) of maize. The defence is that the maize was delivered to the dock company, and that they were the agents of the plaintiffs to receive it. The defendants' ship, The Palestrina, took on board a large quantity of maize in bulk at Odessa to be carried to London. The shipper asked for and obtained from the defendants several bills of lading, each being for an undivided portion of the bulk. This was done to facilitate the sale of the maize. The bills of lading contained the following clause: "If the parcel herein signed for constitutes part of a larger bulk shipped without separation into parcels, as per bills of lading, each bill of lading shall bear its due proportion of shortage or damage and or sweepings, if any"; and in the margin there was an impressed note—"Part of a parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any." Two of these bills of lading came into the hands of the plaintiffs, who were buyers of the portion of the bulk thereby represented. The bills of lading for the remainder reached the hands of other buyers, among whom was a Mr. Paul. The vessel arrived in London and went to the I jetty of the Victoria Dock, where she began her discharge by means of an elevator which stands on that jetty. The maize was gathered under the open hatchways and then lifted in the elevator over the ship's side and shot into the barges of the bills of lading holders. Mr. Paul came first in time, and therefore first in turn, and received his full bill of lading quantity. Before the discharge to him was completed, but when it was too late to stop it, part of the remaining bulk was found to be heated. This heated grain was put on the quay, and was there apportioned among the different bill of lading holders, 108 quarters being the quantity which ought to have been taken by Mr. Paul as the quantity applicable to his bill of lading. He had, however, already received and taken away his full quantity in sound maize. The result was that at the end of the discharge the plaintiffs found that unless they took the 108 quarters they would be short by that quantity of their share of the bulk. They refused to take the 108 quarters, alleging that if they did so they would be saddled with more than their proper proportion of heated grain, and they then brought this action. The question is whether the shipowners are liable. The answer depends on the nature of the obligations of the shipowner under the bill of lading contract and on the usage or practice ordinarily followed in the discharge of those obligations. The bill of lading, of course, obliges the shipowner to deliver goods corresponding with the description in the document, and it also obliges him to deliver such goods to the proper person to receive them. But the plaintiffs contend that, having regard to the words, "each bill of lading to bear its own proportion of damage," the obligation is not discharged by a mere delivery of the bill of lading quantity, but delivery must in such case be made up by the shipowner of the proper proportions of sound and damaged. It is said that the bill of lading is a contract between the holder and the shipowner and between no other persons, and that, as between those two parties, the words relied upon can have no other meaning than that contended for. I am of opinion that the words put no such burden on the shipowner. It would be very unreasonable if they did. The delivery is made to the barges of the receivers turn and turn about. At first nothing but sound grain may come out of the ship, and it will be impossible to say whether there will be any damaged grain or, if any, how much. Again, the character of the damage may vary very much; some part may be badly damaged and the other part only slightly. How is the shipowner to foresee this, and how, where, and when is he to sort the grain? Skilled men are required for such work; the crew cannot do it. Is the shipowner to find and employ such men? Then, where is the sorting to be done? It cannot be done in the ship. Is the shipowner to hire quay space for the work? And when is it to be done? Until the last parcel of the bulk is out the sorting is impossible. Must the shipowner hold back all delivery until that point in the discharge is reached? I agree with Mr. Hamilton that the mere difficulty or even impossibility of discharging a duty affords no excuse for a breach if in fact the duty has been undertaken; but when I am asked to say that the shipowner has undertaken the difficult duty here contended for I expect to find plain and unambiguous words imposing it. I do not find such words in this case. If the shipowner had given but one bill of lading for the whole parcel his duty would have been completely discharged by delivering the grain with the damaged and sound mixed just as it came to hand out of the ship. Was it intended that his compliance with shipper's request to give several bills of lading should throw upon him the burden of sorting the bulk and dividing the damaged grain in the manner suggested? I cannot think so. Then why are the words introduced, and what is their effect? This bill of lading is headed, "Chamber of Shipping, Black Sea—Berth Contract Bill of Lading, 1902"; and in the top left corner are the words, "As agreed with the London Corn Trade Association and the Chamber of Shipping, 12th March, 1902." Thus the bill of lading appears to be in a form adopted by the members of the Corn Association in this country and shipowners who send their ships to the Black Sea. It is in common use in connection with a very large trade, and is doubtless well known to all people in that trade. Now, the shipment of grain in bags and the stowing of it in the ship's hold in separate parcels are expensive operations which add to the cost of the grain when it arrives in this country without enhancing its value. It is therefore apparently often shipped in bulk, and bills of lading are given for undivided portions of the bulk. This is a great convenience to the merchant, for it enables him to sell the grain in small parcels. The form has been drawn with special reference to this practice, and the clause relied upon has been inserted in consequence of it. Then if the shipment is made under this practice (it is not necessarily so made) the impressed note is put in the margin of each bill of lading to draw attention to the fact—"Part of parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any." The London Corn Trade Association's form of sale contract, which was given in evidence before me, contains a corresponding provision—"Should any of the within-mentioned quantity form part of a larger quantity . . . in bulk, no separation . . . shall be deemed to be necessary. All damages and sweepings . . . shall be shared by the various parcels pro rata," showing that when the grain comes to be sold the sales are made on the footing on which the bills of lading are drawn. When the bill of lading is read by the light of these facts the meaning and object of the clause in question becomes quite plain. It is put there for the purpose of regulating the rights of the holders of the different bills of lading inter se, and is not intended to increase the shipowner's duty at all. But the plaintiffs insist that the contract in the bill of lading does not and is never intended to do more than express the agreement between the shipper and the shipowner; in other words, that it cannot regulate the rights of cargo-owners inter se; and they refer to Porteus v. Watney (3 Q. B. D.) in support of this contention. No doubt the primary object of a bill of lading is to evidence the terms on which the shipper and shipowner have agreed for the carriage and delivery of goods, and Brett, J., at p. 542 of the volume in question, is reported as saying: "The bill of lading claims to be a contract between the shipowner and the person taking the bill of lading. There is no relation whatever between the holders or takers of other bills of lading and any one holder of a bill of lading. They are not co-sureties. When, therefore, it is said we can look at all the bills of lading and then divide the days of demurrage or the lay days between them, we are looking at other bills of lading which cannot be given in evidence." These words must, however, be read with reference to the form of the bill of lading in that case. The form contained no reference whatever to the holders of other bills of lading. The action was by shipowner against bill of lading holder for demurrage. The bill of lading contained the words "on paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." This charter-party gave a lien on all cargo for demurrage at the port of discharge. The defendant had always been ready and willing to take his goods, but the holders of bills of lading for other cargo lying on top had made default in taking their cargo away, so that the defendant's goods could not be discharged. It was held that by the terms of his bill of lading contract the defendant had rendered himself liable for payment of the demurrage, and that he could not escape by saying that the delay was due to the negligence of holders of other bills of lading. Indeed, so much did Brett, L.J., consider the different bills of lading holders strangers to each other that he held that if the man in actual default had paid the shipowner, the defendant could not have relied on the payment by way of defence; an opinion which involved the rather startling conclusion that if there had been goods below belonging to a score of different bills of lading holders, the full amount of the demurrage would have been recoverable from each of them. The Lord Justice at p. 543 uses these words: "I think that if the consignee of a portion of the cargo had a bill of landing in the same words, and had been called upon to pay, and had paid the whole demurrage to the shipowner, the holder of another bill of lading, if used, could not set that up as a defence. That defence would arise in respect of a wholly independent contract between the shipowner and the holder of the other bill of lading. He could not set it up as a defence, because he would have no right to prove that other and wholly independent contract. I accept the proposition that it would be no defence for the owner of the bill of lading to say that the shipowner had been paid the same sum by all other holders of bills of lading for cargo in the ship." But the authority is in truth of no application to the present case. The bill of lading before me appears on its face to be one of a group. The makers and takers of it know it to be one of a group. The same thing is no doubt true in the case of the bills of lading for the remainder of the bulk. The shipowner, not for his own benefit, but merely for the benefit of the various receivers, subscribes to the stipulation as to the division of damaged grain. All the receivers buy their bills of lading with notice, and in my opinion, become bound towards each other by what the shipowner has done for them. Even if it should be true that the intention has not been legally effected, and that the bills of lading holders are not bound inter se, that affords no reason for saying that the words used in the attempt to accomplish the intention should be twisted to a purpose for which they were never used—namely, to impose a heavy obligation on the shipowner. The view which I take of the meaning of the bill of lading contract is borne out by the practice followed in the discharge of grain cargoes at Victoria Docks and at the jetty in question. The practice is for the servants of the dock company to bring the cargo in the ship's hold under the open batchways; for this service the shipowner pays the dock company 4d. a ton. The grain is then lifted by means of an elevator out of the hold and shot from the elevators into the barges of the consignees; for this service the consignees pay the dock company 1s. 9d. per ton. If any of the grain is found to be heated it is discharged on the quay and there sorted by the dock company's servants, the cost being covered by the dock company's charge against the consignees. In this way the dock company act as the agents of the ship to discharge the cargo and as the agents of the consignees to receive it; and the evidence, though in parts conflicting, satisfies me that as a matter of fact the receipt of the grain into the elevator is the receipt by the dock company, as agent for the consignee or bill of lading holder. If this be so, the shipowner has in this case not only discharged the bill of lading quantity, but the plaintiff have also received it, with the result that the claim for short delivery fails. It was, however, contended on the plaintiffs' behalf that, whatever the general practice might be, the grain in this particular instance was not in fact received by them until it was placed in their barges or trucks. It appeared that upon this jetty there were two elevators belonging to different owners. The elevator which was used on this occasion belongs to a firm of Thompson & Co., who use it for the discharge of their own vessels. But sometimes no vessel of their own happens to be alongside, and the elevator is idle. On such occasions Thompson & Co. solicit other shipowners to send their ships to the wharf, so that they may be discharged by their elevator, and they have an arrangement with the dock company by which in such circumstances they do all the work above described for the dock company for an inclusive charge of 1s. 11d. a ton. Thus the dock company get the work for which they charge 2s. 1d. (1s. 9d and 4d.) done for 1s. 11d. This course was followed in the present case. Thompson & Co. were anxious to secure a discharge and delivery by their elevator because, I suppose, they could do the work for less than 1s. 11d. per ton, and so make a profit, and, as they feared that the job might fall into the hands of the owner of the rival elevator, they went to the defendants and induced the defendants to send the ship to the part of the jetty where their elevator stands. It was said by the plaintiffs that the defendants, by allowing the vessel to go under Thompson's elevator in these circumstances, made Thompson & Co. their agents, and that all the work, whether done on the ship or in the elevator or on the quay, was therefore done by the defendants. I do not, however, take this view of the matter. Neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants had anything to do with the arrangement between the dock company and Thompson, and when the time for paying for the work arrived debit notes were sent in by the dock company to the ship and cargo-owners for the 4d. and 1s. 9d., just as though no such arrangement existed. I wish to add that the practice at these docks appears to have been substantially the same for the last thirty years, although, no doubt, elevators have only recently come into use. Dealing with the question in 1874, Brett, J., after stating the practice in relation to the delivery of bales of hides, says: "I am of opinion that the moment the shipowner has cleared the goods from the deck he ceases to be responsible in any way for them; and that, whatever remedy the plaintiffs may have against the dock company or anyone else, they cannot under the circumstances charge the shipowner with the loss of the bale": see Petrocochino v. Bott, L. R. 9 C. P., at p. 361. It is perhaps necessary to mention one other matter. It appeared that when Thompson's men in working out the ship came across the heated grain they notified the circumstance to the dock clerks, and after the apportionment the clerks, in the ordinary course of their duty, entered the 108qrs. in the dock books as belonging to Mr. Paul. The plaintiffs suggested that, even if there was no short delivery, this was a conversion. To this there are two answers. The first is that there was no conversion; the book entry interfered in no way with the plaintiff' rights—the plaintiffs might have taken away the 108qrs. at any moment, and no one would have objected. The second answer is that, even if there was a conversion, it was not by the defendants; they, as I have already said, had finished with the goods when they delivered the grain into the elevator. The fact is that the plaintiffs did not want the 108qrs. They preferred their action for short delivery. If they had taken the 108qrs., as they might have done at any moment if they had wished, they would have been left with an action for breach of the duty to properly sort and apportion—an action which, if brought against the present defendants, would have failed, as this action fails, on the ground that the defendants had entered into no contract to do the work of sorting and apportionment. There must be judgment for the defendants with costs, and for the defendants on the counterclaim for freight.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Lowless & Co.

Solicitor for the defendants, Botterell & Roche.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } Jan. 19, 20, 21; March 7.

In re FITZGERALD.
SURMAN v. FITZGERALD. (a.)

*Conflict of laws—Scotch law—Scotch marriage contract made in Scotland—Lex loci—Intention of parties—Life interest by way of alimentary provision—Inalienable life interest in domiciled Englishman—Fraud upon creditors—Public policy.*

As a general rule the law of the matrimonial domicil is applicable to a contract in consideration of marriage, but this rule yields to the intention of the parties that some other law shall be applied, in which case effect will be given in the courts of the country of the matrimonial domicil to the provisions of the contract in accordance with the foreign law, so long as the provisions are not contrary to public policy.

By a Scotch marriage contract a domiciled Scotchwoman settled property upon trust to pay the income to her intended husband, a domiciled Englishman, for his life, and the contract contained a declaration that all payment to the husband should be "strictly alimentary," and "not assignable nor liable to arrestment nor other legal diligence at the hands of his creditors." The trustees of the settlement were English, and the trusts had been administered in England. The husband purported to charge his life estate.

Held (by Vaughan Williams and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ., Stirling, L.J., dissentiente), that the intention of the parties being that the Scotch law should apply to the marriage contract, the husband could take no greater interest than the Scotch law would allow him, and as the nature of the interest given by the contract ought not to vary with the domicil of the husband, the English courts would give effect to the Scotch law, the gift of an inalienable life interest to a man not being contrary or repugnant to the public policy of English law.

Decision of Joyce, J. (51 W. R. 586), reversed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Joyce, J. (reported 51 W. R. 586, [1903] 1 Ch. 933). The case came before the court upon on application by the trustees of a settlement made upon the marriage of Sir Gerald and Lady FitzGerald for the determination of questions which had arisen in the administration of the trusts thereof in the following circumstances.

On the 20th of September, 1862, a settlement in English form and a contract of marriage in Scotch form were executed in contemplation of the marriage which was afterwards solemnized between the parties. Sir Gerald was at the date of the marriage domiciled in England, and his wife was at the same date domiciled in Scotland. The marriage settlement and contract were executed in Scotland. By the English settlement certain property was assigned to the trustees to be held upon trust to invest and pay the income to Sir Gerald and his assigns during his life, and after his death to Lady FitzGerald during her life, and after the death of the survivor to stand possessed of the trust fund upon trusts for the children of the marriage as therein provided. The Scotch contract of marriage was made between the husband and wife. It recited the English settlement, and thereby Lady FitzGerald assigned to the trustees all her present and future property. The trusts declared of this property were as follows: (1) For the payment of the expenses of the trust; (2) for the payment of the income to Lady FitzGerald for life; (3) in case Sir Gerald should survive his wife, for payment of the income to him during the remainder of his life, it being declared by the contract "that all payments to the said Sir Gerald should be strictly alimentary and should not be assignable nor liable to arrestment or any other legal diligence at the instance of his creditors"; (4) upon trusts for the children of the marriage as therein provided.

On the 23rd of September, 1862, the marriage was solemnized in Scotland.

On the 19th of June, 1863, the only child of the marriage, Miss Geraldine FitzGerald, was born.

On the 16th of May, 1901, Lady FitzGerald died.

Numerous incumbrances had been created by Sir Gerald and Miss FitzGerald upon their respective interests in the English settlement and the Scotch contract, some before and some after Miss FitzGerald had attained twenty-one, which event happened on the 19th of June, 1884. On the death of Lady FitzGerald various questions arose between Sir Gerald and his mortgagees, and the present summons was taken out to have them determined. The question now before the court was whether the mortgagees had any charge on Sir Gerald's life interest in the funds comprised in the Scotch contract. The question depended mainly upon whether that contract must be construed according to Scotch or English law. If according to the former, Sir Gerald appeared to be restrained from anticipating or charging his life interest. Five out of the six trustees were domiciled in England, and the trust had always been administered in this country. The trust fund comprised, inter alia, Scotch mortgages on heritable bonds which it was alleged were according to the law of Scotland treated as real estate. There was evidence that, according to the law of Scotland, if Sir Gerald failed to maintain the children of the marriage, they would have the right to attach the alimentary provision made for him under the marriage contract, the alimentary provision being arrestable for alimentary debts, though not for other debts.

Joyce, J., held that the domicil of Sir Gerald had remained English all along; his residence was in England; the trustees were all subject to the jurisdiction of the English court, and it was they who had invoked its aid to determine the question that had been raised. In the existing circumstances, even if the construction and effect of the Scotch settlement were to be determined by the law of Scotland, it appeared to his lordship that its validity and operation with respect to the matter now in question must be determined by the law of England. Again, considering the question as one purely of contract, it was contrary to the policy of this country that property should be so settled as to continue in enjoyment of a bankrupt nowithstanding bankruptcy; in other words, the declaration in the Scotch settlement that all payments to Sir Gerald should not be assignable or liable to arrestment at the instance of creditors was void and inoperative according to English law. His lordship accordingly held that Sir Gerald's assignees or incumbrancers were the persons entitled to receive payment from the trustees of the Scotch settlement.

From that decision Sir Gerald appealed.

A. H. Jessel, for the appellant.—It is submitted that Joyce, J., was wrong in holding that an English court will not give effect to the alimentary clause which prevents the alienation of the life interest. The learned judge did not give sufficient weight to the fact that the settlement is in the Scotch form. The parties were married in Scotland and adopted a Scotch form of settlement; their intention, therefore, was to adopt also the Scotch law. This is borne out by the fact that the bulk of the property settled consisted of heritable bonds, which must be deemed realty. If no contract exists, the law of the country in which the parties elect to make their matrimonial domicil is the law which governs. But where there is a contract the law which governs the interpretation of that contract is the law to which the parties intended to submit themselves as shown by the form of the contract, and in this case that is Scotch law: Dicey's Conflict of Laws, pp. 540. 568; In re Barnard, 56 L. T., p. 9, 35 W. R. Dig. 177; In re Sibeth, 33 W. R. 556, 14 Q. B. D. 417; Viditz v. O'Hagan, 47 W. R. 571, [1899] 2 Ch. 569. This last case was reversed (48 W. R. 516, [1900] 2 Ch. 87), but not as to the point that marriage articles were governed by English law. A provision against assignment of a life interest is not contrary to public policy, for it is constantly done, though in another way, by a gift over on bankruptcy or any other event and a discretionary trust in favour of the donee. If it was an English document, the alimentary provision might be invalid. But it was executed in Scotland, where marriage took place, and is in Scotch form: Corbet v. Waddell, [1879] 7 Rettie, Court of Session Cas. 200; Chamberlain v. Napier, 29 W. R. 194, 15 Ch. D. 614; In re Bankes, Reynolds v. Ellis, 50 W. R. 663, [1902] 2 Ch. 333. Even assuming that the alimentary provision is bad in English law, the appellant is entitled to succeed. The forum of administration has nothing to do with the question, but the court must give effect to the law of the forum which the parties selected: Harrison v. Harrison, L. R. 8 Ch. 342; Noell v. Robinson, 2 Ventris 353; Scott v. Allnutt, 2 Dow & Clark 404. The law laid down in Westlake on Private International Law, that the forum of the matrimonial domicil governs the interpretation of the contract, is wrong: see Foote's Private International Law, pp. 317, 318; Lansdowne v. Lansdowne, 2 Bligh 60; Anstruther v. Adair, 2 M. & K. 513.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Crossman, for Miss FitzGerald.

Badcock, K.C., and Methold, for the first mortgagee of the life interest.—Sir Gerald FitzGerald acted on the supposition that he had power to assign up to 1895, when he discovered that though domiciled in England this settlement contained a provision in his favour to defeat his creditors. Such a provision is contrary to the policy of the English law, which does not allow a life interest to be protected against creditors: Brandon v. Robertson, 18 Ves. 429, and Graves v. Dolphin, 1 Sim. 66. It may have been the intention of the parties that it should be so protected, but the question is whether such an intention can be carried out. The matter must be determined according to the lex fori. If the parties had intended that the interpretation should be according to Scotch law they should have appointed Scotch trustees. But they have not done so, and the matter has to be determined by the English courts, which will give effect to the contract only so far as it conforms to English law. If the appellants' contention were correct an Englishman could contract himself out of any restriction imposed by English law. There is no reason to the contrary here to prevent this contract being construed according to English law: Dicey's Conflict of Laws, pp. 653, 654, and Collies v. Hector, 23 W. R. 485, L. R. 19 Eq. 334. Though the forms of entering into a contract of marriage are regulated by the lex loci contractus, the essentials are regulated by the lex domicilii: Brook v. Brook, 9 W. R. 461, 9 H. L. Cas. 93, and Hope v. Hope, 5 W. R. 387, 8 De G. M. & G. 731. It has been held that an agreement which, if made in this country, would be void on the ground of champerty, is none the less void if it has been made in a foreign country where such a contract would be legal: Grell v. Levy, 16 C. B. N. S. 73. So, too, an agreement which is contrary to the policy of the English law as to restraint on trade will not be enforced by the English courts, even though it be perfectly valid according to the law of the country where it was made: Rousillon v. Rousillon, 28 W. R. 623, 14 Ch. D. 351; Sottomayor v. De Barros, 26 W. R. 455, 3 P. D. 1; Lord Cranstoun v. Johnston, 3 Ves. 170. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J., referred to Freke v. Lord Carbery, 21 W. R. 835, L. R. 16 Eq. 461.] The mortgagees have had a proper assignment of the life interest executed to them, and they ought not to be debarred by the fact that the law of Scotland recognizes this alimentary provision, which alone prevents their being entitled to the benefit of their security: Ex parte Pollard, Montague & Chitty 237; Scott v. Allnutt, 2 Dow & Clark 404; Dicey's Conflict of Laws, p. 653.

They also cited Dicey's Conflict of Laws, p. 514; Foote's Private International Law, p. 189; Duncan v. Lawson, 37 W. R. 524, 41 Ch. D. 394; Duchess of Buccleugh v. Hoare, 4 Maddocks 467; Johnstone v. Baker, 4 Maddocks 474n.; Jerningham v. Herbert, 4 Russ. 388.

Hamilton, K.C., and Vernon, Blakesley, Withers, Pepys, and Northcote, for other incumbrancers.

E. Ford, for the trustees.

Jessel, in reply.—The only cases in which the courts of this country refuse to recognize a foreign contract are those in which the foreign contract is shocking to the conscience of this country, as being against its public policy, but that is not the case here.

He cited In re Missouri Steamship Co., 37 W. R. 696, 42 Ch. D. 323; Kaufman v. Gerson, 51 W. R. 683, [1903] 2 K. B. 114; Printing and Numerical Registering Co. v. Sampson, 23 W. R. 463, L. R. 19 Eq. 462; Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines, 51 W. R. 142, [1902] A. C. 484; Maxim-Nordenfeldt Guns and Ammunition Co. v. Nordenfeldt, 41 W. R. 604, [1893] 1 Ch. 630; Badische Anilin Fabrik v. Schott; Wharton v. Masterman, 43 W. R. 449, [1895] A. C. 186; Saunders v. Vautier, Cr. & Ph. 240.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 7.—COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read his judgment first, as follows: The first question for consideration on this appeal is whether what I may shortly describe as the Scotch settlement is subject to the law of Scotland, or whether it must be governed by English law. Now this Scotch settlement dealt with the property of a domiciled Scotch lady, who was about to marry a domiciled Englishman, and there is no doubt that the "matrimonial domicil" was English. It is not suggested that a permanent residence in Scotland after the marriage was contemplated. As a general rule the law of the matrimonial domicil is applicable to a contract in consideration of marriage. But this is not an absolute rule. It yields to an express stipulation that some other law shall apply. See Van Grutten v. Digby, 11 W. R. 230, 31 Beav. 561, in which case the matrimonial domicil was French, but the contract, though made in France and void by French law, was nevertheless treated by Sir John Romilly as valid so far as it related to property within the jurisdiction: see also Viditz v. O'Hagan. The decision in that case was reversed by the Court of Appeal, but not on a ground in any way affecting this point. It is not necessary that there should be an express stipulation. It is sufficient if the court arrives at the conclusion that the parties in fact contracted with reference to some law other than that of the matrimonial domicil. Applying these principles to the Scotch settlement, I find several important indications. (a) The great bulk of the property—viz., £13,200, was invested in heritable bonds. It has been settled by a chain of authorities, which ought not now to be reviewed by us—viz., by Sir William Grant in Johnstone v. Baker, by Sir John Leach in Jerningham v. Herbert, and by Sir James Wigram in Allen v. Anderson, 5 Hare 163, that heritable bonds must be regarded in our courts as immovables. If so, it can scarcely be denied that the lex loci—i.e., the law of Scotland—must apply to the extent of the £13,200. I am aware that there has been a change of investment of part of this sum into English securities, but this change cannot alter the law applicable to the settlement. I may add that, as to the £13,200, the matter does not rest in contract. There is an actual completed assignment of the heritable bonds. (b) There was, however, £500 cash belonging to the lady, which was paid over to the trustees for investment, and which was, in fact, invested in Consols, although it might have been invested in heritable securities in Scotland. It seems to me that this sum cannot fairly be treated as intended to be subject to a different law from that which is applicable to the bulk of the property. (c) The whole frame of the settlement is in Scotch form, and the limitations are of such a nature that they can only take effect if Scotch law is to be applied. I therefore feel bound to treat this as a settlement made in Scotland by a domiciled Scotch lady of Scotch property, in Scotch form, and subject to Scotch law. The trustees of this Scotch settlement must in Scotland follow the Scotch law, and their residence in England, or their English domicil, is irrelevant. This being so, it follows, in my opinion, that we are bound to hold that Sir Gerald FitzGerald takes such interest, and such interest only, as the courts in Scotland would declare him entitled to: Anstruther v. Adair. There ought to be no difference in a matter of this kind between the Court of Session and the High Court. The nature and extent of his interest cannot depend upon his domicil, although his capacity to deal with his interest may perhaps depend upon his domicil. To take the somewhat analogous case of a life interest in English property given by the will of a domiciled Englishman for the separate use of a married woman, without power of anticipation, it has never, so far as I am aware, been suggested that the nature and extent of her interest varied according as her domicil was, or was not, English. The trust would be regarded in our country as valid and operative, even though by the law of her domicil neither the separate use nor the restraint upon anticipation was recognized. And, on general principles, the same view ought to be adopted by the courts of the country in which the married woman was domiciled. In short, by the law of England, it is the Scotch law which must be applied to this Scotch settlement. It is, however, strongly urged that a strictly alimentary provision for an adult male is not only unknown to and inconsistent with the provisions of English law, as in general it undoubtedly is, but that it is contrary to public policy, and ought therefore to be wholly disregarded in an English court. I cannot adopt this argument. There is nothing immoral in such a provision. Indeed, there are many instances in which pensions or retiring allowances are by statute made not transferable, or liable to be attached by any legal process. I may refer to the pension allowed to a retiring clergyman under the Incumbents' Resignation Act, 1871, and to the observations of the Court of Appeal on that statute in Gathercole v. Smith, 29 W. R. 434, 17 Ch. D. 1. Moreover, it has been long settled that at common law, and apart from any statutory enactments prohibiting assignment, certains salaries or pensions are inalienable. For example, the half-pay of an officer. In Harty v. Odlum, 3 T. R. 681, Lord Kenyon says: "I am clearly of opinion that this half-pay could not be legally assigned by the defendant. . . . Emoluments of this sort are granted for the dignity of the State and for the decent support of those persons who are engaged in the service of it. It would, therefore, be highly impolitic to permit them to be assigned, for persons who are liable to be called out in the service of their country ought not to be taken from a state of poverty. It might as well be contended that the salaries of the judges, which are granted to support the dignity of the State and the administration of justice, may be assigned." In the following year the same question came up for consideration in Lidderdale v. Duke of Montrose, 4 T. R. 248. This was an action by an officer on half-pay against the Paymasters-General of the Army to recover arrears of his half-pay, and the only question was whether an assignment by way of mortgage, of which the defendants had due notice, justified them in withholding the money from the plaintiff. The court were clearly of opinion that, "on principles of public policy, as well as on account of the interest of the officers themselves, by law such assignments were void." The mortgagee was not party to this action, but it seems to have been thought that he might obtain equitable relief, and he accordingly filed a bill in the Exchequer: see Stone v. Lidderdale (Anstr. 533). It was argued that the assignment was good in equity, as a transfer of any valuable contingency or possibility, if made for good consideration, is affirmed in equity. But Macdonald, C.B., in a considered judgment, declined to accept this view, and held that the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief in equity in respect of the mortgage. In short he declined to affect the conscience of the mortgagor in respect of future instalments of the half-pay. In my opinion it is impossible to disregard this "alimentary provision" on the ground of public policy. The Scotch court would declare that the interest given to Sir Gerald cannot be assigned, and would disregard the claim of his specific mortgagees, and it is our duty to follow and adopt the Scotch law: Anstruther v. Adair. But then it was urged that Sir Gerald could bind, and did bind, the income as and when it reaches the hands of the trustees in England, and that, whatever might be the rights of his alimentary creditors, he himself ought not to be allowed to claim from the trustees the income which he has, by a contract binding on his conscience, charged in favour of his mortgagees. I doubt whether this doctrine, which is explained and illustrated by Lord Macnaghten in Tailby v. Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, 13 App. Cas. 523, has any application to a vested life interest, the assignment of which takes effect, if at all, for reasons wholly independent of conscience. An assignment of a vested equitable interest is complete and operative, though voluntary. It in no way depends upon contract, or upon anything further to be done by the assignor. The doctrine applies only where there is no present property capable of assignment, such as possibilities and expectancies. The case of Stone v. Lidderdale is an authority against the respondent's contention, and I know of no authority in its favour. I may observe that the defendant Lidderdale was a domiciled Englishman, whose general capacity to contract was undoubted. Moreover, this contention is really only another way of presenting the argument that we ought to disregard the Scotch law. If the life interest is capable of assignment, the court would grant specific performance of the contract, and would aid the mortgagees by granting an injunction. If, however, as in Stone v. Lidderdale, the interest is non-assignable, I think it follows that no effect can be given to a deed purporting to assign by way of anticipation. The decision of the House of Lords in Scott v. Allnutt, which was relied upon, does not really touch the case. In my opinion, the order of Joyce, J., was wrong, in so far as it declared that the whole of the income during the life of Sir Gerald is payable to his assignees or incumbrancers, according to their respective priorities. If the amount of the income were very large, any excess beyond a reasonable amount would, according to the Scotch law, pass to the assignees or incumbrancers, but I do not understand that it is suggested that there is any excess in the present case. I think the declaration should be to the effect that Sir Gerald is entitled to the whole income during his life, free from the claim of any assignees or incumbrancers, but without prejudice to the rights (if any) of his alimentary creditors, or of Miss FitzGerald, and without prejudice to any prior payment in respect of the policy, which is the subject of another appeal by Miss FitzGerald.

STIRLING, L.J., then read the following judgment: I agree with Cozens-Hardy, L.J., that Sir Gerald and Lady FitzGerald entered into a contract that their rights in the property of Lady FitzGerald (who at the time of the marriage was domiciled in Scotland) should be regulated by the Scotch law: Este v. Smyth, 2 W. R. 148, 18 Beav. 112; Chamberlain v. Napier. That property is now vested in trustees who are domiciled in England; but that circumstance is merely accidental, and cannot, as between the trustees and Sir Gerald FitzGerald, affect either the duty of the trustees or the rights of Sir Gerald, which must, I conceive, be governed by the law of Scotland; and if a Scotch court would (as I think the evidence shows it would) hold that trustees domiciled in Scotland ought to pay the alimentary provision, made for Sir Gerald by the contract in Scotch form of the 20th of September, 1862, into his hands from time to time as it becomes payable, regardless of the incumbrances which he has purported to make thereon, then, in my opinion, this court ought likewise to hold that such is the duty of the trustees in the present case. If Sir Gerald FitzGerald were a domiciled Scotchman there would be nothing more to be said. But he was at the date of the marriage, and has ever since been, a domiciled Englishman, and he is now resident within the jurisdiction of the English courts. His capacity to deal with his property is an incident of his status (see Viditz v. O'Hagan), and, therefore, is governed by English law. By that law, as stated by Lord Macnaghten in Tailby v. Official Receiver, "it has long been settled that future property, possibilities, and expectancies are assignable in equity for value. The mode or form of assignment is absolutely immaterial, provided the intention of the parties is clear. To effectuate the intention, an assignment for value, in terms present and immediate, has always been regarded in equity as a contract binding on the conscience of the assignor, and so binding the subject-matter of the contract when it comes into existence, if this is of such a nature and so described as to be capable of being ascertained and identified." In In re Coleman, 39 Ch. D. 443, this principle was applied to an assignment of an interest under a will to which the assignor became entitled only by virtue of the exercise in his favour of a discretion vested in the trustees of the will. In this respect the capacity of Sir Gerald FitzGerald is entirely different from that of a domiciled Scotchman, who, according to the law of Scotland, is unable to alienate an alimentary provision any more than, according to the law of England, a retired officer can alienate his half-pay, either at law or in equity, or a retired incumbent the provision allowed to him under the Incumbents' Resignation Act, 1871, or a married woman separate estate as to which she is restrained from anticipation. In such cases the person entitled to the property in question is by English law incapacitated from dealing with it. But that law does not in general recognize any restraint as regards the property of a man of full age. I cannot see why the English owner of an alimentary provision, created by foreign law, should be held to be incapable of making a disposition of it when it comes to his hands. The foreign law has full effect given to it when it is allowed to determine what ought to come to the hands of the owner in respect of the alimentary provision; after it reaches his hands he is not under any obligation imposed by the foreign law as to how he should apply it, and, as it seems to me, the English law ought to determine whether that which has come to his hands, and become property at his disposal, is to any and what extent subject to obligations arising out of dealings valid according to that law. In my opinion, therefore, an assignment of an alimentary provision, created under foreign law, by will or voluntary deed inter vivos in favour of a domiciled Englishman ought to be held by the courts of this country to bind funds coming in respect of that provision to his hands within the jurisdiction of those courts. In the present case the alimentary provision was created by a contract into which Sir Gerald entered for valuable consideration. But I cannot see that this puts Sir Gerald in a better position than if he were a volunteer; for I take it to be clearly settled that the doctrine on which I rely applies to property acquired by contract for value just as much as property acquired by gift. In my judgment, therefore, an order ought to be made on the lines of that actually made by the Court of Appeal in In re Coleman, to which I have already referred. But, although I have been unable to satisfy myself that the opinion which I have expressed is opposed to any existing authority, I can adduce no decision in support of it, while the weighty and considered opinions of my brethren are adverse. In these circumstances I cannot regret that my own view is not to prevail.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment the ante-nuptial contract entered into by Sir Gerald FitzGerald and Miss Lockhart, with the concurrence of her mother, Lady Lockhart, ought not to be construed and applied according to English law, which is undoubtedly the law of the matrimonial domicil of the husband and wife, and which law would primâ facie determine all questions arising under that marriage contract, but ought to be construed and applied according Scotch law. It is the intention of the parties, gathered from the terms and circumstances of the contract, which determines the law which governs it, and in my judgment the Scotch form of this contract, coupled with the fact that Miss Lockhart, at the time of her marriage, was a domiciled Scotchwoman, and that the property, the subject of settlement, came from her family, is sufficient to displace the primâ facie presumption that the law of the matrimonial domicil is to govern the contract.

Now the Scotch law is thus stated by the late Lord Advocate (Mr. Graham Murray) in his affidavit: "By the law of Scotland it is possible for a person to create a life interest in favour of another person, and by declaring that life-rent to be alimentary, to exclude, so far as the life interest does not exceed in amount a reasonable provision, the diligence of ordinary creditors and restrain all power of anticipation. When, therefore, as here, a lady by ante-nuptial marriage contract conveys her funds to trustees, it is possible for her to create a life-rent of these funds in favour of her surviving husband, and to exclude his ordinary creditors and to restrain him from anticipation."

The late Lord Advocate further points out that the non-chargeable nature of such an alimentary liferent would be upheld by the Scottish courts, if the question were there raised by a creditor against a Scottish trustee, and says that it is for the English court to determine whether, in a question with the English creditors of an English debtor, it will give effect to the Scotch law.

Assuming, as I do, that Scotch law governs all the rights created by the express or implied force of the words of the contract, it may be that there are rights which operate upon the contractual rights which are governed, not by the law which by the disclosed intention of the parties has come to be "the proper law of the contract," determining all questions of its legal effect and construction, but by the law of the actual domicil at the time when any dealing with the property the subject of the contract is attempted, such as questions of personal capacity in cases of minority, coverture, &c.

I cannot, however, persuade myself that in this case any question of personal capacity is raised. The case is simply this, that previous to the marriage a contract in the Scotch form, governed as to its legal construction and effect by the law of Scotland, was executed, whereby Miss Lockhart's property was settled upon trust (amongst other things), in case the husband should survive, that the proceeds of the estate should be paid to him for his life, but that all payments to him should be "strictly alimentary," and should "not be assignable nor liable to arrestment, or any other legal diligence at the instance of his creditors." These words of the contract limit the interest which the husband is to take, in the same way as in an English marriage contract the wife's interest is made subject to a restraint on anticipation. The restriction or chargeability in either case arises out of the terms of the contract and the trust thereunder. There is no personal incapacity; neither the wife in the case which I have put, nor the husband in the present case, can claim more under the trust than is given to her or him by the trust. It seems to me that no equity acting on the conscience of Sir Gerald FitzGerald can enable him, in respect of the life income given to him by the trust created by the contract, to do with that income that which it is impossible for him to do according to the effect of the Scotch contract, when construed by Scotch law.

Indeed, in the matter of the comparison of equities, I think that no obligations can bind the conscience of a person taking a life estate bestowed on him by another more strongly than the trust contract containing the conditions under which the donor has bestowed the gift, and this whether the conditions are expressed or are imposed by the law governing the contract. Anstruther v. Adair is really an authority for the proposition that an English court of equity, in construing a Scotch contract or enforcing a trust thereunder, will not enforce a wife's equity to a settlement against a husband who comes to the court to enforce against the surviving trustee resident in London his right to have a fund transferred to him absolutely, as the survivor of his wife, by virtue of a clause in the marriage contract. This seems to me in principle to decide that a court of equity in England will not, in contravention of plain provisions in a foreign contract, enforce equities binding the conscience of a beneficiary claiming under that contract.

If I am right in holding that in this case no question of personal capacity is raised, and if I am also right in what I have just said as to a court of equity not enforcing equities which, though binding the conscience of such a beneficiary, are inconsistent with the instrument under which he claims when construed by its proper law, i.e., the foreign law, the only remaining question is whether the provision in this Scotch marriage contract, "that all payments to Sir Gerald FitzGerald shall be strictly alimentary and shall not be assignable nor liable to arrestment or any other legal diligence at the instance of his creditors," so conflicts with what are deemed in England to be essential public interests, that the provision cannot be enforced here. This, as I understand, is the ground on which Joyce, J., refused to give effect to the provision. He relied upon the law as stated in Westlake on Private International Law (3rd ed.), s. 215, that "where a contract conflicts with what is deemed in England to be essential public or moral interests, it cannot be enforced here, notwithstanding that it may have been valid by its proper law."

The law thus stated seems to me to be accurate, and to correspond, as pointed out by Westlake, p. 40, with article 6 of the Code Napoleon: "Private contracts cannot derogate from laws which interest public order or good morals." The question in each case is whether the foreign law or the private agreement conflicts with a law in which the public order and good morals concerned are essential enough to call into operation the reservation in favour of stringent domestic policy, which in principle is recognized and insisted upon by all civilized nations.

The English law, in so far as it refuses to give effect to provisions which affect to control the rights of disposition which are attached to an absolute transfer of property, does not seem to me to be a matter regarding "public order or good morals." It is, I think, merely a logical development from legal definitions adopted by the English law. But it is true that in its application this law has been made the means of protecting creditors, and yet I do not think that in a country which allows restriction on anticipation in respect of the separate property of a wife, it can possibly be said that to enforce a provision in a Scotch contract inconsistent with this law would be contrary to public order and good morals, even though the result might be to defeat the just rights of a creditor. There are other instances to which my attention has been called by the judgments of my learned brethren, which I have been allowed to read, in which sometimes the Legislature and sometimes the courts of common law have recognized restrictions as inconsistent as those in this Scotch contract with the alleged essential rule of public order and good morals.

I agree with the judgment delivered by Cozens-Hardy, L.J.; I cannot agree with the conclusion of Joyce, J.

THE COURT granted a stay of execution, pending an appeal to the House of Lords, on terms.

Solicitors, G. J. Fowler; Surman & Quekett; Redfern & Hunt; White, Borrett, & Co.; Trower, Still, & Co.; Keen, Rogers, & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) And K. B. Div. (Bucklley, J.) — March 7, 8, 18.

In re BURNAND.

Ex parte THE TRUSTEE v. BAKER, SUTTON, & Co. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Right of trustee to books of bankrupt—Books of underwriter at Lloyd's—Underwriting as agent in the names of other persons—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 50—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886-1890, r. 349.

An underwriter at Lloyd's entered into agreements with other persons to act as their agent to carry on the business of an underwriter at Lloyd's in accordance with the custom of Lloyd's, and it was a term of the agreements that he should provide and keep books which the other parties should at all times be allowed to inspect. The agent in fact kept one set of books only in which his accounts with the other persons were entered. On the bankruptcy of the agent the other persons set up a claim to joint property in the books, and refused to hand them over to the trustee in his bankruptcy.

Held, on appeal (reversing the decision of Buckley, J.), that the other persons had a joint property in the books with the bankrupt, and that the trustee in the bankruptcy was not entitled to have the books handed over to him, but had merely the right to inspect them.

Application by the trustee in the bankruptcy of P. G. C. Burnand for the delivery up of the books of the bankrupt used by him in his business as an underwriter at Lloyd's.

The respondents, Messrs. Baker, Sutton, & Co., were accountants, in whose custody the books had been placed before the bankruptcy. They did not claim any personal right to withhold the books from the trustee, but refused to give them up because they had been warned not to part with them by five persons in whose names and on whose behalf the bankrupt had acted as agent for the purpose of underwriting policies of insurance and carrying on the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's. These persons claimed that the books were the joint property of themselves and the bankrupt, as they contained the records of all transactions entered into by the bankrupt on their behalf.

The material parts of the agreements under which the bankrupt underwrote in the names of these persons, so far as concerns the present case were as follows:—

Clause 1: "The said P. G. C. Burnand shall . . . act as the agent of the said A. B. for the purpose of underwriting policies of insurance at Lloyd's, and carrying on the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's in the name and on behalf of the said A. B. in accordance with the usual custom of Lloyd's, and upon the terms and conditions hereinafter contained."

Clause 5: "Proper underwriting and account books shall be provided and kept in the usual manner, and shall at all times be open to the inspection of the said A. B. or his agent thereunder appointed in writing, and the said P. G. C. Burnand shall at all times give to the said A. B. such information or explanations as to the books or the state of the account as he may require. The said books and accounts if required by the said A. B. shall be periodically audited by a professional accountant."

Clause 6: "The said A. B. so long as the underwriting is carried on under this agreement shall pay to the said P. C. G. Burnand while he shall duly perform the engagements on his part herein contained as a remuneration for his services in conducting the said underwriting business for keeping and providing books and papers and for providing a proper office and clerical assistants and all other outgoings and expenses connected with the underwriting business . . . the sum of £—— per annum."

S. G. Lushington, for the trustee.—The agreements clearly intend that Burnand is to be the owner of the books, otherwise there would be no need for them to contain the power of inspection given to the other party. That being so, it is the trustee's duty under section 50 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to get possession of them, and by rule 349 no person is entitled to withhold possession of them, or to set up any lien thereon.

Muir Mackenzie, for the respondents.—The books were purchased with the money of the other parties. They are in the position of solvent partners who are entitled to possession of the firm books as against the trustee of a bankrupt partner.

S. G. Lushington was not called upon to reply.

BUCKLEY, J.—The respondents in this case have no property in or right of possession of the books, but they set up a jus tertii, and say that the parties for whom the bankrupt acted as agent have a joint property in the books with the bankrupt.

Now these books were provided and kept under the terms of certain contracts between the debtor and each of these other parties, and the clauses in these contracts which relate to the books provide that the books shall at all times be open to the inspection of the parties for whom the bankrupt acted as agent, and it is also provided that the bankrupt is to receive certain remuneration for inter alia "keeping and providing books." I think the result of those clauses is that the bankrupt had to find and pay for the books, and that they were his property. There would be no object in providing that the other parties should have a right to inspect if the books were their property.

Moreover, the books contain the record of sums receivable by or claims enforceable against six persons for which each of the six was severally liable. As between the five persons other than the bankrupt no one of them could claim the books against the others, or any of them, or against the bankrupt. He was to provide and keep them, they were his property, and must be handed over to the trustee in his bankruptcy.

From this decision Baker, Sutton, & Co. appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appellants.

Scrutton, K.C., and Lushington, for the trustee, cited Clarke v. Tipping, 4 Beav. 588.

Montague Lush, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think this appeal ought to be allowed. From the agreements made between Burnand and the five persons named, I doubt whether one ledger for the five names was intended to be kept. If separate books had been kept for each name, whatever right Burnand might have had during the agency, when the agency determined each person named would have a right to his own book. But that is not the case here. One book only was kept for all the names and for Burnand's transactions with the five persons named, and the five persons named knew and acquiesced in this. In my opinion no order should have been made giving Burnand or his trustee exclusive control of the books. In the result the five persons named ought to have control of the books, and the trustee of Burnand the right of inspection. The order must be discharged.

STIRLING, L.J.—If separate books had been kept for each one of the five names, Burnand would have had no right to the books as against each one of the five. But here one set of books only were kept with all five names. At the most Burnand obtained a joint interest with the five others, and Burnand's trustee cannot have a claim overriding that of the five others. At the same time inspection must be allowed to Burnand or his trustee.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE and A. R. TAYLOUR, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J. — I can see no reason for giving the trustee a right overriding that of the five others, but an undertaking to allow Burnand or his trustee to have the right to inspect the books must be given by the five named persons.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the trustee, Parker, Garrett, Holman, & Howden.

Solicitors for Baker, Sutton, & Co., Ward, Bowie, & Co.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) Feb. 10.

KILGOUR v. GADDES. (a.)

Easement—Prescription—Right of way—Right to use pump—Long user—Dominant and servient tenements held under same landlord—Prescription Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 2.

A right of way or other easement capable of being acquired under section 2 of the Prescription Act, 1832, by long user, cannot be so acquired by a lessee of a tenement over an adjoining tenement where both tenements are held under the same landlord.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Walton, J., and a jury.

The plaintiff and the defendant were occupiers of adjoining houses in High-street, Longtown, in the county of Cumberland. The action was brought for an injunction to restrain the defendant from wrongfully entering the plaintiff's premises and drawing water from a well and making use of a pump thereon, and for damages. The defendant pleaded that he and the former occupiers of his premises had enjoyed as of right and without interruption for forty years the right to use the well and pump in question as being appurtenant to the defendant's premises, and that a right had been acquired so to use them by virtue of the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71); and he counterclaimed for a mandatory injunction directing the plaintiff to remove an obstruction erected by him for the purpose of preventing the exercise of the alleged right by the defendant, and for damages.

Both the plaintiff's premises and the defendant's premises were of leasehold tenure and were held under the same ground landlord. In January, 1850, the landlord granted a lease of the latter premises for ninety-nine years, and in July, 1850, he granted a lease of the former premises for ninety-nine years. In 1899 the defendant became the assignee of the lease of January, 1850, and in 1900 the plaintiff became the assignee of the lease of July, 1850. The evidence showed that during the time the plaintiff had been in occupation of his premises and for many years previously the defendant and his predecessors in occupation had been in the habit of taking water from the pump in common with other adjoining owners. In December, 1902, the plaintiff, after expressing his willingness to allow the defendant to take water at reasonable hours, erected a partition and door, so that he might prevent access to the pump at unreasonable hours. On the 29th of December the defendant, at ten o'clock at night, burst in the door with the object of obtaining water. The plaintiff therefore brought this action.

The principal question at the trial was whether an easement for the use of the pump by the occupier of the defendant's premises had been acquired under the Prescription Act.

Walton, J., left certain questions to the jury, in answer to which they found that for forty years before the commencement of the action the pump had been used as of right by the occupiers of the defendant's premises, and that before January, 1850, when the long lease was granted, such occupiers had used the pump in question for the purpose of obtaining a supply of water for such premises.

The learned judge reserved the case for further consideration, when it was contended on the part of the plaintiff that the easement claimed by the defendant was incapable of being acquired under the Prescription Act, on the ground that such an easement could not be acquired by one tenant against another where both held under the same landlord.

Walton, J., held that an easement had been acquired by the defendant, and that the defendant was entitled to judgment on his counterclaim for an injunction and 1s. damages.

The plaintiff appealed.

Lancelot Sanderson, K.C., and Lumb, for the plaintiff.

Cavanagh, for the defendant.

The following cases were cited: Bright v. Walker, 1 C. M. & R. 211; Wheaton v. Maple & Co., 41 W. R. 677, [1893] 3 Ch. 48; Timmons v. Hewitt, 22 L. R. Ir. 627; Gayford v. Moffat, L. R. 4 Ch 133, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 42; Frewen v. Phillipps, 9 W. R. 786, 11 C. B. N. S. 449; Fahey v. Dwyer, 4 L. R Ir. 271; Beggan v. McDonald, 2 L. R. Ir. 560; Harris v. De Pinna, per Chitty, J., 33 Ch. D. 238.

COLLINS, M.R.—The point in this case is a short one. It is whether as between two termors of separate tenements held under the same landlord a right of way can be acquired by prescription for the owner of one tenement over the other tenement. I say advisedly for the owner, for such a right cannot be claimed merely by a tenant against a tenant. A claim for a right of way by prescription must necessarily be a claim by the owner of a fee against the owner of a fee. Here there are two tenants, one of a so-called dominant tenement, the other of a so-called servient tenement, holding under the same landlord. If the proposition is true that a prescriptive right of way acquired under the Prescription Act must be acquired by an owner of a fee against an owner of a fee, the argument used on behalf of the defendant in this case would lead to this anomalous result, that the tenant of an owner of land has acquired for his owner a right of way over the owner's own land. That contention cannot be supported. I limit what I am saying to a right of way, and I am not concerned with the right to light, which stands apart and is governed by different provisions, viz., those of section 3 of the Prescription Act. Rights of way and other rights acquired under section 2 must be acquired, if acquired at all, as of right. This appears from the provisions of section 2 itself, and it is made more clear by section 5, which says that "it shall be sufficient to allege the enjoyment thereof as of right by the occupiers of the tenement in respect whereof the same is claimed." Whether the enjoyment set up is enjoyment for twenty years or for forty years, it must have been an enjoyment which is claimed as of right. The right to light stands on a different footing, and there the enjoyment need not be as of right. The reason why the enjoyment must be as of right is pointed out by Palles, C.B., in the case of Timmons v. Hewitt. He said: "These extracts from the judgments in Beggan v. McDonald appear to me to show that the case is no authority upon the question before us. Where the two tenements are held by termors under the same landlord, prescription does not apply; because, as pointed out by Lord Cairns in Gayford v. Moffat, 'the possession of the tenant of the demised close is the possession of the landlord; and it seems to be an utter violation of the first principles of the relation of landlord and tenant to suppose that the tenant, whose occupation of close A was the occupation of his landlord, could by that occupation acquire an easement over close B, also belonging to his landlord.' This doctrine was approved and acted upon by the Court of Common Pleas in this country in Clancy v. Byrne, Ir. R. 11 C. L., 355. If I am asked how it is consistent with the Prescription Act, I answer that such user and enjoyment is not as of right within the meaning of the second section. It is a user by a termor, who, if he acquire the right, must acquire it as incident to the land of which he is termor, and thus for the benefit of his reversioner. Such user cannot be as of right, unless a reversioner can in law by user acquire a right against himself." That was an authoritative enunciation of the law, and it seems to me to be conclusive of this case.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Walton, J., rested his judgment in this case on the authority of Harris v. De Pinna. In that case Chitty, J., expressed the opinion that an easement in the shape of a right of way or of that class could be acquired by a tenant over land belonging to his own landlord. But that opinion seems to have been based on an unsound foundation. It purported to be based on the two Irish cases of Fahey v. Dwyer and Beggan v. McDonald. Beggan v. McDonald, however, gives no support to the opinion at all. That was a case of two separate owners, and is no authority in a case of two tenants holding under the same landlord. Fahey v. Dwyer purported to follow Frewin v. Phillipps, but Frewin v. Phillipps was a decision on a claim to light, and it did not decide that a right such as is claimed here could be acquired by one tenant against another. I am of opinion that those cases do not support the view taken by Chitty, J. In the case of Wheaton v. Maple & Co., a decision of this court, I find a statement of the law on this question by Lindley, L.J., which, in my opinion, is an authority for the proposition that a right claimed under the Prescription Act other than a right to light must be claimed in respect of the fee.

The Lord Justice there said: "I am not aware of any authority for presuming, as a matter of law, a lost grant by a lessee for years in the case of ordinary easements, or a lost covenant by such a person not to interrupt in the case of light, and I am certainly not prepared to introduce another fiction to support a claim to a novel prescriptive right. The whole theory of prescription at common law is against presuming any grant or covenant not to interrupt by or with any one except an owner in fee. A right claimed by prescription must be claimed as appendant or appurtenant to land, and not as annexed to it for a term of years. Although, therefore, a grant by a lessee of the Crown, commensurate with his lease, might be inferred as a fact, if there was evidence to justify the inference, there is no legal presumption, as distinguished from an inference in fact, in favour of such a grant." In that passage he was dealing with the doctrine of a lost grant. Later on he deals with the Prescription Act as follows: "I come now to the last question—viz., whether section 3 has conferred an easement as against the Crown's lessees. So far as mere language is concerned, and apart from the nature of the subject-matter with which the section is dealing, I should see no difficulty in applying section 3 to all English subjects, whether lessees of the Crown or other people; I should see no difficulty in reading "absolute and indefeasible" as meaning absolute and indefeasible as against all persons to whom the section is applicable. But if the section is so read, the consequence will necessarily be to create, by mere occupation and enjoyment, a class of easements which at common law could never have been acquired by prescription, but only by express agreement or grant. An easement for a term of years may, of course, be created by grant, but such an easement cannot be acquired by prescription, and not being capable of being so acquired, it does not fall within the scope of the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71. The expression "absolute and indefeasible," as applied to easements of all kinds, coupled with the declared object of the Act, which is to shorten the time for prescription, shows that the easements dealt with were easements appendant or appurtenant to land, and which, when acquired, imposed a burden for ever on the servient dominant. This view of the statute was clearly expressed soon after it passed in Bright v. Walker, and although some passages in Baron Parke's judgment in that case have been criticized, and even dissented from, the broad view which underlies the judgment has never been disapproved." That is inconsistent with the cases which Walton, J., followed, and is a sufficient answer to the defendant's claim. The appeal therefore succeeds.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Ullthorne, Currey, & Co., for C. B. Hodgson, Carlisle.

Solicitor for the defendant, J. A. Broughton, Carlisle.

From K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J.) } Jan. 25.

BORTHWICK v. ELDERSLIE STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Exemption—Warranty of seaworthiness of ship—Fitness of ship to carry goods.

Meat was shipped at Melbourne for carriage to London under a bill of lading which contained the following clause in large print: "Neither the steamer, nor her owners, nor her charterers, shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading nor for any loss or damage thereto, whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation, or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not, nor for detention; nor for the consequences of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the master, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers, nor from any other cause whatsoever." There was also a small print clause exempting the shipowner from liability for loss or damage resulting from (inter alia) "defects, latent or otherwise, in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, refrigeration, or otherwise, or their appurtenances (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded, or at the commencement or any stage of the voyage), if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness." The ship had on previous voyages carried cargoes of horses, and for the purpose of cleansing the ship to receive the meat a quantity of carbolic acid was used. Upon the arrival of the meat in London it was found to be tainted with carbolic acid. The learned judge at the trial found that the damaged condition of the meat arose from the tainted condition of the ship at the commencement of the voyage in consequence of the use of carbolic acid, and that if proper care and skill had been used at Melbourne the damage would not have occurred. He held, however, that the large print clause, notwithstanding the limited exemption in the small print clause, exempted the shipowner from liability.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esqr., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the large print clause did not confer upon the shipowner a general exemption from liability for loss arising from the unseaworthiness of the ship at the commencement of the voyage, and as reasonable means had not been taken to provide against the unseaworthy condition of the ship, the small print clause did not exempt him.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Walton, J. (reported in 8 Com. Cas. 150).

The action was brought by the indorsee of bills of lading to recover damages for breach of contract in the carriage of meat by sea.

The meat was shipped under several bills of lading all in the same form, by which the defendants acknowledged that the meat had been shipped in good order and condition at Melbourne, Australia, on board the defendants' steamship Nairnshire, to be delivered (subject to the exceptions and conditions in the bills of lading contained) at London to order or assigns.

The bills of lading were respectively headed "Refrigerator Bill of Lading," and contained the two following material clauses. The first clause was in printed Roman type, and was as follows: "Neither the steamer nor her owners nor her charterers shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto, whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation, or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not, nor for detention; nor for the consequences of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the master, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers, nor from any other cause whatsoever. The steamer shall be at liberty to jettison the whole of the goods, or any part thereof, if considered necessary on account of decomposition or otherwise." The second was printed in small italics, and was as follows: "The act of God, the King's enemies, pirates, robbers, thieves, by land or sea (but not pilferage), arrests, or restraints of princes, rulers, or people, riots, strikes, lock-outs, or other labour disturbances, or delay or hindrance caused directly or indirectly thereby, and loss or damage resulting therefrom or from any of the following causes or perils are excepted—viz., insufficiency in packing or in strength of packages, loss or damage from coaling on the voyage, rust, vermin, breakage, leakage, drainage, sweating, evaporation, or decay, resulting from bad stowage, or otherwise, or from the leakage or flow of or from contact with the urine, manure water, or drainage from horses, cattle, sheep, or other animals carried on the said ship or from their stalls, however caused, or otherwise howsoever; injurious effects of other goods, whether arising from bad stowage or otherwise; effects of climate, insufficiency of ventilation, or temperature of holds; risk of craft, of transshipment, and of storage afloat or on shore; fire on board, in hull, in craft, or on shore; rain, hail, snow, frost, or ice; explosion, barratry, jettision; collision, whether with another ship or any other obstacle; stranding, lying upon, or touching the ground; perils of the seas, rivers, or navigation of whatever nature or kind, and howsoever caused; whether or not any of the perils, causes, or things above-mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom, be occasioned by or arise from any act or omission, negligence, default or error in judgment of the master, pilot, officers, mariners, engineers, crew, stevedores, ship's husband or managers or other persons whomsoever in the service of the owners, or charterers; whether on board the said ship or on shore, or on board any other ship belonging to or chartered by them, or for whose acts they would otherwise be liable, whether such act, omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment shall have occurred before or after the commencement of or during the voyage; or any other causes beyond the control of the owners or charterers, or by or from any accidents to or defects latent or otherwise in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, refrigeration, or otherwise, or their appurtenances (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded, or the commencement of the voyage), or insufficiency of coals at the commencement or any stage of the voyage, if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness."

Upon arrival in London the meat was found to be tainted with carbolic acid. It appeared that The Nairnshire was fitted with refrigerating chambers for the purpose of carrying frozen meat. Before the voyage in question The Nairnshire had made two voyages with cargoes of horses, some of which were carried in the 'tween decks. For the purpose of cleansing the ship, and in order to disinfect her for the purpose of receiving the cargo of frozen meat, a quantity of carbolic acid was used.

The learned judge at the trial found as a fact that nothing had happened during the voyage from Melbourne to London to cause the frozen meat to become tainted by carbolic acid; that the damaged condition of the meat arose from the tainted condition of the ship at the commencement of the voyage in consequence of the use of carbolic acid; and that if proper skill and care had been used before she started from Melbourne the damage would not have occurred. He held, however, that the earlier clause, in large print, exempted the defendants from liability, notwithstanding the later clause. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Loehnis, for the plaintiff.

Carver, K.C., and D. C. Leck, for the defendants.

The following cases were referred to: Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, 26 W. R. Dig. 216; Tattersall v. National Steamship Co., 32 W. R. 566, 12 Q. B. D. 297; Maori King v. Hughes, 44 W. R. 2, [1895] 2 Q. B. 550; In re Richardson and Samuel, [1898] 1 Q. B. 261, 46 W. R. Dig. 156; Rathbone Brothers & Co. v. McIver, Sons, & Co., ante, p. 68, [1903] 2 K. B. 378; Price v. Union Lighterage Co., ante, p. 325, [1904] 1 K. B. 412.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—With great deference to the opinion of Walton, J., especially in any case of this kind, I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge has overlooked, or, rather, has not given sufficient effect to, certain broad considerations which should always be taken into account in construing commercial or other documents. It is true to say that where there are, whether in a bill of lading or in any other document, a number of clauses the instrument must be read so as to make the clauses consistent, and not to reject a clause as surplusage, unless it is impossible to read it with the other clauses. There is one other general consideration which, as it seems to me, the learned judge did not give sufficient effect to. I prefer to state it in the language of Vaughan Williams, L.J., in Rathbone Brothers & Co. v. McIver, Sons, & Co.: "With reference to the carriage of goods by sea, the law implies certain warranties on the part of the shipowner. It puts upon him certain obligations which will always bind him, unless there are in the contract clear and express words which without ambiguity relieve him from that which I may call his common law obligations." It is to the same principle that, I think, Romer, L.J., referred: "Shipowners have been for a long time endeavouring to limit the general liability cast upon them by law as carriers by sea by inserting special exceptions, without going the length of excepting their liability in respect of the warranty of seaworthiness, and they have been, as I understand, from time to time extending the special exceptions. I think, however, I am right in saying that as a principle of construction the warranty of seaworthiness will be held not to have been excepted unless it plainly appears that it was intended to except it. In other words, the court will not readily infer an exception of that warranty." Those two passages lay down in clear and forcible language the principle which has to be applied. The learned judge in the present case has not given sufficient effect to the fact that the small print clause deals expressly with the warranty of seaworthiness of the ship. I agree with the first part of the argument of Mr. Carver that the small print clause leaves matters as they stood at common law so far as regards the warranty of seaworthiness, except that it gives a qualified exemption to the shipowners. In other words, the small print clause exempts the shipowners from loss or damage resulting from any defects, latent or otherwise, in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, refrigeration or otherwise, or their appurtenances, whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded, or the commencement of the voyage, or insufficiency of coals at the commencement or any stage of the voyage, if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness. The part of the argument which I am unable to follow is that the large print clause is intended to be an overriding clause exempting the shipowners from liability for unseaworthiness, whether existing at the commencement of the voyage or not, even though reasonable means have been taken to provide against unseaworthiness. It is said that the shipowners are protected unconditionally notwithstanding the limited protection afforded to them by the small print clause. I am unable to come to the conclusion that the large print clause, construed fairly, limits the warranty of seaworthiness so as to exempt the shipowners from liability for what occurred in this case. The clause protects the shipowners from liability "for any loss or damage thereto" (to the goods) "whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation, or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not." I think it is material to observe that the clause goes on, "nor for the consequences of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the master, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers, nor from any other cause whatsoever." It seems to me to be plain that the clause as to "failure or breakdown of machinery cannot be construed as getting rid once and for all, by reason of the words "or from any other cause whatsoever," of the liability of the shipowners for unseaworthiness. When one sees where those words are inserted, following, as they do, immediately on the clause relating specially to "failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation, or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise," I have no doubt that the words "or from any other cause whatsoever" relate to a subject-matter ejusdem generis with that which is dealt with in the preceding words, and cannot be construed as a general clause relieving the shipowners from liability for the unseaworthiness of the ship. I read the clause as protecting the shipowners from liability for loss or damage arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation, or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other similar cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or occuring during the voyage. I adopt Mr. Hamilton's argument that the latter part of the clause was inserted so as to extend in favour of the shipowners the exception as to loss arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, and to make it apply whether the failure or breakdown arose from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or not. The ship had before the voyage in question carried a cargo of horses, and in consequence she had to be disinfected. For this purpose a quantity of carbolic acid was used, which left a taint in the ship rendering her unfit to carry a delicate cargo like meat. That was the condition of the ship, and it rendered the ship unseaworthy for the carriage of the meat. I am unable to construe the large print clause as conferring a general exemption from the warranty of seaworthiness. In my opinion the warranty of seaworthiness is cut down as described in the small print clause, and under that clause the defendants, as they did not take reasonable means to provide against unseaworthiness, are not relieved from liability for loss or damage arising from the unseaworthiness of the ship. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Solicitors for the defendants, Lowless & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } March 4.
Kekewich, J. }

In re COOPER AND CRONDACE'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Contract for sale and purchase—Conditions of sale—"Remarks"—Form of conveyance.

Provisions in a contract for sale and purchase, stating that something should be done either by vendor or purchaser after the estate has been vested, should be inserted as a covenant in the conveyance.

(a.) Reported by A. C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Adjourned summons.

The question for consideration in this case was whether the effect of a certain clause (6) contained in the contract for the sale and purchase should be included in the conveyance as a covenant.

The property to which the contract related was sold by auction, and, together with the particulars and conditions of sale, there was a page headed "Remarks," clause 6 of which provided that: "Each purchaser will have to erect within six months from the date of sale, and afterwards maintain, a good and sufficient fence on the sides of his plot marked T on the plan within the boundary."

Cave, K.C., for the vendor.—General remarks are a part of the agreement: Leggott v. Barrett, 28 W. R. 962, 15 Ch. D. 306. Where such a provision is made it should be inserted as a covenant in the conveyance: Birmingham District Land Co. v. Allday, 41 W. R. 189, [1893] 1 Ch. 342.

Hon. T. H. Watson, for the purchaser.—There is no mention in "Remarks," "Particulars," or "Conditions" of any covenant being required from purchaser. In ordinary practice, if there is to be a covenant it is always mentioned in the particulars: Key & Elphinstone's Precedents, vol. 1 (7th ed.) 311. The vendor will not be hurt by not having this part of the contract entered as a covenant in the conveyance, as in case of need he could still sue on the contract: Palmer v. Johnson, 33 W. R. 36, 13 Q. B. D. 351, C. A. Conditions of sale should be construed against vendor: Birmingham District Land Co. v. Allday, [1893] 1 Ch. 342. In any event the words heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and the separate covenant with the mortgagee, are far too wide and should be struck out.

KEKEWICH, J.—This is a case of some novelty. No authority directly in point was cited by counsel for either side. What is the object of having a conveyance? Not merely to vest the estate in the purchaser, but also to express in a definite concluded form the terms of the contract which have to be performed by the purchaser. It is not usual to enter in a conveyance things to be done beforehand—for instance, that the vendor will put up a fence. There the purchaser would be well advised to see that it was done before the purchase was completed. Again, if there is something completely outside the contract, as, for instance, a question of compensation for injury to the property that would not appear on the conveyance. But otherwise the conveyance is meant to express in a clear and binding form, once for all, the clear contract between the parties as far as it has not been performed. I think that a conveyance that falls short of that is not a well-settled conveyance. For instance, if there are restrictive covenants to which the vendor is liable, and as to which he is entitled to a covenant by the purchaser—which I have held to be a covenant of indemnity—that must be put into the conveyance. If it is not there, I agree the conveyance is not properly settled. For once you have got a conveyance you cannot go behind that and say there is something more to be done. When once the bridge of conveyance has been passed neither party can go back, and cannot sue on an agreement made at the time of the contract, but not included in the conveyance, for it must be assumed not to have been embodied in the conveyance because it is presumed to have been abandoned.

That seems to me to be the object of a conveyance. Therefore, when you have to inquire whether this or that ought to be in the conveyance, you must find out if it is a part of the contract. Does the contract provide that it must be done either by the vendor or purchaser after the estate has been vested. For that purpose you must look at the contract itself. This particular contract here is that Lot 17, described in the particulars and subject to the conditions, should be sold by the vendor to the purchaser. It is common knowledge that although conditions of sale are different things from particulars of sale, that the purchaser takes the property in the particulars subject to the conditions.

It is the commonest possible occurrence to find in the particulars a reservation of a right of way, some restrictive covenant, some easement, which is part of the description of the property sold, and which is recognized as a part of or a fetter on the enjoyment of the property. Now, in this particular instance, we have three categories instead of two. I have seen the same thing before. Besides the conditions which are properly called signed conditions, there are "general remarks." They generally fall into the particulars. Take the general remark. [Reads clause 6.]

If that obligation had been intended to be imposed as one of some half-a-dozen out of a larger number, on two or three of these lots, it would have probably occurred to the draftsman to have inserted it at the foot of each description in the particulars as a note to each special lot. But it applies to every one. Therefore it comes into the particulars. The purchaser takes Lot 17, as described in the particulars, with the obligation to erect and afterwards maintain the fences specified. There you have something that must be done after the date of completion. It was not possible that it was intended that the fence should be erected before completion. So that you have something which ought to be introduced and to be in the conveyance in order to complete it and perform the contract. But it is pointed out by counsel for the purchaser that there is no condition to that effect, and the conditions would have been more perfect had it been there. But I cannot think that the omission removes the obligation—the obligation is to do this, and if the conveyance is prepared without this, the vendor runs great risk of not being in a condition to insist on it at all. It would be extraordinarily difficult to frame the indorsement of a writ so as to enforce this, if there was nothing in the conveyance about it. I do not say it would be impossible. The answer would be that it is an obligation which now has no legal means of enforcement not having been inserted in the conveyance. There will be a declaration that a covenant must be inserted in the conveyance, on the part of the purchaser, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns.

Solicitors, F. C. Holland; Johnson, Weatherell, & Sturt, for Potter & Crundwell, Farnham.

Chan. Div.
Byrne, J. } March 3.

VEZEY v. RASHLEIGH. (a.)

Contract—Written agreement—Land—Parol variation—Specific performance—Defence.

Although a parol waiver of a written agreement concerning land, amounting to a complete rescission of the original contract, may be a good defence to an action for specific performance, yet variations verbally agreed upon cannot be relied upon by way of defence, and the original agreement may, notwithstanding, be ordered to be specifically performed.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion.

This was a motion in an action for specific performance of an agreement which was resisted upon the ground (among others) that it had been subsequently varied by the parties by a parol agreement.

In 1903, the plaintiff, J. R. Vezey, brought an action against the defendant, Sir Colman Rashleigh, respecting a lease dated the 15th of August, 1901, of certain mines in Cornwall. This action was compromised, and an order was made in it by consent that all further proceedings, except such as were necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the compromise set forth in the schedule thereto, should be stayed. The schedule, after declaring that the lease of August, 1901, should be treated as determined, continued: "2. A new lease of the premises comprised in the lease of the 15th of August, 1901, to be granted by the defendant, Sir C. B. Rashleigh, to the plaintiff, J. R. Vezey, at the rent of £50 per annum and dues 1-30th for the term of twenty-one years from Christmas, 1903"; (then followed a provision as to certain plant, buildings, and effects) "and to be on the same terms as the said lease of the 15th of August, 1901, with the exception that the lessee is not to be allowed to sink a shaft"; and the plaintiff was to pay the said defendant £100 towards his costs. Subsequently there were some negotiations between the plaintiff and Sir C. Rashleigh, and a conversation took place between them concerning certain proposed alterations in the terms of the new lease, and on the 11th of December, 1903, two documents containing the same terms were signed, one by the plaintiff and the other by the defendant, Sir C. Rashleigh. These documents were headed: "Topics of conversation between Sir Colman Rashleigh and Mr. Vezey," and contained the proposed or suggested alterations. The plaintiff alleged that an agreement was come to between himself and Sir C. Rashleigh that the terms of the lease as stated in the schedule to the order should be varied in accordance with the terms contained in the abovementioned documents of the 11th of December, 1903, and that those documents constituted a fresh written agreement between the parties varying the terms of the former agreement of compromise; and he therefore refused to execute a lease in the terms of the schedule to the said order. Sir C. Rashleigh denied that any such agreement had been entered into between them, or that the documents of the 11th of December, 1903, were or were intended to be an agreement, and he now moved in the action that the plaintiff should be ordered, in pursuance of the said agreement of compromise contained in the order, to execute a counterpart of the lease in accordance with the agreement.

Norton, K.C., and G. B. Rashleigh, for the defendants, referred to Fry on Specific Performance (4th ed.), p. 350, par. 809, and p. 448, par 1039, and Price v. Dyer, 17 Ves. 365, and Robinson v. Page, 3 Russ. 114.

Rowden, K.C., and A. J. David, for the plaintiff.

BYRNE, J.—The first question is whether the memorandum of the 11th of December, 1903, taken by itself, amounts to an agreement to rescind the agreement contained in the order. I do not think that it was intended to operate as an agreement at all. I cannot think that a business man such as the plaintiff would be content to accept as an agreement a document headed "Topics of Conversation." The question therefore becomes this, How far can I receive parol evidence to prove what took place at the discussion between the parties? It appears to me that Price v. Dyer and Robinson v. Page are authorities showing that although you may prove rescission of a written agreement by parol evidence of a subsequent agreement, that means parol evidence of an agreement for rescission only, and does not mean parol evidence of an agreement to make alterations in the terms of an existing contract. In Price v. Dyer the Master of the Rolls said (p 363): "It is then said that the agreement was waived; and that a written agreement may be so far waived by parol that the court will refuse the interposition of its equitable jurisdiction to enforce it. Not conceiving that there was in this case any waiver within the meaning of the dicta or decisions upon this subject, it is not necessary for me to give a precise opinion upon the point; but, as at present advised, I incline to think that upon the doctrine of this court such would be the effect of a parol waiver clearly and satisfactorily proved; but here there was no such waiver. The waiver spoken of in the cases is an entire abandonment and dissolution of the contract; restoring the parties to their former situation." In the case before me although there is a contradiction between the parties, there is no contradiction between them on the point that all that was intended to be done at the interview was as to a variation in the terms of the original agreement. In Robinson v. Page the then Master of the Rolls said (p. 121): "Now, in the whole of this transaction it does not appear to me that, when the treaty was entered for this variation, there was any intention in the mind of the parties to abandon the original contract. It is laid down in the authority I have referred to" (Price v. Dyer) "that, where the parties have entered into a binding agreement in writing, and variations are afterwards introduced by parol, or by an instrument not signed according to the Statute of Frauds, these variations are not sufficient to prevent the execution of the agreement, and are no answer to a bill for specific performance." I think, therefore, that in this case Sir C. Rashleigh is entitled to have the terms of the agreement as they appear in the schedule to the order carried out. There will be a reference to chambers to settle the terms of the lease in case the parties differ.

Solicitors, Rashleigh, Son, & Hall; W. H. Martin.

Chan. Div. } April 19.
Farwell, J. }

STEVENS v. KING. (a.)

Will—Gift in satisfaction of debt—General power of appointment—Lapse.

Where, under a general testamentary power, a sum of money is appointed in satisfaction of a debt, such appointment will not fail owing to the death of the appointee in the testator's lifetime.

The trustee of a marriage settlement made certain over-payments to the tenant for life of the settled fund. In compliance with an order of the court the tenant for life by her will appointed a sum equal to the amount overpaid to her in favour of the said trustee, who subsequently died in her lifetime.

Held, that there was no lapse, and that the sum appointed as aforesaid became payable to the estate of the deceased trustee on the death of the tenant for life.

Williamson v. Naylor, 3 Y. & C. Ex. 208, and In re Sowerby's Trust, 2 K. & J. 630, followed.

Petition.

This was an application by the person entitled to a fund in court under an indenture of settlement, for the payment out of court of the said fund.

By an indenture of setttement dated the 26th of

(a.) Reported by H. WOLCOTT WARNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

April, 1860, and made between Blinks of the first part, Charlotte Stuart of the second part, and William King, the trustee, of the third part, in consideration of the then intended marriage between the said Blinks and Charlotte Stuart, the fund, the subject of this petition, was assigned to the said William King upon trust to pay the income thereof to the said Charlotte Stuart for her separate use without power of anticipation during her life, and after her death to stand possessed of the said fund and the income thereof upon such trusts as the said Charlotte Stuart should by will appoint, and in default of such appointment upon certain trusts therein mentioned.

The said intended marriage between Blinks and Charlotte Stuart was duly solemnized on the 29th of April, 1860.

It appeared from the evidence that King, the trustee, had from time to time made certain overpayments to the said Charlotte Blinks, the tenant for life, amounting in all to £284.

The said settlement was the subject of an administration action, and on such action coming on for further consideration the court ordered that Charlotte Blinks should pay interest to King in respect of the said sum of £284 during her life, and it was further ordered that the said Charlotte Blinks should, in exercise of the power in that behalf contained in the said indenture of settlement, execute a valid testamentary appointment of a sum of £284 in favour of the said William King; and that the said Charlotte Blinks should not invalidate such appointment by any subsequent exercise of the said power.

By her will dated the 14th of September, 1877, the said Charlotte Blinks, after appointing a sum of £500 to go in satisfaction of a debt, appointed a sum of £284 to William King, in compliance with the said order, and appointed her sister executrix of her will. William King, the trustee of the said settlement, died in the lifetime of the testatrix.

On the death of Charlotte Blinks, the tenant for life under the settlement, the fund in court became distributable. Accordingly the petitioner, who was entitled under the ultimate trusts of the settlement filed this petition for the payment out of court of the settled fund. The petition was opposed by the personal representative of William King on the ground that the gift to him under the will of Charlotte Blinks had not lapsed by reason of King's death in the lifetime of the testatrix, and that a sum of £284 was payable out of the fund in court to King's estate.

Hart, for the personal representative of William King.—The gift to King ought not to fail. Whether lapse occurs is a question of intention, and here the intention clearly is to satisfy a debt, and not merely to give a bounty. Gifts in satisfaction of a debt do not lapse as a general rule. The debt rather than the person is regarded: Williamson v. Naylor, 3 Y. & C Ex. 208; Philips v. Philips, 3 Hare 281; In re Sowerby's Trust, 2 K. & J. 630; Turner v. Martin, 7 De G. M. & G. 429. In the cases cited the gift took the form of a legacy, not an appointment, but the principle to be applied in this case is identical with that applied in the cited cases. Here the gift is made by order of the court in satisfaction of a debt, and effect ought to be given to it.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the petitioner.—The order was merely to execute a valid appointment, and thereafter not to invalidate it. The appointment to King shows no wider intention than to comply with the terms of the order. There is no reason why the general rule as to lapse should not apply.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: Charlotte Blinks, the tenant for life, admitted her liability to William King, her trustee, and undertook to execute such appointment in his favour as was ordered by the court. She did in fact execute such appointment by her will; she also appointed her sister executrix. It is alleged that the gift to William King lapses, owing to his death in the lifetime of the testatrix; whether this is so is a question of fact and of intention. In Williamson v. Naylor and in In re Sowerby's Trusts the court found that if the testator intended not merely to make a gift, but to perform a moral duty, and the duty still existed at the testator's death, although the legatee was dead, there was sufficient ground to prevent failure of the gift owing to lapse. It is clear in this case that the intention was not merely to make a gift, but to perform an obligation which in fact still existed at the testatrix's death. This is shown by the reference to the order of the court contained in the will, and by the appointment of an executrix who under the terms of the will would have no assets to deal with other than the appointed funds. If King had been paid off, either wholly or in part, during the lifetime of the testatrix, to that extent he would have been unable to take under the will. The conclusion at which I arrive is, that the gift to King does not lapse, and that the sum of £284 ought to be paid out of the fund in court to King's personal representative.

Solicitors, W. J. Fraser & Sons; W. W. Box.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) — JAN. 15, 18.

ASTON TUBE WORKS v. DUMBELL AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Practice—County court—Costs—Money paid into court—Remitted action—Defendant successful as to remainder of claim—Scale of costs applicable—Power of county court judge to give defendant costs—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 65—County Court Rules, ord. 14, r. 12; ord. 53, r. 18.

The plaintiffs brought the action to recover the sum of £71 for goods sold and delivered. An order was made under order 14 that, as regards £23 18s. 10d. of that amount, judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs unless that sum was paid into court, and the action was then remitted to the county court. The defendants gave notice that they consented to judgment being entered for the plaintiffs as regards the sum paid into court. At the trial the defendants succeeded as regards the rest of the claim with costs, and their bill was taxed by the registrar on Scale C, "when the subject-matter or sum recovered exceeds £50." The county court judge reversed this decision, and taxed defendants' costs on Scale B, "when the subject-matter or sum recovered exceeds £20 and does not exceed £50."

Held, that the action was an action for over £50, and that the defendants were therefore entitled to have their costs taxed on Scale C.

Appeal by the defendants and cross-appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of the Wolverhampton County Court.

The action was brought in the High Court by the plaintiff company to recover the sum of £71 for goods sold and delivered. An order was made that as regards £23 18s. 10d. of that amount judgment should be entered for the plaintiff company unless that sum was paid into court. The defendants paid that sum into court, and the action was then remitted for trial to the county court. The defendants gave notice that they did not defend the action as regards the amount paid into court. At the trial the defendants succeeded as regards the remainder of the claim, and judgment was entered for them with costs from the date of their consenting to judgment in respect of the £23. The registrar taxed the defendants' costs on the basis of Scale C, which is applicable "where the subject-matter or the sum recovered exceeds £50." On appeal to the county court judge he decided that the defendants were only entitled to have their costs taxed on the basis of Scale B, which is applicable "where the subject-matter, or sum recovered, exceeds £20 and does not exceed £50."

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From this decision the defendants appealed, and there was a cross-appeal by the plaintiffs against the allowance of any costs to the defendants.

Disturnal, for the defendants.

McCondie, for the plaintiffs.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Two important points are raised by the appeal and cross-appeal in this case. The first is whether the defendants who have succeeded, except as to £23, in an action brought against them for £71, and have obtained an order for their costs incurred after they consented to judgment for the £23, which they had brought into court under an order made under order 14, are entitled to costs on Scale B or Scale C of the scale of costs in use for the time being in the county court—that is, whether they are to be treated as having succeeded in respect of a claim exceeding £20, but not exceeding £50. The registrar taxed on Scale C. There was an application to the county court judge for a review of taxation. He decided that Scale B was applicable, and the defendants appeal from his decision. Now, I agree that the result of the authorities is that the action remains one action after the order sending it to the county court, and various consequences were pointed out in argument as following from that. For the plaintiffs it was argued from White v Headland's Patent Electric Storage Battery, 47 W. R. 273, [1899] 1 Q. B. 507, that the plaintiffs, having recovered £23 in the action for £71, the defendants could not be entitled to costs on the scale applicable where more than £50 has been recovered or claimed. In that case an action was brought in the High Court for £73. An order was made under order 14, giving the plaintiff leave to sign judgment for £53, and giving the defendants leave to defend as to the remainder, and it was ordered, under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, that the action should be sent for trial to the county court. The plaintiff signed judgment for the £53, and at the trial in the county court he got judgment for the remainder of his claim with costs. The Court of Appeal held that he was entitled to have his costs in the county court taxed according to Scale C. Now, assuming that the result of the trial in the county court had been the other way, it could not, I think, have been successfully contended the defendants were only entitled to costs on Scale B. Here the defendants having brought into court a sum which they say is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim, and being willing to submit to judgment for that sum and costs, the plaintiffs say it is not enough and seek to recover the whole £71, the contest between them being whether or not the plaintiffs are entitled to any more than they have got. Ord. 53, r. 1, of the County Court provides that where the costs of a defendant are being taxed, the word "recovered," wherever it occurs in the scale shall be deemed to be claimed. Applying that rule to the decision in White v. Headland's Patent Electric Storage Battery—namely, that the action is one action, I think it is clear that Scale C. is the scale applicable here, being the scale which applies to the amount originally claimed by the plaintiffs. If the plaintiffs had recovered the whole of the claim they would have been entitled to have their costs taxed upon Scale C, and I think it would be a great injustice if the defendants, who have succeeded as to the residue of their claim, were not also entitled to taxation upon Scale C, the scale of costs applicable being determined so far as they are concerned by the amount which the plaintiffs claim. I am therefore of opinion the defendants' appeal should be allowed. The second question which arises on the plaintiffs' appeal is whether the defendants are entitled to any costs at all. It was argued that as the defendants had paid the £23 into court under an order of the High Court made under order 14, the payment could not be treated as a payment into court to which the County Court Act and rules applied, and the county court judge therefore had no power so to treat it to give the defendants their costs. But the county court procedure is intended to deal with substance and not with form. There are no pleadings in the county court, and where the money is in court and the defendant gives notice to the plaintiff that he may take it in satisfaction of his claim, that is just as good a payment into court as it would be in the High Court if the provisions of ord. 22, r. 1 of the High Court rules were complied with.

It was also contended that the defendants were not entitled to any costs on the ground stated in dicta of Ridley and Darling, JJ., in Wright & Son v. Bull, [1902] 2 Q. B. 124, W. R. Dig. 53. In that case the action was brought in the High Court for £20 2s., and leave was given to the plaintiffs under order 14, to sign judgment for £14 if that sum was not paid within seven days. The defendant had leave to defend as to the residue of his claim, the action was sent for trial, under section 65 of the County Court Acts, 1888, in the county court. The defendant paid the £14 within seven days and at the trial in the county court judgment was given for him as to the residue, but no order was made as to costs.

The Divisional Court held that he was not entitled to any costs. In the course of his judgment Ridley, J., said: "Has the county court judge the same power over the costs which the High Court judge has? Can he say that the costs down to the recovery of the £14 must be borne by the defendant but the rest of the costs must be borne by the plaintiff? I do not think he has such a power, although I should be much inclined to say that he ought to exercise such a discretion if he possesses it. But the discretion of the judge is, by section 113 of the County Court Act, 1888, limited to costs not 'herein otherwise provided for, and that I think narrows the power of the county court judge to deal with the costs to such matters as are not dealt with by the general scheme of the Act. The section seems to me to have been put in with a view to include such costs as were not dealt with by the general enactment as to costs, but in the absence of any special direction it was provided that cost should abide the event." I cannot agree with these dicta. To my mind the suggestion cannot be accepted that the words "not herein otherwise provided for" narrow the power of the county court judges in such a way that he cannot deal with costs which are to follow the event in the absence of any special direction. "Otherwise provided for" means otherwise provided for in the rules. The dicta in the passage I have read were not necessary to the decision, because there had been no order as to costs. In that case section 50 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which gives the power to send certain actions of contract for trial in the county court, provides that "the action and all proceedings therein shall be tried and taken in such court as if the action had been originally commenced therein; and the costs of the parties in respect of proceedings subsequent to the order of the judge of the High Court shall be allowed according to the scale of costs for the time being in use in the county courts. Section 113 provides that all the "costs of any matter or action in the court not herein otherwise provided for shall be paid and apportioned in such manner as the court shall think just, and in default of any special direction shall abide the event of the action or matter. Reading those two sections together I think it is clear that the county court judge's discretion is not limited in the way suggested. It must, I think, be admitted, that if the action is an action in the county court the judge has a discretion under section 113. In my opinion the action, when transferred to the county court, must be conducted in the same way and with the same consequence as if it had been commenced in that court, and section 113 applies. It is not a sufficient answer for the plaintiffs to say that because they have recovered something the costs must be according to that result. The plaintiffs, appeal therefore fails. I wish to add that we decide this case on the understanding that the county court judge did not exercise his discretion, but thought he was bound to allow the defendants their costs on Scale B as being the scale legally applicable.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and have little to add. This order as to costs made by the county court judge was not made in the exercise of a judicial discretion between the two scales of costs; it was made upon a wrong view that Scale B, and not Scale C, was the scale legally applicable to the circumstances of the case before him. We should not, of course, interfere with his decision if he had only been considering whether as a matter of the proper exercise of his discretion he should give the defendants their costs on Scale B or on Scale C. But that is not so; he meant to give costs according to the scale provided in the Act, and his decision was founded, not upon an exercise of his discretion, but upon an erroneous application of principle. It was argued for the plaintiffs that in a scheme devised by the Legislature for the trial speedily and at a moderate expense of actions sent for trial in the county court there were no means by which the defendant could get his costs in the county court if he had paid money into court under an order made under section 14.

If that be so, the consequence follows that the defendant is exposed to the certainty of having to pay costs on Scale C if the plaintiff succeeds in the county court; but that if the plaintiff recovers nothing at all in the county court because the defendant has paid into court all that he owes, the defendant cannot be entitled to any costs at all. That is a startling view; and, speaking for myself, if I thought it was the true view to take I would never in such a case make an order for sending the case to the county court at all.

I am not fond of the argument at ab inconvenienti; but I think it may sometimes be legitimately used when the argument on the other side leads to a result so unjust as that which has been contended for here. I do not think the Legislature can have intended to bring about such a result, and one has to see whether some other view is not the true one. I agree with my lord's judgment both as to the dicta in Wright v. Ball and on the other points which have been argued in this case.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

Appeal of defendants allowed; plaintiffs' appeal dismissed; leave to appeal.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, A. H. Arnould & Co., for Buller & Cross, Birmingham.

Solicitors for the defendants, Christopher & Roney, for Hunt & Skidmore, Wolverhampton.

K. B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) — Dec. 18, 21; Feb. 1.

SURREY COMMERCIAL DOCKS CO. (Appellants) v. MAYOR, &c., OF BERMONDSEY (Respondents). (a.)

Local government—Metropolis—Notice before beginning to build—Authority conferred on dock company by private Act inconsistent with public Act — Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. clxvii.), s. 4—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 76.

The appellants, a dock company incorporated by Act of Parliament, obtained in 1894 statutory authority to extend and alter their works. In order to carry out those alterations it became necessary for the appellants to pull down a certain building and erect another on another site within the dock premises. This work they carried out, but gave no notice to the local authority of their intention to erect the new building.

Held, that there was no duty on the part of the appellants to give such notice of their intention to build under section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, which section provides that before beginning to lay or dig out the foundations of any new building seven days' notice is to be given to the local authority by the person intending to build, as the control of the local authority under that Act was inconsistent with the powers conferred upon the appellants under their statutory authority.

Case stated by G. Paul Taylor, Esq., metropolitan magistrate.

The appellants appeared in answer to a summons served upon them on behalf of the respondents charging that they, on the 3rd of April, 1903, unlawfully and without having given seven days' notice in writing to the respondents did begin to lay or dig out the foundation of a new building in Finland-yard, Redriffe-road, in the borough of Bermondsey, contrary to the provisions of section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855.

Upon the hearing of such summons the following facts were proved or admitted:

The appellants are a company constituted and incorporated under the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1864, for the purpose of carrying on the undertaking defined in section 15 of such Act, and for executing the works authorized by such Act, and for maintaining such undertaking and works.

The docks, basins, lands, buildings, and other premises, conveniences, and works defined in section 15, and authorized by section 53 of the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1864, are surrounded by and contained within dock fences and gates, within which the appellants have and exercise all the powers conferred upon them by the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1864, the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1894, and the Acts incorporated with such respective Acts or amending the same.

Portions of the appellants' said premises upon which warehouses, workshops, and other buildings are erected are entirely surrounded by water, and none of the portions so surrounded can be drained by gravitation into any sewers of the respondents outside the appellants' said premises. It would, however, be possible to drain them by syphons under the locks, but this would necessitate pumping and be very expensive.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondents are under and by virtue of the London Government Act, 1899, the successors of the vestry of the parish of Rotherhithe, in which parish, now part of the borough of Bermondsey, the appellants' premises are situate, and are the local authority for the purposes of section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and sections 37 and 38 of the Public Heath (London) Act, 1891. The appellants' premises are also situate within the district of the Port of London Sanitary Authority, which authority exercises certain powers under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, within the appellants' premises, under certain orders of the Local Government Board under section 112 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891.

By the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1894, the appellants were empowered to make and maintain the works described in section 4 of such Act, which works included a new road (No. 1) and "sewer commencing in Swing-bridge-road and terminating in Rotherhithe-road, and the raising and alteration of the levels of Swing-bridge-road between the western end of the swing bridge and the commencement of such new road (No. 1) and sewer." In connection with the works specially authorized by this section to make and maintain (inter alia) all necessary and proper embankments, approaches, roads, buildings, yards, and other works and conveniences, and to alter, break up, stop up, and divert any pipes, wires, tubes, sewers, drains, and other works on or under any lands within the limits of deviation.

Pursuant to the powers conferred on them by section 4 of the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1894, the appellants made the works mentioned in that section, and raised the level of the Swing-bridge-road. The raising of the level of the Swing-bridge-road has rendered it necessary for the appellants to construct an inclined approach for wheeled vehicles from such road to a yard belonging to the appellants called Finland-yard, on the south side of the Swing-bridge-road. This approach would, when completed, occupy the site of certain buildings in that yard consisting of an engineers' office and workshop for fitters and blacksmiths, and in order to construct the approach it became necessary for the appellants to demolish the buildings and erect other buildings instead thereof in the yard. The appellants have demolished the engineers' office, and are about to demolish the workshop for fitters and blacksmiths. They have constructed a temporary approach from and to the Swing-bridge-road to and from the yard, and have erected a new workshop in the yard, which is to be used in connection therewith for the purposes of the appellants' undertaking instead of the fitters' and blacksmiths' workshop.

The appellants did not give to the respondents any notice of their intention to lay or dig out the foundation of this building, but prior to erecting it they deposited with the Port of London Sanitary Authority detailed plans and specifications thereof. Such plans and specifications were duly approved by that authority, and the building was erected in conformity therewith.

Certain of the powers of a local authority under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and the Public Health (Amendment) Act, 1890, have been conferred upon the Port of London Sanitary Authority by orders of the Local Government Board under section 112 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, but not (inter alia) sections 37 and 38. The port sanitary authority claims to be the local authority within the dock walls of the appellants, and on the 5th of September, 1896, the medical officer of health of the said port sanitary authority wrote to the appellants' manager a letter, of which the following is a copy:

"Sir,—In order to avoid any uncertainty in the minds of your officers as to the exact position of the port sanitary authority with reference to sanitary matters, I have to point out that the port sanitary authority is the local authority within the dock walls. Will you kindly give instructions to your dock officials that no sanitary works should be carried out without first submitting detailed plans and specifications thereof to this office and obtaining official sanction. Sanitary works will include all works in connection with the erection, alteration, and repair of water-closets or privies, urinals, drains, &c. Such an instruction will save the dock company much trouble and expense.—Your obedient servant, W. Collingridge, Medical Officer of Health"

On behalf of the appellants, it was contended that the erection of the new building was rendered necessary by the alteration of the level of the Swing-bridge-road. That such erection was a work the appellants were authorized by section 4 of the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1894, to make. That the respondents had no power to control them in the exercise of their powers under that section, and that the appellants were under no obligation to serve notice on the respondents of their intention to lay or dig out the foundations of the said new building under section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, that section, so far as buildings erected pursuant to their special Act were concerned, having been repealed by implication by the special Act. In support of the appellants' contention, the following cases were cited: City and South London Railway Co. v. London County Council, 40 W. R. 166, [1891] 2 Q. B. 513; London County Council v. London School Board, 40 W. R. 604 [1892] 2 Q B 606.

On behalf of the respondents, it was contended that the appellants were bound to give them notice under section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, which section provides (inter alia) that before beginning to lay out or dig the foundation of any new house or building within any parish or district, seven days' notice in writing shall be given to the vestry by the person intending to build such house or building. That there was no clause in the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1894, expressly repealing section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. That the powers conferred by the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1894, or any other Act conferring powers upon the dock company, could not be held to repeal by implication section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, unless it could be shown that the two Acts were inconsistent. That there was no inconsistency in the appellants' having power to erect buildings and giving the respondents the notice specified in section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the following cases being quoted in support of the respondents' contention: Whitechapel Board of Works v. Crow, (1901) 65 J. P. 549, 49 W. R. Dig. 117; Uckfield Rural District Council v. Crowborough District Water Co., 48 W. R. 63, [1899] 2 Q. B. 664; Grand Junction Waterworks Co. v. Hampton Urban District Council, 46 W. R. 614, (1898) 62 J. P. 566; London County Council v. Wandsworth and Putney Gas Co., (1900) 64 J. P. 500, 48 W. R. Dig. 120; Charing Cross and Strand Electricity Supply Corporation v. Woodthorpe, (1903) 67 J. P. 286, 51 W. R. Dig. 108.

That the contention of the port sanitary authority that they are the sole local authority with reference to sanitary matters is not true, in view of the fact that the particular powers conferred upon the port sanitary authority by the orders issued by the Local Government Board, dated the 25th of March, 1892, the 29th of December, 1894, and the 30th of June, 1899, neither specifically excluded the powers of the respondents arising under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, nor their powers as a sanitary authority arising under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, other than those transferred by the said orders. Among the powers not so transferred are the powers under sections 37 and 38 of the said Act, and it was urged, on behalf of the respondents, that unless they were entitled to notice under section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, buildings might be erected without their knowledge as in the present case, and so without any opportunity on their part of securing in their construction compliance with the provisions of the said sections.

The learned magistate found as a fact that the new building was a building within the meaning of section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and had been erected by the appellants upon land belonging to them within the limits of deviation shown on the deposited plans referred to in section 4 of the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1894, and that the erection of the new building had been rendered necessary by the raising and alteration of the levels of the Swing-bridge-road authorized by the last-mentioned section.

He was, however, of the opinion that the provisions of section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, are not inconsistent with the provisions of section 4 of the Surrey Commercial Dock Act, 1894, and therefore held that the provisions of section 76 of the said of Act of 1855, requiring notice to be given to the respondents before beginning to lay or dig out the foundations of any building within that section, were not repealed with regard to buildings erected by the appellants pursuant to section 4 of the said Act of 1894, and that the appellants had been guilty of the offence alleged in the said summons.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether or not this determination was correct in law.

Macmorran, K.C. (Cunningham Glen with him), for the appellants.

Avory, K.C. (H. C. Biron with him), for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 1.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the judgment of the court:

This is a special case stated by Mr. Paul Taylor, one of the metropolitan magistrates, and raises a point of some importance under section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. The appellants are the Surrey Commercial Dock Co. and the respondents the Corporation of Bermondsey, the successors of the Vestry of Rotherhithe. The area of the appellants' docks is within the area of the borough. The appellants are a company incorporated under the Commercial Dock Act, 1864, for the purpose of carrying on the undertaking mentioned in section 15 of that Act. The statute of 1864 does not appear to contain any clause dealing specially with the Metropolis Management Act, unless it be section 125, upon which no reliance was placed by the respondents. In the year 1894 the appellants obtained statutory powers to make certain alterations in their dock premises, all of which were situated within the area of their undertaking under the Act of 1864; and by section 4 of the Act of 1894 the company were authorized to make and maintain, among other works, "a new road (No. 1) and sewer, commencing in Swing-bridge-road and terminating in Rotherhithe Lower-road, and the raising and alteration of the levels of the Swing-bridge-road between the western end of the swing bridge and the commencement of such new road (No. 1) and sewer." This section, in enumerating the particular works, gave the company power, subject to the provisions of the Act, to make and maintain all necessary and proper sewers, drains, culverts, buildings, yard, and other works, and to alter, break up, stop up and divert any pipes, sewers, drains, and other works on or under any lands within the limits of deviation. The appellant company subsequently raised the level of the swing bridge, as they were empowered to do under this section, and constructed the new bridge, and this alteration involved the occupation of the site of certain buildings of the yard, among others a workshop for fitters. In consequence the appellants demolished the workshop for fitters, and erected a new workshop upon another site within the ambit of their dock premises, such site, as the plans attached to the case show, being wholly surrounded by docks.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that prior to the commencement of digging out the foundation of the new workshop it was incumbent upon the appellants to give notice to the respondents under section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and that the foundations must be laid at such a level as would permit the drainage of the workshop in accordance with the Act and as the respondent board should order, and that any drain from the workshop must be constructed in accordance with the directions of the vestry under that section. It was contended on behalf of the appellants that, having regard to the statutory powers already referred to, it was not incumbent upon the appellant company to give notice under section 76, but the power and responsibility of deciding as to any drains within the statutory area was vested in the appellant company, and that the respondents had no jurisdiction—at any rate, as far as section 76 was concerned—in that area. Beyond the sections to which we have already referred, no direct assistance can be gathered from any other sections, but it is not unimportant to observe that section 19 does require notice to be given to the respondents where any work to be done, by virtue of the Act of 1894, may pass over, under, or by the side of or interfere with any sewer under their control; and section 27 imposed restrictions with regard to the building line upon buildings erected upon land purchased by the company, and sub-section (8) of section 29 subjected any buildings erected or provided by them to the provisions of the Metropolis Building Act, 1855, and the Metropolis Management Act, 1855.

The learned magistrate decided that the new workshop was a building within the meaning of section 76, that it had been erected on land belonging to the appellants within the limits of deviation shown in the deposited plans referred to in section 4 of the Act of 1894, but he held that the provisions of the Act of 1894 were not inconsistent with section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and that therefore the appellants ought to have given notice. The question appears to us to be one of considerable difficulty. In favour of the respondents it may be urged that the new workshop is not a work specially authorized by the Act of 1894, but is only consequential on the demolition of the old workshop in consequence of the alteration of the Bridge-road, necessitated by the raising of the level of the Swing Bridge-road, and if this be so there does not seem to be any reason why the provisions of a general Act applicable to the area in which the proposed building is situated should not apply. Upon the other hand it may be urged that the control of the respondents in the matter of foundations is inconsistent with the power and duty of the dock company properly to maintain the works within their area, and that the statute clearly contemplates that the duty of providing the necessary works, and of taking the proper precautions for their construction and maintenance, should rest with the dock company. In this view it would, of course, be inconsistent with this argument that the local authority should be able to deal with the question of the depth of foundation which might in some cases affect the stability of other works which the dock company have been authorised and empowered to maintain. In favour of the appellants the judgment in the City and South London Railway Co. v. London County Council, 40 W. R. 166, [1891] 2 Q. B. 513, was relied upon, and to a certain extent it is an authority in their favour; it does not, however, seem to conclude the case altogether. That was a case in which the London County Council complained that a station erected by the City and South London Railway Co. did not conform with the general building line. The Queen's Bench Division and the Court of Appeal decided that the company were not bound by the provisions of the Metropolis Management Act in that respect, notwithstanding that the building could have been erected within the general line of buildings without any inconvenience except a considerable expense. In that case the Court of Appeal held that if the buildings which the railway company were erecting were buildings necessary for the statutory purpose it was not within the power of the county council to dictate how in particular they should construct them. That case cannot be regarded as a direct authority for the point raised in the present case, because, as we have already pointed out, the work here constructed was not a work expressly authorized as in the City and South London Railway Co.'s case, but it was only something which the court found it necessary to do in consequence of a building previously existing having been destroyed by the works specially authorized. It is, however, found by the learned magistrate, in the case, that the erection of the new building had been rendered necessary by the raising and alteration of the levels of the swing bridge authorized by section 4 of the Act of 1894. Upon the whole we are of the opinion that the principle ought to be extended to this case. It seems to us that dealing with a statutory undertaking as to which rights and obligations are imposed by statute upon a particular body, express enactment or a clear implication is necessary in order to transfer the responsibility to a body acting under a general statute. We think also that to a certain extent the reference to the Metropolis Management Acts in the latter section of the statute to which we have referred confirms this view. We however decide the case upon the broad principle that the interference of control involved in section 76 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, is inconsistent with the powers conferred upon the appellants under their statutory authority. It was said that this view was contrary to a decision of the court in the Charing Cross Electric Supply Association v. Woodthorpe, but when that case is examined that will not be found to be so. In that case the question arose as to notice being given to a number of public authorities, and it was alleged that because a provisional order confirmed by Act of Parliament gave the Board of Trade and the Postmaster-General certain rights of control over the character of certain structures that excluded the necessity of complying with the provisions of the London Building Act, 1894. The court decided in that case that the protection given to one class of the public by the control of those two authorities—namely, the Board of Trade and the Postmaster-General, ought not to deprive the public of the protection given to them by the London Building Act. That decision obviously in no way conflicts with the judgment which we are giving. For those reasons we are of opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, W. R. Millar & Sons.

Solicitor for the respondents, Frederick Ryall.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — April 14.

CHELSEA WATERWORKS CO. v. METROPOLITAN WATER BOARD. (a.)

Waterworks—Dividend—"Prescribed rate"—Preference stock—"Paid-up capital in the company"—Dividend not prescribed in special Act—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 2, 75—Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 118), s. 13.

By section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, "the profits of the undertaking to be divided among the undertakers in any year shall not exceed the prescribed rate, or, where no rate is prescribed, they shall not exceed the rate of ten pounds in the hundred by the year on the paid-up capital in the undertaking, which in such case shall be deemed the prescribed rate, unless a larger dividend be at any time necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend." By section 2, "prescribed" means prescribed in the special Act. By section 13 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, where any company is authorized by a special Act to be thereafter passed to issue any preference stock, the company may issue such stock at a rate of dividend not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum.

A waterworks company was authorized by its special Acts of 1864 and 1875, which incorporated the Waterworks Clauses and the Companies Clauses Acts, to issue preference stock. No rate of dividend was specified in either of the special Acts. The company issued preference stock bearing interest at the rate of 4½ and 5 per cent. per annum respectively.

Held, that the "prescribed rate" for the preference stock, within the meaning of section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, was 4½ and 5 per cent. respectively.

Case stated by the Court of Arbitration (Sir Edward Fry, Sir Hugh Owen, and Sir J. Wolfe Barry) appointed under the Metropolis Water Act, 1902, to assess the compensation payable upon the purchase of the Metropolitan water companies.

During the hearing of the arbitration in connection with the Chelsea Waterworks Co. it appeared that the total capital of the Chelsea Co. in shares and stock created, issued, and paid up consists of the following items—viz., £782,322 ordinary stock; £150,000 5 per cent. preference stock; £160,000 4½ per cent. preference stock; £643 4½ per cent. convertible preference stock; making in all £1,092,965.

The arbitrators held that on the true construction of the Chelsea Co.'s Acts, 1852, 1864, and 1875, and the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, the rates of 5 per cent. and 4½ per cent. on the above-mentioned 5 per cent. preference stock and 4½ per cent. preference stock (other than the above-named 4½ per cent. convertible preference stock) were the prescribed rates on those stocks respectively, and that the company were entitled to divide as maximum dividends the sums of 10 per cent. on the sums of £782,322 ordinary stock and £643 4½ per cent. convertible preference stock, of 5 per cent. on the sum of £150,000 5 per cent. preference stock, and of 4½ per cent. on the sum of £160,000 4½ per cent. preference stock, and no more.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The court awarded to the Chelsea Co. as follows: (a) If the Court of Appeal shall hold that we were right in our decision of the said point of law, then the sum of £3,305,700. (b) If the Court of Appeal shall hold that, according to the construction of the said Acts, the company are entitled to divide as a maximum dividend the sum of 10 per cent. on the total capital of £1,092 965, then the sum of £3,418,000. (c) If the Court of Appeal shall put any other construction on the said Acts than one or other of the constructions hereinbefore mentioned, then the award is to be returned to us with a declaration of the true construction of the said Acts in order that we may make another award in compliance with the said declaration.

None of the Chelsea Waterworks Co.'s special Acts prescribed any rate of dividend. The above-mentioned 5 per cent. and 4½ per cent. preference stocks were issued by the company under the company's special Acts of 1864 and 1875, as hereinafter mentioned.

By the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, s. 75, "the profits of the undertaking to be divided among the undertakers in any year shall not exceed the prescribed rate, or, where no rate is prescribed, they shall not exceed the rate of ten pounds in the hundred by the year on the paid-up capital in the undertaking, which in such case shall be deemed the prescribed rate, unless a larger dividend be at any time necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of the said yearly rate." By section 2, "the expression 'the special Act' used in this Act shall be construed to mean any Act which shall be hereafter passed authorizing the construction of waterworks, and with which this Act shall be incorporated; and the word 'prescribed' used in this Act in reference to any matter herein stated shall be construed to refer to such matter as the same shall be prescribed or provided for in the special Act, and the sentence in which such word occurs shall be construed as if, instead of the word 'prescribed' the expression 'prescribed for that purpose in the special Act' had been used."

By the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, s. 13 (which was in Part II. of the Act), "where any such company"—that is, any company incorporated either before or after the passing of this Act for the purpose of carrying on any undertaking—"is authorized by any special Act hereafter passed and incorporating this part of this Act to raise any additional sum or sums by the issue of new preference shares, or by the issue of new preference stock, or (at the option of the company) by either of those modes, then in every such case the company . . . may . . . from time to time create and issue . . . such new shares or new stock, either ordinary or preference, and either of one class and with like privileges, or of several classes and with different privileges, and of the same or different amounts, and respectively with any fixed, fluctuating, contingent, preferential, perpetual, terminable, deferred, or other dividend or interest, not exceeding the rate prescribed in the special Act, and if no rate is prescribed, then not exceeding the rate of five pounds per centum per annum, and subject (as to any such new shares) to the payment of calls of such amounts and at such times as the company from time to time thinks fit."

The Chelsea Waterworks Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. clvi.), by section 13, incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and by sections 16-21 divided the capital of the company into ordinary shares, giving power to the company to issue new shares. By the Chelsea Waterworks Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. xxxix.), s. 7, Parts II. and III. of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, were incorporated in the Act. Section 8 empowered the company to raise, by way of additional capital, any sum not exceeding £285 000 by the issue of new ordinary shares, or by the issue of new preference stock, or (at the option of the company) by all or any of those modes. Under this Act the company issued the £150,000 5 per cent. preference stock. By the Chelsea Waterworks Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. cviii.), s. 2, certain parts, including Part II., of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, and, with respect (inter alia) to the amount of profit to be received by the undertakers, the Waterworks Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1863, were incorporated with and formed part of the Act. By section 7 the company were empowered from time to time to raise, by the creation and issue of new shares or new stock, whether preferential or ordinary, or both, any further sums not exceeding in the whole £160 000. Under this Act the company issued the £160 000 4½ per cent. preference stock.

Sir Edward Fry, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Arbitration, said that two important questions arose for their determination. The first was, what was the meaning of "the paid up capital in the undertaking" in section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847? He had no doubt that it meant the whole sum of £1,092,965; it was not the ordinary share capital of the undertaking, it was the paid-up capital of the undertaking, and it dealt with that. If nothing else had occurred the rights of the shareholders would be these—in no case could the profits to be divided ever go beyond 10 per cent. on that £1,092,965, the total ordinary and preference capital of the company. When they came to be divided the preference shareholders would be entitled to their preferential dividends, and the whole residue of net profits, after payment of those dividends, would be divisible among the ordinary shareholders, and their right to dividend would be their aliquot portion of that surplus revenue after paying the preferential dividend, and any deficiency in the dividend would be the difference between what they actually received and what they would have been entitled to receive by a division of that entire surplus profit. The second question was whether a rate had been "prescribed" as to the whole or any part of the capital of the company. Section 2 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, showed that by the words "prescribed rate" was meant a rate prescribed by statute. Had any rate been prescribed by statute? In the two special Acts of 1864 and 1875, under which the preference stocks were issued, there was incorporated that part of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, which included section 13. In neither of those two special Acts was any special rate prescribed. Section 13 provided for a rate "if no rate is prescribed then not exceeding the rate of five pounds per centum per annum." In their opinion that was a prescription of a rate. It was a prescription by statute; it was a limitation by statute of the right to receive more than five per cent. or such less sum as the company might determine. With regard to the 5 per cent. preference stock, therefore, they held that that clause applied, and that no more than 5 per cent. could be deemed to be the prescribed amount. With regard to the 4½ per cent. preference stock, the question was not quite so clear, but in their judgment the same conclusion must be arrived at, and for this reason, that what was prescribed was a rate not exceeding £5 per cent. per annum. That seemed to delegate to the company the right of prescribing something less than 5 per cent. Therefore they thought that the 4½ per cent. must be taken as that amount, and that therefore there was a right to receive only 10 per cent. on the ordinary capital and 5 per cent. and 4½ per cent. respectively on the two classes of preferential capital.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C., Haldane, K.C., E. Boyle, K.C., and Boydell Houghton, for the Chelsea Waterworks Co.—The words "the paid-up capital in the undertaking," in section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, mean the whole of the paid-up capital, both preference and ordinary. It is a domestic arrangement among the various shareholders that some should agree to take a fixed rate of dividend at 4½ or 5 per cent., which is not touched by section 75. Section 75 was passed for the protection of the public so as to prevent the payment of dividends at a greater rate than 10 per cent. per annum on the whole paid-up capital of the company. The court of arbitration took this view of section 75, but held that the effect of section 13 of the Companies Act, 1863, is to "prescribe" a rate of dividend on preference shares and stock not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum—that is not a correct construction of the Act. It is not a prescription of a rate within the meaning of sections 2 and 75 of the Act of 1847. The Legislature could not have intended by a general Act, applicable to all kinds of companies, to cut down the special rights conferred upon shareholders in waterworks companies by section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. Further, even if section 13 of the Companies Act, 1863, prescribed a rate of dividend in the case of the 5 per cent. preference stock, there was no "prescribed rate" in the case of the 4½ per cent. preference stock.

J. F. Moulton, K.C., J. D. Fitzgerald, K.C., and A. B. Shaw, for the Metropolitan Water Board, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the Court of Arbitration appointed under the Metropolis Water Act, 1902, and the question is whether, upon the true construction of section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, the company are entitled to distribute among the ordinary shareholders in the shape of dividends a sum which would result in those shareholders receiving dividends exceeding 10 per cent. per annum upon the ordinary stock of the company. [His lordship read section 75 of the Act of 1847 and the definitions of "the special Act" and "prescribed" in section 2, and continued:] Part of the capital of the company consist of preference stock, some carrying interest at the rate of 5 per cent. and some at the rate of 4½ per cent. It is contended that the only rate "prescribed" is the rate of 10 per cent. prescribed by section 75 of the Act of 1847, inasmuch as the special Acts do not prescribe any rate, and that if the full amount of dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. upon the whole of the capital of the company is still unexhausted, then, even though a portion of the capital may consist of 5 per cent. or 4½ per cent. preference stock, the sum available for distribution under the section must be applied to make up the dividends to 10 per cent. upon the whole capital, though as between the ordinary and preference shareholders the latter could only claim 5 per cent. or 4½ per cent. respectively on their shares, and to that extent the ordinary shareholders would benefit by it. That depends upon whether the preference stock has a "prescribed rate" of dividend. It seems to me that Sir Edward Fry has arrived at a correct conclusion, that there is a prescribed rate of dividend in respect of the different classes of capital in the company. There is a rate of 10 per cent. prescribed by section 75 of the Act of 1847 in respect of the ordinary stock, and with respect to the preference stock there are statutory provisions as to the creation and issue of preference shares and stock, by reason of which 5 per cent. and 4½ per cent. are respectively the prescribed rates of dividend on those classes of stock. The special Acts of 1864 and 1875 under which the preference stocks were issued, incorporate that part of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, which contains section 13, and upon looking at that section I find a limit of dividend for preference shares and preference stock prescribed, such dividend not to exceed the rate of £5 per centum per annum. That part of the Act is to be read into and to form part of the special Acts, and the rate there mentioned is the prescribed statutory rate. There is, therefore, a rate "prescribed for that purpose in the special Act" as to the 5 per cent. preference stock, and that is the prescribed rate."

With regard to the 4½ per cent. preference stock, in my opinion Sir Edward Fry and his colleagues are right upon that also. The Legislature has given the company power to issue preference stock at any rate of dividend not exceeding the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. When that statutory power is exercised the rate becomes a "prescribed rate," and the company are not entitled to distribute more than that rate of dividend. There is, therefore, a prescribed rate by statute for both the preference stocks and a prescribed rate of 10 per cent. for the ordinary stock by section 75 of the Act of 1847. The appeal consequently failed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with the reasons given by Sir Edward Fry, and with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and I have nothing to add.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the Chelsea Waterworks Co., Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

Solicitors for the Metropolitan Water Board, Linklater, Addison, Brown, & Jones.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — April 13.

ANDREW v. FAILSWORTH INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Death from lightning—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.

A bricklayer was killed by lightning while working at a height of 23 feet above the level of the ground on a scaffolding which was being used for the purpose of constructing a building more than 30 feet in height. In proceedings taken by his widow under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, expert evidence was given to the effect that the deceased man's risk of being struck by lightning was appreciably increased by reason of the exposed position in which he was working at the time.

Held, that the county court judge was justified in coming to the conclusion that the deceased was killed by an accident arising out of, as well as in the course of, his employment.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from an award of Judge Bradbury, sitting in the Oldham County Court, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of a deceased workman, who met with his death by being struck by lightning while working in the employment of the Failsworth Industrial Society (Limited).

At the hearing of the arbitration it was proved or admitted that the deceased man was a bricklayer, and that he was working in the erection of a building exceeding 30ft. in height, which was being constructed by the employers by means of a scaffolding, and that at the moment when he was struck by lightning he was working with another man on the scaffolding about 23ft. above the level of the ground.

The employers contended that the accident did not arise out of the deceased man's employment, but was an act of God. They relied on Armitage v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., [1902] 2 K. B. 178, 50 W. R. Dig. 112, as showing that there must be some connection between the accident and the employment.

The county court judge adjourned the case in order that expert evidence might be called as to whether there had been an abnormal degree of danger from lightning to the deceased by reason of the place in which he was working at the time.

At the adjourned hearing the following expert evidence was given by Dr. Garrard, an engineer and electrician: "I have been told of the place and circumstances in which the deceased man was working. He was on a scaffold 23ft. from the ground. I consider that a very exposed position. If it is wet the danger is increased. The main fact is the elevation above the earth. Another feature is that he would constitute a well-defined point at which a discharge would be more likely to occur. Buildings and other erections afford protection over a space which diminishes as you ascend vertically. If you draw a line at an angle of 45 degrees from the highest point of an erection to the earth, persons within the cone are protected, and it is, therefore, clear that, as you ascend, the zone of safety diminishes. I consider that a man working on an elevated scaffold runs an appreciably greater risk from that fact."

The county court judge made an award in favour of the applicant. In the course of his judgment he said as follows: "The question is, did the accident arise out of the employment? It no doubt arose in the course of the employment, but that is not sufficient; it must also arise out of the employment. . . . Mr. Elliott says the accident must arise out of the work which the man was doing, and he says that, if there is no connection between the work and the accident, then it does not arise out of the employment. I am bound to say that I cannot agree with that. Though it may not be connected with or have any relation to the work the man was doing, yet if in point of fact the position in which the man was doing the work, and the place he must necessarily occupy whilst doing the work, are a position and place of danger which caused the accident, it may be fairly said that it arose out of the employment, not because of the work, but because of the position. . . . In this case, therefore, if I come to the conclusion that, as a matter of fact, the position in which the man was working was dangerous, and that in consequence of the dangerous position the accident occurred, I could fairly hold that the accident arose out of the employment. Now, was it a dangerous position? Was the man exposed to something more than the normal risk which everybody, so to speak, incurs at any time and in any place during a thunderstorm? We know that lightning is erratic, and possibly no position and circumstances can afford absolute safety. But if there is under particular circumstances in a particular vocation something appreciably and substantially beyond the ordinary normal risk which ordinary people run, and which is a necessary concomitant of the occupation the man is engaged in, then I am entitled to say that the extra danger to which the man is exposed is something arising out of his employment; and if in consequence of that extra danger a fatality occurs, I am entitled to say that the section applies and the applicant is entitled to recover. I have had some evidence on the point, and the evidence, especially that of Dr. Garrard, seems to me to entitle me properly to come to the conclusion that in this case, under the circumstances, there was a substantial, abnormally increased risk, owing to the position or place in which the man had to work; and, in accordance with the principles before stated, which I think should govern the case, I find that the accident did arise out of the employment, and I give judgment for the widow for £300, and costs."

The employers appealed.

Arthur Powell, K.C., and Adshead Elliott, for the employers.—The accident in this case was not an accident arising out of the employment any more than in the case of Armitage v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., where a workman engaged at his work was accidentally injured through the tortious act of a fellow-workman which had no relation whatever to their employment. In the Scotch case of Falconer v. London and Glasgow Engineering Co., 3 Fras. 564, 38 Sc. L. R. 381, Lord Trayner referred to this very case of a man being struck by lightning. He said: "A servant engaged in a foundry-yard if struck by lightning in the course of his employment and seriously maimed would have no claim to compensation under the Act, nor would his representatives have a claim if he was killed."

C. A. Russell, K.C., and H. Holman Gregory, for the applicant.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion this is a perfectly clear case. The primâ facie difficulty has been pointed out and dealt with in the remarkably lucid judgment of the county court judge. He refers to the crucial point, and deals with what I may call the fallacies of the employers' argument. [His lordship read the judgment.] I cannot frame a more accurate direction than that given by the county court judge, and I think the evidence justifies the conclusion at which he arrived. Although the event of being struck by lightning has been referred to by judges as a typical instance of an accident not arising out of a man's employment, and as being, on the contrary, primâ facie, an instance of something arising altogether outside a man's employment, I think that that primâ facie view may be rebutted. The dictum on which the employers have sought to rely must, it seems to me, be taken as referring to a case in which the factors on which the county court judge in this case has based his judgment were eliminated. I am of opinion that there was evidence in this case which justified the county court judge in coming to the conclusion that the deceased was killed by an accident arising out of, as well as in the course of, his employment.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for G. P. Fripp, Oldham.

Solicitors for the employers, W. Hurd & Son, for Chapman & Brooks, Manchester.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) March 29.

BUSHELL v. HAMMOND. (a.)

Licensing law—Control of justices over licensed premises—Power to order alterations on renewing licence—"Part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold or consumed"—Premises with front and back entrances—Jurisdiction to order back entrance to be closed—Licensing Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 28), s. 11, sub-section 4.

Under section 11, sub-section 4, of the Licensing Act, 1902, where an application is made for the renewal of a licence in respect of premises which have both a front and a back entrance, the justices have power, on renewing the licence, to order the back entrance to be closed, although there is no evidence that intoxicating liquor has ever been sold or consumed at the back entrance or in the passage immediately inside the back entrance.

Judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ. (51 W. R. 695), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) on a case stated by the East Kent Quarter Sessions on the hearing of an appeal from an order made by the respondents, the justices of Ramsgate, under section 11, sub-section 4, of the Licensing Act, 1902 (51 W. R. 695).

The appellant, G. H. Bushell, was the tenant of a fully-licensed public-house known as the "Coach and Horses," Ramsgate, under a licence which, unless renewed, would have expired on the 5th of April, 1903.

At the general annual licensing meeting for Ramsgate held in February, 1903, the appellant applied for a renewal of his licence. The justices required the production of a plan of the premises, and at the adjourned meeting in March they renewed the licence and at the same time ordered that the appellant should close the back entrance to the premises with a substantial gate, to be kept locked, except for the purpose of delivering beer, coals, or other goods, or for private use by the tenant or his household. This back entrance gave access to the premises from a public passage leading out of a back street. Immediately inside the entrance was a passage leading to the bar.

The appellant, being dissatisfied with this order, appealed to quarter sessions.

Section 11, sub-section 4, of the Licensing Act, 1902, under which the licensing justices purported to act, is as follows:

"On any application for the renewal of a licence for the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors to be consumed on the premises, the licensing justices may require a plan of the premises to be produced before them, and to be deposited with their clerk, and, on renewing any such licence, they may by order direct that, within a time fixed by the order, such alterations as they think reasonably necessary to secure the proper conduct of the business shall be made in that part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold or consumed, but any such order shall be subject to an appeal to a court of quarter sessions, as provided by the Alehouse Act, 1828, and, if any such order for structural alteration is made and complied with, no further requisition for the structural alteration of the premises shall be made within the next five years. If the licensed person makes default in complying with any such order, he shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a fine not exceeding twenty shillings for every day during which the default continues."

On the hearing of the appeal before the quarter sessions it was proved that intoxicating liquor was sold and consumed in the bar, bar parlour, and club room, but that no intoxicating liquor was sold at or near the back entrance or in the passage leading thereto. No evidence was given that any intoxicating liquor was consumed at the back entrance or in the passage leading thereto, but it was admitted that there was nothing to prevent such consumption, and that the back entrance and passage were in fact used by customers for entering and leaving the premises. It was proved that it entailed extra work on the police to exercise the supervision necessary to secure the proper conduct of the business so long as the back entrance remained unclosed.

It was contended by the appellant that the respondents had no jurisdiction to make the order, on the ground that it was not an order for an alteration in that part of the premises where intoxicating liquor was sold or consumed.

The quarter sessions held that the justices had jurisdiction to make the order under the Act, and dismissed the appeal.

On the hearing of the special case, the Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the quarter sessions.

The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

J. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and G. F. Hohler, for the appellant.—The power to order alterations under sub-section 4 of section 11 of the Licensing Act, 1902, is expressly limited to alterations "in that part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold or consumed." A distinction is to be observed between this sub-section and sub-section 2. That sub-section forbids the making of alterations in licensed premises without the consent of the licensing justices. There the phraseology is much wider: "Any alteration in any licensed premises for the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors to be consumed thereon, which gives increased facilities for drinking, or which affects the communication between the part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold and any other part of the premises or any street or other public way, shall not be made without the consent of the licensing justices."

Dickens, K.C., and J. W. W. Weigall, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court, affirming a decision of quarter sessions on an appeal from licensing justices. The question is whether the licensing justices had jurisdiction, under section 11, sub-section 4, of the Licensing Act, 1902, to order a certain alteration to be made in licensed premises in respect of which an application had been made for a renewal. The justices, as they had the power to do, under that sub-section, required a plan of the premises to be produced and deposited with their clerk. This was done, and the plan showed that the premises had a means of access from a back street through an open passage, as well as the proper front entrance in the main street. The justices, thereupon, on renewing the licence, made an order which, while remedying the evil arising from the house having two entrances, involved the least alteration in the premises and the smallest inconvenience to the occupier. Instead of making any more drastic order, they required the appellant not to allow the back entrance to be used except for the purpose of delivering goods or by the members of his family. It is said that this order was outside their jurisdiction.

By sub-section 4 of section 11 of the Licensing Act, 1902, "On any application for the renewal of a licence for the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors to be consumed on the premises, the licensing justices may require a plan of the premises to be produced before them and to be deposited with their clerk, and, on renewing such licence, they may by order direct that, within a time fixed by the order, such alterations as they think reasonably necessary to secure the proper conduct of the business shall be made in that part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold or consumed." The justices, as I have said, on renewing the licence, made the order which I have mentioned, thinking that the alteration which they directed was one reasonably necessary to secure the proper conduct of the business. The quarter sessions thought that the order made by the licensing justices was reasonable, if it was within their power, and they held that it was within their power, and they dismissed the appeal brought to them subject to this case. The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the quarter sessions.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In order to understand sub-section 4 of section 11 of the Licensing Act, 1902, it is necessary to look at the whole section. The side note of the section, which I think it is permissible to refer to, though it does not form part of the statute itself, is as follows: "Control of justices over structure of licensed premises." Sub-section 1 says that a person intending to apply for a new licence shall deposit with the clerk to the licensing justices a plan of the premises in respect of which the application is to be made. Then sub-section 2 is as follows: "Any alteration in any licensed premises for the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors to be consumed thereon, which gives increased facilities for drinking, or conceals from observation any part of the premises used for drinking, or which affects the communication between the part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold and any other part of the premises or any street or other public way, shall not be made without the consent of the licensing justices . . . and, if any such alteration is made . . . without such consent as aforesaid, a court of summary jurisdiction, on complaint, may by order declare the licence to be forfeited, or direct that, within a time fixed by the order, the premises shall be restored to their original condition." Sub-section 3 deals with the rights of owners of premises when a licence had been forfeited. Then comes sub section 4, which I have read.

I think that sub-section 2 and sub-section 4 must be read together. Sub-section 2 applies where premises are already licensed, and it says that certain alterations, which it describes, shall not be made without the consent of the justices. Sub-section 4 applies where a renewal of a licence is being asked for, and it gives the justices the power to order certain alterations to be made. One of the alterations not to be made is a thing which clearly exists in the premises in this case. The mischief which the Legislature desired to prevent or to control was the doing or allowing something which might give increased facilities for drinking, or which might conceal from observation any part of the premises used for drinking, or which might affect the communication between the part of the premises where intoxicating liquor was sold and any other part of the premises or any street or other public way. Clearly that mischief exists in this case. In my opinion, sub-section 4 is a provision enabling the justices to order to be done when granting a renewal of a licence that which, under sub-section 2, they might order to be done in a case where there was a licence subsisting. One of the things which they may order under sub-section 2 is the refraining from making any alteration in the means of access to the premises. And, in my opinion, when, under sub-section 4, they are considering what alterations they shall require to be made in the premises at the time of renewing a licence, they are justified in taking into consideration the means of access thereto. I have come to the conclusion that the justices were clearly acting within their jurisdiction in making the order which they have made. The appeal will therefore be dismissed.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Speechly, Mumford, Rodgers, & Craig, for Edward Wotton, Ramsgate.

Solicitors for the respondents, Kingsford, Dormas, & Co., for A. B. Burrows, Ramsgate.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 2, 3.

DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. (LIMITED) AND PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. (LIMITED) v. DAVID MOSELEY & SONS (LIMITED) AND INDIA RUBBER TYRE AND REPAIRING CO. (a.)

Patent—Infringement—Combination patent—Sale of constituent parts—Intention to infringe.

If the manufacture and sale of an article, which is a constituent part of a patent consisting in a particular combination, are not in themselves unlawful as infringing the patent, they do not become so by reason of the sale being to a person whom the vendor knows intends to infringe the patent.

Townsend v. Haworth, 12 Ch. D. 831n, 48 L. J. Ch. 770n, followed.

Decision of Swinfen Eady, J. (ante, p. 189), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J. (reported ante, p. 189, [1904] 1 Ch. 164).

The plaintiffs were the proprietors of the Welch patent 14,563 of 1890, for "improvements in rubber tyres and metal rims or felloes of wheels for cycles and other light vehicles," and of the Bartlett patent 16,783 of 1890, for "improvements in tyres or rims for cycles and other vehicles."

The patents were combination patents, the Welch patent being claimed as "4. A rubber or elastic tyre having the form of a saddle or arch in section lined with canvas in combination with two wires or sufficiently inelastic cores for securing the same to the rims or tyres substantially as herein described"; and "9. A rubber or elastic tyre having the form of a saddle or arch in section provided with endless wires or cores fitted or vulcanized within each side for the purpose of securing the same to the rims in combination with an inflatible inner tyre or tube substantially as described and shown with reference to figs. 15 and 18 of the drawings"; and "10. A rubber or elastic tyre having the form of a saddle or arch in section, lined with canvas and provided with endless wires or cores for covering, protecting and securing an inflatible inner tube or tyre substantially as herein described"; and the Bartlett patent being claimed as "1. The combination of a grooved rim or metal tyre and an arched tyre of indiarubber or other flexible material held in the groove by the pressure of an inflated tube within the arch which forces its edges against the side of the groove substantially as described"; and "2. Tyres or rims for cycles and other vehicles," consisting of "the outer tyre of indiarubber or other elastic material," and "a metal tyre or rim," and "an air-tight tubular chamber," combined and arranged substantially as described and shown in the drawings.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants David Moseley & Sons (Limited), who were rubber manufacturers, and did not supply rims, wires, or inner tubes, did not make or sell either of the above combinations, but they had for many years made and sold loop-edge covers with pockets for the insertion of wires which the plaintiffs alleged could only be used for the Welch combination, and beaded-edge covers which the plaintiffs alleged could only be used for the Bartlett combination. The plaintiffs brought the present action for an injunction to restrain the defendants David Moseley & Sons (Limited) from infringing the said patents by making, selling, and offering to sell beaded-edge and other tyres, and to restrain the defendants the India Rubber and Tyre Repairing Co. from selling those articles when made by and sold to it by the other defendants.

Swinfen Eady, J., dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

T. Terrell, K.C., C. A. Russell, K.C., Graham, and Walter, for the appellants.—The defendants David Moseley & Sons made these covers, which can only be intended to be used for the purposes of our patents, and sold them to the other defendants, who put together the tyres and rims. If the same shop sells the covers, tyres, and rims it is an infringement, even if they are not put together. The defendants have practically sold the covers in one shop and the tyres and rims in another, and we submit that that is an infringement of our patents. The dictum of Pearson, J., in United Telephone Co. v. Dale, 32 W. R. 428, 25 Ch. D. 778, at p. 782, that "if there was a patent for a knife of a particular construction, and an injunction was granted restraining a defendant from selling knives made according to the patent, and he was to sell the component parts so that any schoolboy could put them together and construct the knife, surely that sale would be a breach of the injunction," is directly in point here. The defendants have in effect taken the pith and marrow of our patent. The learned judge in the court below was of opinion that as the sale of the cover was in itself lawful, Moseleys were entitled to sell it without inquiring into the intentions of the purchaser (see Townsend v. Haworth, 12 Ch. D. 831*n*, 48 L. J. Ch. 770*n*), but we submit that this is not so. Moseleys, by selling the covers to the other defendants, in fact invited them to infringe our patents: Innes v. Short & Beal, 15 Rep. Pat. Cas. 449. By what they did, Moseleys became joint tortfeasors in the other defendants' infringement, and the intention to take part in a tort is of consequence: Merryweather v. Ninan, 8 T. R. 186; Betts & Drewe v. Gibbins, 2 A. & E. 57; Adamson v. Jarvis, 4 Bing. Rep. 66. The courts distinguish between cases where an obviously illegal act was done, and a case in which an illegal act was committed but the person joining in it might not have known that it was illegal.

Clarke v. Newsam, 1 Ex. Rep. 131; Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Neal, 47 W. R. 632, [1899] 1 Ch. 807; Sykes v. Howarth, 12 Ch. D. 906, 27 W. R. Dig. 147; Lister v. Leather, 8 E. & B 1004, 7 W. R C. L. Dig. 62; Parkes v. Stevens, 17 W. R. 846, 8 Eq. 358; and Harrison v. The Anderston Foundry Co., 1 A. C. 574, 25 W. R. Dig. 174, were also cited.

Cripps, K.C., Eve, K.C., and Leigh Clare, for David Moseley & Sons (Limited), and Macnaghten, K.C., and Romer, for the India Rubber and Tyre Repairing Co., were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We have heard this case at considerable length, and in my judgment it is really covered by authority. I have no doubt that the decision of Swinfen Eady, J., ought to be affirmed. Having regard to the whole course of this action both before Swinfen Eady, J., and upon the hearing of this appeal, there can be no doubt that the real question which was intended to be raised by the plaintiffs was this: Whether the selling of an article intended to be used for the purpose of infringing a patent is an infringement of the patent. In my judgment it is not.

I think, perhaps, the best way of dealing with this case would be to take the very short statement of the facts as it appears in the judgment of Swinfen Eady, J. He says, "Generally there is no dispute as to the facts with regard to what the defendants Messrs. Moseley are doing. They are making and selling what is known as the cover—that is, the outer detachable cover, and they are selling it with a lining suitable for the insertion of wires, so that the cover as sold by them is adapted for use in the manner described in Welch's specification, but not necessarily for use solely in that manner. They are also making and selling a cover with beaded edges, but without pockets for wires, which cover is capable of being used in the manner described in Bartlett's specification, the beads or lugs of the cover engaging in the inturned angle of the rim." There we have a short statement of the facts. In my judgment our conclusion ought to be the same in this case; whether or not, Swinfen Eady, J.'s, conclusion of fact is right when he says that these covers, of which complaint is made, are adapted for use in the manner described in these specifications, but are not necessarily solely for use in that manner; and he repeats the same conclusion of fact when he says: "Most of the covers would probably ultimately be used in one or other of these methods"—that is to say, the Welch or the Bartlett method—"I am of opinion that those are not exhaustive of the purposes to which the covers may be put, and that they would be useful for other purposes in connection with other tyres, as Mr. Beaumont pointed out."

Now, it is quite plain here that what the plaintiffs are alleging is that there has been an infringement by one or other of these defendants, and that that infringement has been constituted by the sale of these covers, which are constituent parts of one or other of the methods patented in the combination patents which are known as the Welch patent and the Bartlett patent. I am of opinion that the sale of these covers cannot be said to amount to or be evidence proving an infringement of one or other of these letters patent. In truth and in fact, veil it how you like, the plaintiffs do not complain of any infringement of these patents in which they say that the defendants, or one or other of them, have taken part as actors. In truth and in fact, all that they complain of is the sale of these covers, which sale, it is said, the defendants must have known was a sale to a person intending to commit an infringement of one or other of these patents, as the case may be.

In my judgment the authorities show conclusively that on those facts there would be no infringement by the defendants of these letters patent. Our attention has been called to the judgment of Sir George Jessel in the case of Townsend v. Haworth, which is reported in 12 Ch. D., in the notes to a case of Sykes v. Howarth. The case of Sykes v. Howarth itself begins on p. 826, and the report of the judgment of Sir George Jessel in Townsend v. Haworth, to which I am going to refer, appears in the notes to the report of Sykes v. Howarth. There Sir George Jessel says: "You cannot make out the proposition that any person selling any article, either organic or inorganic,

Decision of Divisional Court ([1903] 2 K. B. 92, 51 W. R. Dig. 73) reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.), reversing the judgment of the deputy judge of the Oxford County Court ([1903] 2 K. B. 92, 51 W. R. Dig. 73).

The action was brought to recover two sums of £30 12s. and £12 16s., being the respective amounts paid by the plaintiff to the defendants as premiums on two policies of insurance.

In April, 1889, a suggestion was made to the plaintiff by an agent of the defendant insurance company that he should effect an insurance with the defendants upon the life of his mother, and he in consequence signed a proposal for such an insurance. In the proposal form the pecuniary interest in the life insured was stated to be "Son, for funeral expenses."

The plaintiff's mother was residing with him as his housekeeper; his father was alive, but he was paralyzed and unable to earn any money, and would not be in a position, in the event of his wife predeceasing him, to pay for her funeral expenses.

On the 29th of April, 1889, the defendants issued to the plaintiff a policy on the life of his mother for £10 4s. at a premium of 6d. per week. Subsequently the plaintiff was induced by the defendants' agent to effect a second policy with the defendants upon his mother's life, and on the 18th of May, 1891, the defendants issued the second policy for £18 12s., at a premium of 1s. a week.

The proposal form for this policy was said to be signed by the mother, but the plaintiff stated that the policy was effected for his benefit, and the premiums were paid by him. The mother in giving her evidence denied that she had signed the proposal form.

The plaintiff was induced to take out both policies on the direct assurance of the defendants' agent that the policies would be valid.

In 1902 the plaintiff, being informed that the policies were void for want of insurable interest, brought an action in the Oxford county court to recover the premiums paid by him under the two policies during the preceding twelve years, amounting to £43 8s.

The following were the questions put to the jury by the learned judge and the answers given by them: (1) Had the person for whose benefit the assurance was really made a real pecuniary interest under either policy?—Yes. (2) Did the agent in either case make a statement which was false in fact? (If so, what was it?)—No. (3) Did the agent in either case know that what he was saying was untrue?—No. (4) Was either policy, or were both, taken out in consequence of what the agent had said?—Yes. (5) Did the agent in either case represent that the policy had been a good one?—Yes. (6) Were the agents in what they did, or was either of them, guilty of any fraud, and, if so, in what respect?—No. Judgment was given for the defendants, on the ground that the first policy was not void, as the plaintiff had an insurable interest in reference to his mother's funeral expenses, which would practically fall on the plaintiff, as her husband would not be in a position to pay them, and with regard to both policies that, even if they were void for want of insurable interest, the premiums could not be recovered back, the representation of the agent as to the validity of the policies being a representation as to a matter of law and having been innocently made. On appeal by the plaintiff, the Divisional Court held, as to the first policy, that the mere prospective moral duty upon the plaintiff of paying for his mother's funeral expenses did not constitute an insurable interest; that the two policies were on the same footing, both having been taken out by the plaintiff; and that, as the policies were effected and the premiums paid in reliance upon a statement made by the defendants' agent, the plaintiff was entitled to assume that the latter would have a knowledge of insurance law, and that, therefore, the parties were not in pari delicto, and the premiums could consequently be recovered back.

From this decision the defendants now appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, K.C. (S. T. Evans, K.C., and J. J. Parfitt with him), for the defendants.—The first policy effected by the plaintiff was valid, as owing to the fact that he would under the circumstances have to bear the funeral expenses of his mother, he had an insurable interest in her life: Barnes v. London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow Life Insurance Co., [1892] 1 Q. B. 864, 40 W. R. Dig. 100. The second policy on its face appears to be a valid policy, taken out by the mother. But even if both policies are illegal the plaintiff cannot recover the premiums he has paid in respect of them, as both parties were in pari delicto: Howard v. Refuge Friendly Society, 54 L. T. 644, 34 W. R. Dig. 41. It is true that in the case of British Workman's and General Assurance Co. v. Cunliffe, 18 Times L. R. 425 and 502, it was held that the premiums paid could be recovered, but in that case the agent was guilty of fraud. In the present case no fraud has been proved or even suggested. The representation made by the agent was bonâ fide and innocent, and therefore the parties are in pari delicto. An innocent misrepresentation on a question of law is not sufficient to give the plaintiff a right to get back the premiums he has paid; in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover there must be misrepresentation of some material fact or an act of fraud. The plaintiff is, therefore, not entitled to succeed.

He cited West London Commercial Bank v. Kitson, 32 W. R. 757, 13 Q. B. D. 360; Kearley v. Thomson, 38 W. R. 614, 24 Q. B. D 742; and Rashdall v. Ford, 14 W. R. 950, L. R. 2 Eq. 750.

Montague Shearman, K.C. (Cecil Walsh with him), for the plaintiff.—The first policy was illegal. The plaintiff had no insurable interest in his mother's life, as there was only a moral and not a legal obligation on his part to pay for her funeral expenses. The second policy was clearly illegal, as it was taken out admittedly by the plaintiff in his own interest, and this was not disclosed. The jury have found as a fact that the plaintiff took out the policies and paid the premiums, relying on the representation of the agent that the policies were legal and valid. That representation amounts to a misrepresentation of fact, and the plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover back the premiums he has paid in consequence of that misrepresentation. Even if the misrepresentation was not as to a matter of fact, but only on a question of law, still the plaintiff is entitled to recover, as he was entitled to assume the agent would know the general law as to insurance, and therefore the parties were not on the same footing.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the Divisional Court. The plaintiff had effected, through an agent of the defendant company, two insurances on the life of his mother. He continued to pay the premiums for some years, until in point of fact the amount paid in premiums exceeded the amount insured. In that condition of circumstances he bethought him that the policy was really illegal, and that he had a right to recover back the premiums. As regards the first policy effected, and assuming, though without deciding the matter, that the plaintiff was not entitled to take out the policy on his mother's life with regard to her funeral expenses, and assuming him to have taken out such policy and to have paid the premiums thereunder, there remains the question whether he can recover those premiums on the ground that there has been a total failure of consideration. That depends upon what the nature of the transaction was which resulted in his paying money to another person. Assuming, as I do, that the transaction was an illegal transaction, the plaintiff is in this position, that he has paid money to another person upon an illegal bargain, and that being so the question is, can he recover it back? The second policy was effected by the plaintiff in his own interest and without the mother's knowledge. The jury have found that the agents represented that both the policies would be valid, and that they were taken out by the plaintiff in consequence of what the agents said, and that the agents did not know that what they were saying was untrue. The learned county court judge on these findings held that the representation of the agents as to the validity of the policy having been innocently made, the money could not be recovered back.

It is perfectly clear law that if one of two parties to an illegal contract pays the other party money, that money cannot be recovered back. That rule was applied by my brother Mathew in Howard v. The Refuge Friendly Society, the head-note of which is this: "J. H. effected with the defendant company two policies of insurance on the life of his father J. H., in which he had no insurable interest; according to the policies the premiums were to be paid by weekly payments. J. H., the son, continued to make these weekly payments for some years. J. H., the father, had at first no knowledge of the insurances effected on his life, but when he became aware of them he objected to them being continued, and gave notice to that effect to the company. J. H., the son, then gave notice to the defendants that the policies were at an end, and claimed the return of the amount of the premiums. The defendants refused to pay, and J. H., the son, brought his action for their recovery, and the county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed. Held, on appeal, that under the circumstances of the case the policies were wagering policies, and consequently the premiums paid in respect of them could not be recovered."

Now, the plaintiff in the first place was a party to an illegal contract, and therefore primâ facie he is debarred from recovering any money paid under that contract to the other party. But it is contended that by reason of what happened between him and the agents, he is relieved from that rule of law. What was said by the agents in this case, to begin with, was a representation not of fact, but of law—a statement of opinion that the policies were valid. That seems to me to be a statement not of fact, but a statement of the law, the general law of the land in relation to insurance, and the jury have found as a fact that that statement was made innocently. It seems to me that unless you can introduce some circumstances of oppression or fraud or difference in the position of the parties which created in the person who made the statement some fiduciary relationship to the plaintiff so as to make it inequitable for the defendants to insist upon enforcing the bargain which they had made with the plaintiff, he is in the position of a party to an illegal contract and must submit to the loss of whatever he has paid under that contract. Now the jury have not found that the plaintiff's relations to the agents were such as to bring him within that class of cases where money has been obtained from another person by fraud, duress, or oppression of some kind, but they have found that the statement made by the agents was an innocent statement of what the agents believed to be the law. There is no evidence of fraud or oppression, and there is certainly no finding of fraud or oppression, and we cannot assume it. All we have is that the party, whether he knew it or not, was a deliberate party to the contract, and was under no misapprehension as to the nature of the contract which he was making, though he may not have known what the law was. Nevertheless what he was intending was clearly a contract forbidden by law, with the consequence that the money paid under it cannot be recovered back. Under these circumstances the plaintiff cannot, in my judgment, recover back the money paid. There is the clear authority of this court for that proposition in British Workman's and General Assurance Co. v. Cunliffe. In that case the divisional court decided that money could be recovered back where a person had paid premiums on the statement of an agent that the policy would be valid. This court affirmed that decision, but on the ground that the statement made by the agent on which the person seeking to recover back the money paid had acted was fraudulently made, and they expressly put it on that ground. To that extent this court certainly qualified, or at the least did not adopt, the ground of the judgment of the divisional court. It seems to me that both on the general law and on authority the plaintiff in this case has failed to establish his right to recover back the premiums, and, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Assuming that the two policies were void because they were illegal, it is clear that the plaintiff cannot recover the premiums that he had paid, unless he can make out that he was not in pari delicto with the defendants. Can it, however, be said on his behalf that he has established that? He relies in support of that contention on the statement made by the agents when the policy was effected. Now, as to that statement, in my opinion it is clear that there was no misstatement of fact on the part of the agents. It is further clear that there was no fraud of any kind. This is not a case of the oppressor and the oppressed, nor is it a case where any advantage has been taken by a clever man over an ignorant man. The agents appear, like the plaintiff, to have forgotten or to have mistaken the law. It is clear that the agents, as appears from the findings of the jury, believed that the policies were good; and so had the plaintiff. Both parties in that respect were equally guilty in their being ignorant or mistaken in the law. Unless you can say that the statement made by the agents put the defendants in respect of their agents' acts in a worse position than the plaintiff, the parties were on an equal footing with regard to the transaction. I do not think that a statement of fact on the law in such a case does make that difference.

This is a case where both parties ought to know the law, and both parties are contracting on an equal footing, both being presumably of equal intelligence. We cannot, in my opinion, hold as a principle that the agents of an insurance company must be treated as being under a greater obligation to know the law than the persons they approach for the purpose of effecting policies with, unless there is any special evidence to the contrary. Here no case of fraud can be imputed; in fact no case of fraud was raised against the defendants, nor can it be said that they were in any way bound to appoint agents with some special knowledge of law. Under these circumstances it appears to me that for the purposes of this case both the plaintiff and the defendants' agents must be taken to have been in pari delicto, and the defendant company cannot stand in a worse position than their agents. I therefore agree that on these grounds this appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that this was an illegal contract, and a contract of a kind prohibited by law for grave reasons. Now, it being an illegal contract, it is said by the plaintiff that its illegality ought not to be set up against him because of the representation that the policy was a valid policy. That representation, no doubt, may be inferred from what passed, but it was innocent, and it was a representation as to the law, and I do not intend, for the first time in this court, to hold that a representation as to the law is on the same level as a representation of a question of fact. Here there is no ground whatever for imputing either to the agents or to the defendant company any intention to mislead the plaintiff. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Esson & Mallam, for George Mallam & Son, Oxford.

Solicitor for the defendants, J. M. Storer, for E. T. Hatt, Oxford.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } April 15.

In re LETHEBY & CHRISTOPHER (LIMITED). JONES'S CASE. (a.)

Company — Articles of association — Construction — Transfer — "Usual common form" — Address of transferor—Number of share—Immaterial details.

A provision in the articles of association of a limited company that transfers of shares shall be in writing and in the usual common form, means that the transfer shall be in that form in all material respects; and a transfer which omits details usually inserted, such as the address of the transferor or the number of the share, but which details are, under the circumstances of the case, immaterial, may, nevertheless, comply with the provision.

Motion.

This was a motion that the above-named company might be ordered to rectify their register by registering a transfer which they objected to as not being in proper form.

The company was incorporated in 1900 with a capital of £6,000, divided into 6,000 shares of £1 each.

Article 25 of the articles of association was as follows: "25. Subject to the restrictions of these presents, any member may transfer all or any of his shares, but every transfer must be in writing, and in the usual common form; and must be left at the office of the company, accompanied by the certificate of the shares to be transferred, and such other evidence (if any) as the directors may require to prove the title of the intending transferor."

By article 28 the directors might, in their discretion, and without assigning any reason, refuse to register the transfer of any share (not being a fully paid-up share) to any person whom they should not approve as transferee, or the transfer of any share, whether fully paid up or not, on which the company had a lien.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Among the subscribers to the memorandum of association was Miss E. V. Isley, who was therein described as of Dorman's Park Hotel, Dorman's Park, Surrey, spinster, and who subscribed for only one share. This share was subsequently allotted to her as fully paid up, and was numbered 5,998. Miss Isley's address, as above stated, was also on the share register.

Under the articles of association E. J. Jones, the applicant of the motion, who also had subscribed for one share, was appointed one of the first managing directors of the company. He was subsequently dismissed from this position, and he brought an action for wrongful dismissal against the company which was compromised, one of the terms of the compromise being that he should transfer his share to the company or their nominee.

The applicant having subsequently purchased from Miss Isley her share, she executed a transfer thereof to him dated the 24th of March, 1904. This transfer did not contain the address of Miss Isley or the number of the share transferred. Miss Isley, however, had only the one share above-mentioned.

On the 29th of March, 1904, the applicant sent the transfer and the certificate of the share to the company with a letter as follows: "Enclosed herewith please find certificate No. 8 for one share in your company, No. 5,998, together with transfer duly executed by Miss Edith V. Isley to myself; and I shall be glad to receive a new certificate to myself at your convenience." Miss Isley was described on the certificate as of "Dorman's Park, in the county of Surrey."

The directors refused to register the transfer, upon the ground that in not giving the address of the transferor or the number of the share transferred, it had not complied with the articles of association.

The applicant thereupon made this motion.

Astbury, K.C., and Hohler, for the applicant.

Beddall, for the company.—The transfer is not in the usual or common form. It is the universal custom to give the address of the transferor upon the transfer. All companies adopt the precaution of giving notice of a transfer deposited for registration to the transferor, and hence the address of the transferor is material. It is also the invariable custom to give the numbers of the shares transferred in the transfer.

BUCKLEY, J.—I have no doubt that the intention of the company in agreeing to the compromise of January, 1904, was to get rid of Mr. Jones as a shareholder, but unfortunately they forgot that as soon as he sold his share it was competent to him under the articles to buy others. He obtained from Miss Isley a transfer of a share and sent it in for registration. The directors held a board meeting on the 4th of April, 1904, and thought proper to defer the matter. The Companies Act, 1862, s. 25, provides that the court may rectify the register of shareholders if there has been unnecessary delay. There has been such delay here. This being a fully paid-up share, the directors can, under the articles of association, only refuse to register if they have a lien on it, which is not the case. Section 22 of the Companies Act provides that shares shall be transferable. It is important that this free right of transfer should be preserved. Miss Isley, then, had a right to transfer this share to the applicant, provided that she complied with article 25, which requires the transfer to be in writing and in "the usual common form." The transfer is in writing. It is said that it is not in the usual common form because the transferor is not described as of any particular address, and the share is not described by any denoting number. Miss Isley subscribed the memorandum of association, and her address is given there, as also on the register of members; and the certificate which was sent to the company with the transfer contained the address also. There was not the smallest doubt who the transferor was, or which was the share transferred, for she held only one share. In my judgment, in the circumstances of this case the absence of these particulars was wholly immaterial. The absence of the number was held immaterial in Ind's case, In re International Contract Co., 20 W. R. 430, L. R. 7 Ch. 485; Bishop's case, In re Financial Insurance Co., L. R. 7 Ch. 296n; and East Gloucester Railway Co. v. Bartholomew, L. R. 3 Exch. 15, 16 W. R. Dig. 59. The number is directory only, and if there is no other share, or if a wrong number being given it is clear what share is meant, the share may be dealt with. A transfer is not the less in common form because it omits immaterial details. Article 25 means that the transfer must be in common form in all material respects. It does not mean that the transfer shall be invalid if the i's are not dotted or the t's are not crossed. Under the circumstances I think that Mr. Jones is entitled to have the transfer registered, and I make the order asked for. As a matter of form I allow Miss Isley to be joined as co-applicant.

Application granted.

Solicitor for the applicants, A. W. Bartlett.

Solicitor for the company, G. H. Daniell.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) March 2.

WING v. EPSOM URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Practice — Justices—Nuisance on premises—Complaint heard before three justices at petty sessions—Order signed by one justice only—Objection against order—Validity—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 14—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55). ss. 96, 251.

An order was made by three justices at petty sessions under section 96 of the Public Health Act, 1875, requiring the appellant to abate a nuisance on his premises. The order as drawn up and served on the appellant was signed by one justice only.

Held (allowing the appeal), that the order as drawn up and served on the appellant ought to have been signed by two justices, as that was the form of the order indicated by section 96 of the Act of 1875, and having been signed by one justice only was bad.

Case stated by a court of quarter sessions for the county of Surrey upon a question as to whether or not an order dealing with a nuisance made by justices at petty sessions at Epsom, under section 96 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was bad by reason of its being signed by one justice only.

The appellant had been summoned by a sanitary inspector before the petty sessions to answer three complaints alleging the existence of a nuisance on premises of which he was the owner within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the lessee of certain premises within the respondents' district.

On the hearing of the summonses, both parties being then present the orders now in question were made. The complaints were adjudicated upon by three justices, who ordered the abatement of the nuisances within a specified time. Orders in writing in the terms of the adjudication were drawn up, but were signed by one of the justices only who were present at the hearing.

The appellant appealed to quarter sessions on the ground that the orders were bad, by reason of their having been signed by one justice when they should have been signed by two.

The court of quarter sessions overruled the objection, but stated a case.

Low, K.C., and W. Mackenzie, for the appellant.—The orders are bad and ought to be quashed, because of section 251 of the Public Health Act, 1875. A complaint under the Act must be heard by two or more justices, and by section 96 the justices when satisfied of the existence of the alleged nuisance shall make an order. By section 14 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, justices are required to draw up such an order, which must by inference be signed by the two or more justices who heard the complaint. Otherwise there is nothing on the face of the order to show that the complaint was heard and the order drawn up by a competent court.

Avory, K.C., and S. G. Lushington (Swinbourne-Hanham with them), for the respondents.—The orders do not require to be signed by more than one justice. The appellant was present when the orders were made by the justices, and the original orders were duly delivered to the clerk of the peace. Each of the orders was served on the appellant requiring him to do the necessary work within a certain time, and as delivered to the clerk of the peace was signed by one of the three justices only. What the appellant appeals against is the verbal order made by the justices. When the appellant gave notice of his appeal to the sessions the orders had not be drawn up. All that section 14 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, requires is that the decision, verbally expressed by the justices, shall be put into writing, so that the decision or order may be properly recorded. The only purpose for which it is required to be signed is for verification. And for that purpose one signature is sufficient. A person can be summoned for disobeying an order to be complied with, for example, within twenty-four hours, although no formal order at the time he was summoned had been drawn up. Therefore the signature of one justice does not render these orders insufficiently signed and on that account bad.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I confess that if I could have seen my way to have given a decision in this case in favour of the respondents I should be glad, as there appears to me to be no merits in the appellant's case. An important legal principle, however, is involved, and I must decide the question raised in accordance with what I understand to be now settled law. I understand that the orders have to be drawn up and served, so that if there appears to be any objection to the order, that objection can be raised. If Mr. Avory, for the respondents, had satisfied me that the magistrate's signature to the order was merely, as he contended, put thereto for the purpose of verification, or that the order need not be drawn up and served, so that the verbal decision by the justices who adjudicated on the case should render the appellant liable for disobeyance to their order, I should have come to a decision against the appellant, for, as I have said, there appears to me no merits in his appeal. But the words of section 96 of the Act of 1875, and the other statutory provisions to which during the argument we have been referred, make it quite clear that this appeal must succeed on a technical legal ground. The form of the orders given for abatement or prohibition of nuisances (Form C in Schedule 4 to the Act) recites the whole proceedings and indicates in the plainest way that the orders ought to be signed by two justices, and the conclusion I have come to, therefore, is that, reading section 96 with the form of the order, there is a clear indication that the order was to be signed by two justices, and that it ought to have been signed by two justices here, and having been signed by one only it is bad. Therefore this appeal must be allowed.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WILLS and KENNEDY, JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed, but without the costs of the appeal from the quarter sessions. the court declining, after hearing argument, to interfere with a statement of the justices of quarter sessions in the case that if the appeal was allowed the costs below were to be paid the appellants.

Solicitors for the appellants, Spencer, Gibson, & Son.

Solicitors for the respondents, Lyell & Co., for E. G. Wilson, Epsom.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) Feb. 3.

STILES v. GALINSKI.
NOKES AND ANOTHER v. CORPORATION OF ISLINGTON (No. 2). (a.)

Local government—Metropolis—Public health—Lodging-house—Validity of bye-law—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 94, sub-section 1 (d) (e).

Two borough councils, acting under the power conferred upon them by section 94 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, made a bye-law with respect to lodging-houses in their respective boroughs, requiring the landlord of any such house in the first week in April in every year to cause every part of the premises to be thoroughly lime-washed. "Lodging-house" was defined as a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family. "Landlord" was defined in the first case as the person who receives or is entitled to receive the rack-rent of a lodging-house, and in the second case as the person entitled to receive the profits arising from the letting of the lodging-house.

Held, that the bye-law in both cases was bad, as it contained no provision that the landlord, before he became liable to a penalty for a breach of the bye-law, should receive notice that the bye-law had not been complied with.

Held, further (by Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J., Wills, J., dissenting), that the bye-laws were not unreasonable, in so far as they required the lime-washing to be done in the first week of April.

STILES v. GALINSKI.

This was a case stated by F. Mead, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate.

At the Thames police-court on the 23rd of June, 1903, an information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent for that the respondent, being the landlord of a lodging-house, 166, Stepney-green, did not, in the first week of the month of April last, cause every part of the premises to be cleansed, contrary to the bye-laws in such case made and provided. The information was heard on the 30th of June, when the magistrate dismissed the summons, subject to this case.

The facts stated in the case were as follows:

The appellant is a sanitary inspector and inspector of lodging-houses under the council of the Borough of Stepney. The respondent is the landlord within the meaning of the bye-laws hereinafter referred to of the lodging-house in question, which is within the Borough of Stepney and is registered under the bye-laws.

Evidence was given that on the 18th of March, 1903, the appellant visited the house and found the rooms and staircases dirty. He again visited the house on the 14th of April and he found the same state of dirt, so that it was clear that no cleansing had been done during the first week of April.

On the 11th of June, 1902, the council of the Borough of Stepney, under section 94 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), made bye-laws which have been duly allowed by the Local Government Board with respect to houses let in lodgings.

Section 94 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, provides that (1) every sanitary authority shall make and enforce such bye-laws as are requisite for the following matters (that is to say)—(d) For enforcing drainage for such houses and for promoting cleanliness and ventilation in such houses; (e) for the cleansing and lime-washing at stated times of the premises. Section 114 provides that all bye-laws made by any sanitary authority under this Act shall be made subject and according to the provisions with respect to bye-laws contained in sections 182 to 186 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), and set forth in the first schedule to the London Act. Section 182 above referred to provides that no bye-law made under this Act by a local authority shall be of any effect if repugnant to the laws of England or to the provisions of this Act. Bye-law 1 provides that, unless the context otherwise requires, the following words and expressions have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them (that is to say): "Lodging-house" means a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family. "Landlord" in relation to a lodging-house means the person (whatever may be the nature or extent of his interest in the premises and whether he resides on the premises or not) who receives or is entitled to receive the rack-rent of a lodging-house. "Keeper" in relation to a lodging-house means the person (whatever may be the nature or extent of his interest in the premises) by whom or on whose behalf such lodging-house is let in lodgings or for occupation by members of more than one family, or who for the time being receives or is entitled to receive the profits arising from such letting, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such house or part of a house were let at a rent. "Lodger" in relation to a lodging-house means a person to whom any room or rooms may have been let as a lodging or for his use or occupation, or who, not being a member of the family of such person, may occupy or use any such room or rooms by permission of the person to whom the same may be let. Bye-law 10 provides that every lodger shall cause all solid or liquid filth or refuse to be removed once at least in every day from every room which has been let to him and shall once at least in every day cause every vessel, &c., for such filth, &c., to be thoroughly cleansed. Bye-law 11 provides that in every case where a lodger is entitled to the exclusive use of any staircase, landing, or passage in such house, such lodger shall cause every part of such staircase, &c., to be thoroughly cleansed from time to time as often as may be requisite. Bye-law 13 provides that the keeper shall cause every common passage or staircase in such house to be thoroughly cleansed from time to time as may be requisite. Bye-law 14 (the one in question) provides that the landlord shall in the first week of the month of April in every year, and at such other times as the condition thereof may render it necessary, cause every part of the premises to be cleansed. He shall at the same time, subject to the proviso of the bye-law, cause every area, the interior surface of every ceiling and wall of every water-closet and the interior surface of every ceiling and wall of every room, staircase, and passage in the house, to be thoroughly lime-washed. The above bye-laws apply equally whether the lodging-houses are registered or not. The magistrate was of opinion that so much of the first clause of bye-law 14 as requires the annual cleansing by the landlord was invalid on the following grounds: (a) Being ultra vires; (b) being repugnant to the laws of England; (c) being repugnant to the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891; (d) being unreasonable. He therefore dismissed the summons.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

George Elliott, for the appellant.

R. C. Glen, Clavell Salter, and Rayner Goddard, for the respondent.

The following cases were cited: Nokes v. Corporation of Islington (No. 1), ante, p. 399, [1904] 1 Q. B. 610; Kruse v. Johnson, 46 W. R. 630 [1898] 2 Q. B. 191; Parker v. Inge, 17 Q. B. D. 584, 35 W. R. Dig. 141; and Lancaster v. Barnes District Council, 46 W. R. 623, [1898] 1 Q. B. 855.

At the close of the arguments in this case the court reserved judgment until they had heard the arguments in the next case, which raised the same questions.

NOKES & ANOTHER v. CORPORATION OF ISLINGTON (No. 2).

This was a case stated by T. D'Eyncourt, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate.

A complaint was preferred by James Jarvis Jordan, sanitary inspector, on behalf of the mayor, aldermen, and councillors of Islington, against Walter Frederick Nokes and George Augustus Nokes, the appellants, for that they, being the landlords as defined by the bye-laws of the borough made under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, with respect to houses let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family of a lodging-house at 9, St. Clement-street, Barnsbury, within the borough, did not in the first week of the month of April of the present year cause every part of the premises to be cleansed, contrary to the said bye-laws.

The magistrate, sitting at the Clerkenwell police-court on the 17th and 24th of June, 1903, convicted the appellants, and fined them 10s. and two guineas costs.

At the hearing the following facts were admitted or proved:

The appellants are auctioneers and house agents, and are the landlords within the meaning of the bye-laws of the premises referred to in the complaint, and did not in the first week of the month of April of the present year cause every part of the premises to be cleansed as required by the bye-laws. The house in question contains ten rooms, and was not cleansed in the first week of April according to the bye-law. Some of the rooms were white-washed and papered in December, 1902, and the rest of the cleansing was not carried out till May, 1903. It would take two men from a week to a fortnight to cleanse such a house in accordance with the bye-law. The builder who was employed by the appellants had orders to cleanse fifteen other registered lodging-houses at the same time as these premises, and five other houses belonging to the appellants, and he stated that he was of opinion that he could not have carried out the cleansing of all these houses during the first week of April. He did not, however, receive his orders to cleanse these premises until some time in April, and did not commence until the beginning of May. Other evidence was given to the effect that, with one or two weeks' notice, an almost unlimited supply of such labour as was necessary for complying with the bye-law could be obtained during the first week of April.

Upon the evidence the magistrate came to the conclusion that, if it was necessary that the cleansing should be carried out in any one week, the first week in April was the most suitable, having regard to the condition of the labour market and all other matters.

Bye-law 1 provides that "landlord" in relation to a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family means the person (whatsoever may be the nature or extent of his interest in the premises) by whom or on whose behalf such house or part of a house is let in lodgings, or for occupation by members of more than one family, or who for the time being receives or is entitled to receive the profits arising from such letting, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such house or part of a house were let at a rent.

Bye-law 17 provides that the landlord of a lodging-house shall, in the first week of the month of April in every year, cause every part of the premises to be cleansed.

The bye-law makes further provision for lime-washing the ceilings and walls of the premises.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the bye-law was unreasonable and ultra vires, and therefore invalid in that it was practically impossible that all such houses could be cleansed in the space of one week.

The magistrate was of opinion that, although there might be some difficulty in complying with the bye-law, yet as there was no impossibility in so doing the bye-law was not so unreasonable as to be invalid, and he accordingly convicted the appellants.

Clarke Williams, for the appellants.

Courthope-Munroe, for the respondents.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J. — Nobody can have listened to the argument in these cases without being struck with the extreme importance of the point that has been raised. Holding, as I do, that the bye-law in both of these cases is unreasonable, I wish expressly to point out that we are not interfering with the discretion of the local authorities to the extent to which it has been suggested by counsel who supported the bye-laws. In the first place, I recognize that on practical questions where a power is given to a public authority to make bye-laws within the ambit of the power given them, as, for instance, in this case, for the cleaning and whitewashing of premises at stated times, their discretion ought not lightly to be interfered with, especially where bye-laws have been sanctioned by a public department and particular duties and times for performing them have been enforced. It is only where we clearly see that some legal principle is interfered with that we ought to hold that bye-laws are unreasonable, and, therefore, I am not quite sure that we are all agreed as to the grounds upon which we think these bye-laws are unreasonable. As Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J., pointed out in Kruse v. Johnson, bye-laws are not to be set aside except upon strong grounds, and it is not to be assumed against them that they would be construed unreasonably. On the other hand, as I pointed out in the previous case of Nokes v. Corporation of Islington (No. 1), if they necessarily involve that which is unreasonable, it is our duty to do so. Now, taking the Stepney case first, the objection that I take to bye-law 14, and the ground upon which I think that it is unreasonable is that it includes or may include a class of people who are not legally or morally responsible for the observance of the bye-laws, and makes those persons liable for penalties without properly safeguarding them as regards notice. Now, the word "cause" in the bye-law is the word that gives rise to the difficulty. If "cause" could be construed to mean "take reasonable steps," the difficulty would not have arisen, but I think that "cause" does not mean merely "take reasonable steps," but means "shall see that the thing is done." Therefore the bye-law provides that the person upon whom the duty is cast is to see that the work is done. That person is the landlord. Now, "landlord" in these bye-laws includes, in relation to a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, the person, whatever may be the nature or extent of his interest in the premises, and whether he resides on the premises or not, who receives or is entitled to receive the rack-rent of a lodging-house. I think there would be less objection to the bye-law if it were confined to the person who really had the personal management of the house. It seems to me that the objection to the bye-law is that a person who may have taken an agreement from a responsible agent, and who intends letting the house in lodgings, would be held to be liable on the ground that he was entitled to receive the rack-rent. I see no objection to a bye-law which puts the responsibility upon the landlord, even though he may be the man who is merely entitled to receive the rent, but I think that such bye-law ought to provide that, in the case in which there is some person who is liable or may be liable to the landlord to fulfil the obligation imposed by the Act, the landlord himself should not be made liable to a penalty without first having received notice that the bye-law has not been complied with. Therefore I come to the conclusion that the bye-law in each of these cases is bad, because it does not provide that the landlord shall, before becoming liable to a penalty, receive notice that the bye-law has not been fulfilled.

Now with regard to the second case counsel for the respondents raised a point, which, if he could have made it good, would have differentiated this case from the Stepney case. He said that under the bye-law in the parish of St. Mary Islington the definition of "landlord" is narrower than in the Stepney case, and corresponds with the definition of "keeper" in that case. To a certain extent I agree that that is so, but I still think that even with the narrower definition of "landlord" it is not sufficiently precise to exclude the difficulties to which I have already referred. It seems to me that this bye-law does still render it possible that it might be construed, without being unreasonable, to include the person who gets the profit—that is to say, the person who ultimately receives the money, though he may not, in fact, be in touch with the lodging-house in the same way as the ordinary keeper is. I think, therefore, that this bye-law is also bad. I think these bye-laws require remodelling from the point of view, not of relieving the landlord from being responsible if he does not see the work is done, but of giving him reasonable and proper notice before he can be charged with the breach of the bye-law simply because the house had not been cleansed by a particular day.

I now come to that part of the case which has given me more difficulty, and upon which I am not quite sure that we are all agreed. Speaking for myself only, I should not have been disposed to interfere with the finding on the ground that the period taken was the end of the first week in April. The Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 94, says that bye-laws are to be made "for the cleansing and lime-washing, at stated times, of the premises." Undoubtedly I think that does mean fixed dates about when the work should be done or by which time it should have been done. As regards the objections to the particular time mentioned in the bye-law, I can well imagine that a fortnight at the end of April or the beginning of May would remove them, but I should not have been disposed to interfere on that ground because it seems to me that the time when the work is to be done is exactly one of those things in which the knowledge and experience of the local authority ought to prevail, unless some grave objection so serious as to amount to an objection in law, or some strong unreasonableness prevails. Although I have been very much impressed by the suggestion that the first week in April will very often be an inconvenient time for the work to be done, still there may be other considerations known to the local authority arising from the class of lodging-houses or the class of people who inhabit them which may counterbalance the inconvenience. Had it rested with me I should not have been disposed to hold, and I do not hold, that these bye-laws are bad because of that particular week being fixed upon, but, for the reason which I have stated, as to no notice being given to the landlord. I think these bye-laws must be held to be unreasonable, and that being so, the appeal in the first case must be dismissed, and the appeal in the second case allowed.

WILLS, J.—I entirely agree with, and adopt as part of my judgment everything that my lord has said, except with regard to the question about the work having to be done in the first week in April; but I should like to add a few observations of my own.

It seems to me that an initial mistake has been made in these bye-laws by trying to make the same hard-and-fast rule apply to two perfectly different classes of houses. A series of regulations which may be suitable to a common lodging-house are quite inapplicable to the very large class of houses which are brought within the operation of these bye-laws by reason of the inclusion in the definition of lodging house of "houses occupied by members of more than one family." In the West End of London, where we are told similar bye-laws apply, a very large number of houses are so occupied as to bring them within that definition. Everybody knows it is a common practice for a medical man to let off one or two rooms to other medical men for use either as consulting-rooms only or as both consulting and living rooms. That causes those houses to become lodging-houses within this definition, and in such a case the application of the bye-laws seems to me to be unreasonable to the last extent. Take, for instance, the very large area which is owned by the Duke of Portland where many houses, the rack-rent of which he receives, are sub-let in this manner. To hold that he was liable because every one of these houses is not thoroughly cleansed and lime-washed from top to bottom during the first week in April would impose upon him an absolutely intolerable burden against which all good common-sense and all instincts of fair play rebel. If the bye-laws were confined to houses occupied in the same kind of way as common lodging-houses are, there would be very much more to be said in their favour; but even in that case I agree with my lord that unless the person who is most liable is a person who from his position and his relation to the property ought to know exactly what his tenants are doing and in what state they are keeping the house, it would be unfair to make him liable without his having had notice of what is taking place.

I feel bound to protest against part of the argument of counsel put forward in support of the bye-laws—namely, that although they might be considered harsh and unjust if they were applied all round, yet the local authority must be trusted only to put the law in motion in such cases as it would be reasonable to do so. In the first case the local authority are not the only persons who are entitled to put the law in motion; every subject of the Crown is entitled to do so; secondly, I do not like legislation which is felt to be so unfair if applied all round that it can only be justified by saying that in particular cases it will not be enforced. I think that that is as bad a ground upon which to defend legislation as one could well have.

Now I pass from that part of the case to the question about the first week in April. I feel fully the force of a great deal my lord has said, but I am unable to agree that this particular week must be taken to be a proper period merely because it is fixed by the local authority, if it leads in particular instances, which are not chimerical at all, to an almost preposterous state of the law. In the Islington case it is said that the work which was required to be done would take a couple of men ten days to a fortnight to do. Having regard to the fact that Easter does very commonly fall in the early part of April so as to embrace part of the first week in the Easter holidays there would in some years be only two or three days in which to do the work. I do not think that a bye-law which can have that operation has received the full consideration of its applicability to practical purposes that it ought to have received. For the reasons that I have mentioned I am of opinion that the bye-law in the Stepney case cannot be sustained.

With regard to the Islington case it has been attempted to meet some of the difficulties by putting a more modified meaning on the word "landlord," and by providing for the exemption from the operation of the bye-laws of certain cases which it seems reasonable should be exempted. Even that modified definition of "landlord" is open to objection, and I quite agree in the criticisms which my lord has passed upon that and upon other parts of these bye-laws. What I have said about the first week in April, of course, applies to both cases.

KENNEDY, J.—I have come to the same conclusion, but with great reluctance from one point of view—namely, that it is the health of the helpless which is very largely protected by these bye-laws, and I cannot help thinking that a great many of the difficulties that have been pointed out would not arise in practice if the intentions of the framers of these bye-laws were loyally carried out I confess, at the same time, that I am unable to see how the bye-law in either case can be supported. I think this is unfortunate, because one knows perfectly well that persons who do not want to face liabilities which they ought to incur, can by keeping property in an insanitary state, create many difficulties for those who have to see to the carrying out of these bye-laws by employing intermediate agents who are the only persons in touch with the tenants. I can quite understand that it is very difficult to frame bye-laws which shall, on the one hand, really make the person who received the profits arising from these properties responsible, and which, on the other hand, shall not cause the possible injustice of a person being made liable to penalties without any notice that the person who manages the property has infringed the bye-laws. As regards the question as to the work being done in the first week in April, speaking for myself and with great respect to my brother Wills, I cannot help thinking that local authorities who know the local needs, and who express the desires of the community by representation, and who must be taken to know their business, ought not to be lightly interfered with in matters purely of management and routine such as this is. The magistrate in the second case has found the first week in April not to be unreasonable, and I should not be inclined to interfere with any period which the local authority, who are the appointed representatives of the ratepayers, have chosen to fix upon.

In the second case I think it is impossible to accept as satisfactory in the sense of reasonableness the definition there of "landlord," though I can understand the local authority thinking it arguable that "landlord" there did mean the person who was really in touch with the tenant.

Appeal in first case dismissed.

Appeal in second case allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant in first case, C. V. Young & Co.

Solicitor for the respondent in first case, G. Vandamm.

Solicitors for the appellants in second case, Young & Cooper.

Solicitor for the respondents in second case, A. M. Bramall.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). } Dec. 17.

WEST HAM UNION v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Poor law—Settlement—Addition to parish—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61)—Poor Law Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 54).

Where a pauper has acquired a settlement in a parish, and subsequently by an order of the Local Government Board, made under the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, as amended by the Poor Law Act, 1879, a part of an adjoining parish has been added to the former parish, the identity of the original parish is not destroyed, and the pauper's settlement is not lost.

R. v. Tipton Inhabitants. 3 Q. B. 215, and St. Saviour's Union v. Dorking Union, 46 W. R. 309, [1898] 1 Q. B. 594, distinguished.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (50 W. R. 275, [1902] 1 K. B. 562) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) (50 W. R. 275 [1902] 1 K. B. 562), affirming the decision of the King's Bench Division (Darling and Channell, JJ.) (49 W. R. 443, [1901] 1 K. B. 720).

The following facts appeared in the case stated for the opinion of the court: Elizabeth Heritage, a pauper lunatic, was born in Stevenson-street, Canning

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Town, in the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union, on or about the 11th of February, 1852, and resided in that parish for about seventeen years until the month of August, 1888, which rendered her irremovable from the parish. By an order of the Local Government Board dated the 24th of August, 1886, it was ordered that all that part of the parish of Wanstead which was included in the borough of West Ham should cease to be part of that parish, and should be amalgamated with the parish of West Ham. The address at which the pauper lunatic so resided was situate in the parish of West Ham as constituted previously to the date of the said order, and not in any part of the parish of Wanstead. Heritage left the parish of West Ham in the month of August, 1888, and did not therefore acquire a settlement in any other parish. She was afterwards found in the hamlet of Ratcliff, in the Stepney Union, in the county of London, and was sent therefrom to the Claybury Lunatic Asylum of the respondents. Two justices adjudged her to be settled in the parish of West Ham. This was quashed at quarter sessions, but restored by the Divisional Court, and affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Avory, K.C., and C. C. Hutchinson, for the appellants.

Reg. v. Tipton Inhabitants, 3 Q. B. 215, and St. Saviour's Union v. Dorking Union, 46 W. R. 309, [1898] 1 Q. B. 594, were referred to.

Macmorran, K.C., and Daldy, for the respondents, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—This case, it appears to me, may be decided without reference to any of the cases which have been previously decided. Whether, if those cases came in actual review before your lordships, you would affirm the principle which seems to have guided them, or would take the view which Cockburn, L.C.J., and Blackburn, J., both expressed, that the case upon which they all really depended had been decided upon a very narrow—obviously in their view a too narrow—construction of the Act of Parliament, is a matter which it is unnecessary to consider with reference to a case which really does not raise the same question. I have no doubt that what Cockburn, L.C.J., and Blackburn, J., both felt was that in a question of this sort, which was in those days constantly arising, it was a very inconvenient thing to have different rules laid down by the courts from time to time thereby putting the overseers in great difficulties; and for that reason there was a reluctance to interfere with rules which were supposed to be once established. I am not certain that this consideration is so important now, because controversies between parishes are now very seldom litigated in these matters; but, be that as it may, I only mention it in order to point out that your lordships are perfectly free, if the question ever does come in a distinct form before you, to consider those cases which, after all, only began in the year 1842, and may or may not be held to have established a rule which it would be wrong to depart from now.

At all events, this is the first case of this class which has ever come before a Court of Appeal, and it appears to me that the answer to the ingenious argument which has been presented to us is that none of the circumstances upon which the other cases have been decided exist here. One can see that where a parish has disappeared—in this sense, that it has been broken up into four or five different parishes—it would be difficult to say that the settlement in the parish still continued, because the parish which once existed, and in which the pauper had obtained a settlement, no longer exists, and you could not say that he belonged to A, B, C, D, or E, because no such parish existed as that in which he got his settlement, and the mere appropriation of his settlement to some one of the new parishes would be, or ought to be, legislation, and not decision. But, be that as it may, in this case the pauper was settled in West Ham, and now claims a settlement in West Ham; and what is to prevent his having it? Is there no identity in the parish by reason of the same course of administration continuing, the same liabilities upon its inhabitants, the same duties to be performed by the officers of the parish? There is no doubt that everything that would constitute identity in an administrative body exists here, and it is upon the liability of that same administrative body that the pauper makes his claim. What is the answer to it? Not that there is any real change in the administration, not that there is any change in the very place where the pauper's settlement was obtained, but that something has been added to the parish afterwards—and that, it is said, is to make the whole difference in the rights and liabilities of the parish to which the addition has been made, so as to deprive the pauper of his rights under the Act of Charles II. and those Acts which succeeded it—among others, the right not to be removed and sent to some other place. I am wholly unable to follow reasoning which suggests that this parish has changed its identity. It is the same parish in all the things which constitute identity of an administrative body; and the fact that a small part has been added to it so as to bring that part within the area of that which is the unit for administrative purposes seems to me not in the smallest degree to interfere with the identity of that which is really the same parish which existed before. It would, indeed, be only an attempt at logic run mad to suggest that by reason of an addition to a parish it ceased to be the same parish, and became a new feature, created by the mere fact of that addition. I am quite sure that nothing in the Act of Parliament which gave authority to make the addition to, or to change the boundary, of the parish could ever have contemplated that the effect would have been to change the whole legal liabilities, or, indeed, as Mr. Avory very frankly and boldly admitted, if it arose on the question of a debt contracted by the parish of West Ham, it would be a good plea, apart from legislative remedy, to say that the parish had ceased to exist, and therefore the creditor cannot recover and must lose his debt. That would be indeed reducing the matter to an absurdity.

I therefore move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion, and as I entirely concur in the reasons for the judgment which have been expressed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, and, indeed, with the reasoning of all the judges before whom the case has come—the judges in the Divisional Court and the judges in the Court of Appeal—I have really nothing to say except that I think there is identity of parish here, although an addition has been made to it to some extent.

Lord DAVEY.—I wish to speak with every respect which is due to a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench delivered so long ago as the year 1842 in the case of Reg. v. Tipton Inhabitants. I do not find it necessary for the decision of this case to say whether the reasoning upon which the decision in that case was founded is altogether satisfactory to my mind or not, because I think it is no authority for the decision of this case. This case is quite different in its circumstances and facts, and what was said in the case of Reg. v. Tipton Inhabitants is no authority for the decision of this case. Nor do I think that the Dorking case is any authority for this case. If we were considering the case of Wanstead, the Dorking case might be an authority, because a piece has been cut out of the old parish of Wanstead and added to the parish of West Ham, and in that respect it would bear some resemblance to the Dorking case. But here we have to deal with a case, not where a piece has been cut out of West Ham, but where a piece has been added from the parish of Wanstead to the parish of West Ham; and in that respect I think that the case is not governed by the Dorking case.

I think the true test is that which has been suggested by the Master of the Rolls—namely, Has the parish in which the pauper had a settlement lost its identity? In the case of Reg. v. Tipton Inhabitants I can quite understand that the parish of Halesowen had ceased to exist. It had been divided into some half-dozen or more parishes—I think fifteen, at all events several smaller parishes—no one of which could claim to be the original parish of Halesowen. But in the present case I see no ground whatever for saying that the parish of West Ham has lost its identity. A parish does not lose its identity by the mere alteration of its boundary; it does not lose its identity because a piece has been added to it, or, as I think, because a piece has been taken away from it. It must be a question in each case whether what has been done has destroyed the identity of the parish for such purposes; and it appears to me to be entravagant to say that if the boundary between two parishes is rectified by drawing a give-and-take line, so that each parish has a bit added to it and loses a bit which is added to the next, those two parishes therefore have lost their identity, or that a pauper with a settlement in either of those parishes loses his settlement.

In accordance with what I have said it may be that a case similar to the Dorking case may some day come before us, and if it does I will examine it with an open mind; but I am bound to say that the principle upon which I decide this case, and which appears to me to be applicable to this case, is one which would lead to the conclusion that the Dorking case was not founded on pure reasoning; and, indeed, I do not think that the Dorking case would have been so decided had not the judges—erroneously, as I think—thought it followed from the decision in Reg. v. Tipton Inhabitants.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I entirely agree, on the grounds which have been stated by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellants, F. E. Hilleary.

Solicitor for the respondents, W. A. Blaxland.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Feb. 19.

In re CHAPMAN (DECEASED).
STEELE PERKINS v. CHAPMAN AND OTHERS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Forfeiture clause—Marriage of a son or daughter prohibited within certain degrees—Applicable after death of testator—Alienation or bankruptcy—Words of futurity.

A testator devised all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale, and to be divided, after certain payments, among his children, sons and daughters (other than A., a daughter), in equal shares; he then inserted a clause to the effect that if any child should contract a marriage with any person of any degree of kindred, unless more remote than third cousin, and also in the case of a daughter, without the previous written consent of the trustees or trustee of his will, then he or she should forfeit his or her right to the share in his trust estate. Subsequently the plaintiff, another daughter, married her first cousin, and on her father's death claimed to be entitled to a share in his trust estate.

Held (by Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., Cozens-Hardy, L.J., dissenting), that there was sufficient in the will to show that the testator intended that these acts of forfeiture should take effect only after his death, and as the plaintiff had married within the prohibited degrees during the lifetime of the testator, she had not forfeited her interest in his trust estate.

Metcalfe v. Metcalfe, [1891] 3 Ch. 1, 40 W. R. Dig. 280, discussed and distinguished.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. The facts were as follows:

The plaintiff was one of the daughters of the testator, Edward Chapman, and she claimed to be one of the residuary legatees under his will.

The question at issue was whether the plaintiff, who in the testator's lifetime had married her first cousin, C. Steele Perkins, and with the sanction or subsequent consent of the testator, had forfeited her share, right, title, and interest in the trust estate of the testator, and the income thereof.

Edward Chapman, by his will, dated the 24th day of March, 1881, after bequeathing certain pecuniary legacies, and the interest in his business, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate unto certain trustees (one being his wife, who was also one of the defendants) upon trust for sale and conversion, to pay to his widow during her life or widowhood £250 per annum, and also until his youngest son (another of the defendants) should attain twenty-five, then until his wife should die or remarry, appropriate to each of his sons or their issue £125 per annum, and in respect of each daughter and their issue (except his daughter Alice Eliza) £100 a year, and he further directed that at the date of distribution, the said investments should be divided into as many shares as the number of his sons and daughters (other than his daughter Alice) who should die before the date of distribution leaving children living at the date of distribution, children to take their parents' share; then follow certain provisions, which are immaterial, and then comes the material clause in question: "And I declare that if any son or daughter of mine shall do or suffer any act . . . under any statutes of bankruptcy . . . or if he or she shall contract any marriage forbidden by me as hereinafter expressed, then and in any such case his or her share, right, title, or interest of, in, and to my said trust estate and the income thereof shall thenceforth cease and determine, and my said trust estate shall thenceforth go and be held in such manner as the same would have been held if he or she had died before me without leaving any child or children living at my death. And I declare that the marriages forbidden by me are in the case of son or daughter marriage with a person of any degree of kindred unless more remote than third cousin, and also in the case of a daughter marriage contracted without the previous written consent of the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will, or if more than two of a majority of them."

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the year 1880, shortly before the date of his will, the testator's daughter Alice Eliza had married her cousin G. C. Steele Perkins, a brother of the plaintiff's husband.

Thereupon the testator inserted this clause expressly excluding her, and after the marriage of the plaintiff in 1886 was estranged from both his daughters, but subsequently became reconciled to both, making, however, no alteration in his will.

The testator died on the 23rd of December, 1902, and his will was proved on the 14th of January, 1903; he left considerable property.

The defendants were the trustees of the will in lieu of those originally appointed.

Between the date of the will and the testator's death the plaintiff lived on terms of great intimacy with her father, and she and her husband were constant visitors at his house, the plaintiff's husband acting as medical adviser to the testator.

The plaintiff took out an originating summons to have the matter determined whether she had forfeited her right to her share in the testator's estate by her marriage, and also claimed to be entitled to have paid to her the yearly sum of £100 until the date of distribution mentioned in the testator's will.

Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiff, having married within the prohibited degrees, had forfeited her right and share in the testator's trust estate, and also that of her children.

The plaintiff appealed.

Upjohn, K.C., and E. Clayton, for the appellant.—There are two clauses defining the marriages which are forbidden. The language of the forfeiture clause itself must be looked at, and there is no authority which extends this. There is a great difference in saying that the clause in one event is retrospective and in another event not: In re Metcalfe, Metcalfe v. Metcalfe, [1891] 3 Ch. 1, 40 W. R. Dig. 280. The true way of looking at the will is to give it its proper ordinary construction, unless there is authority which constrained the court to the contrary. No such authority can be found. If an unnatural construction is put upon this class of cases, there is, as Bowen, L.J., said, "a counter check."

Levett, K.C., and Iselin, for the respondents.—The argument for the appointment assumes that the will speaks from the death, not only with regard to the property, but with regard to everything else: Bullock v. Bennett, 3 W. R. 291, 7 De G. M. & G. 283, shows that is not the effect of section 24 of the Wills Act. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—A man may make a will and use such words relating to the future, as mean from the time of his death.]

They referred to Ancona v. Waddell, 27 W. R. 186, 10 Ch. D. 157; and Trappes v. Meredith, 20 W. R. 130, 7 Ch. App. Cas. 248.

Upjohn, K.C., in reply.—If marriage takes place in the lifetime the testator could have given effect to the clause by a codicil. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—You mean forfeiture in respect of the marriage takes effect from the will.] It is a matter purely of construction, and the respondents' contention is too wide.

He cited Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. W. 663.

W. A. Russell, for the trustees.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question which we have to determine is, really, from what date the forfeiture clause in this will speaks. Now, it was decided in Bullock v. Bennett that the 24th section of the Wills Act had no application except with regard to the will speaking as to the property, and everyone would agree, therefore, that in this case no argument whatsoever can be founded upon the 24th section of the Wills Act. Therefore we are left in the same condition as we should have been before the Wills Act. Now I go a step further than the decision in Bullock v. Bennett. There was an old rule before the Wills Act as to the time from which a will should speak with regard to personalty, and that rule was that it should speak from the death of the testator. And as it was decided in Bullock v. Bennett with regard to section 24, that rule applied only to the property comprised in the will. Therefore we have to look at this will, and see from what date it speaks. But, having said that, I rather feel that the true proposition is nevertheless that where you have got the date of the will, either on the will, or possibly ascertained by evidence, when a testator uses words of futurity, primâ facie I should read those words as speaking from the date of his making the will, and not from the date of his death. That may be a strong presumption, but if there is a presumption one way or the other, I think that is the more likely presumption. I do not think that matters. We are entitled and bound to take this will, and look at it, and construe its clauses, and see from what date the testator intended the words of futurity in this particular clause of this particular will to speak. It seems to me that we have ample evidence here to show that this testator intended that these acts of forfeiture should be acts of forfeiture occurring after his death. I need not go through all the clauses again. We have heard very cogent arguments about them, but, speaking shortly, the two instances of user of words (there are a great many more than two), but the two instances of user of words in this particular clause indicating that the testator intended that the acts of forfeiture should be acts of forfeiture after his death, which struck me most as I heard them read, were the words "then and in any such case his or her share, right, title, and interest of, in, and to my said trust estate and the income thereof shall thenceforth cease and determine," and the other words are the words relating to the consent of the trustees. Here we have one forfeiture clause, and one has this provision. It is: "And I declare that if any son or daughter of mine shall do or suffer any act whether by way of alienation, charge, or otherwise, and including any act under any statutes of bankruptcy"—those are the alienation and bankruptcy forfeitures—"or if he or she shall contract any marriage forbidden by me, as hereinafter expressed, then and in any such case"—then come the words of forfeiture. At the end of that clause, he says: "I declare that the marriages forbidden by me are in the case of a son or daughter"—then he describes the marriages—"and also in the case of a daughter contracted without the previous written consent of the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will." I think, as I have said, that that is amply sufficient to show that the testator meant that the acts of forfeiture should take place after his death. Now, if that is so, there is an end of the case, because when one arrives at that construction, the necessary result has been determined.

But I want to say a word or two about the cases. We have had our attention called to Metcalfe v. Metcalfe, [1891] 3 Ch. 1, 40 W. R. Dig. 280. That is a case decided in the Court of Appeal by Lindley, Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ. Lindley, L.J., began his judgment by saying: "The first question on the appeal is whether the language of this forfeiture clause has any application to a bankruptcy, which took place before the death of the testator. If we only look at the words of the clause, there would seem to be a difficulty in construing it so as to include a bankruptcy" commencing "before the testator's death"—that is, before the will came into operation. Now, in my judgment, Lindley, L.J., meant that the words of the will were such as to lead to the conclusion that the testator intended only acts of forfeiture occurring after his death, and there were various things pointing to this intention by the testator, some of them resembling very much the matters to which I have called attention in the present will.

Take, for example, the provision that the "trustees or trustee" (that means the trustees or trustee of that will) "shall upon such act or default, or upon such operation of law as aforesaid, pay or apply." Having come to that conclusion, then the court proceeded to ask themselves, whether the decision in Trappes v. Meredith, 20 W. R. 130, 7 Ch. App. Cas. 248, applied, a decision which I understand to be one that relates exclusively to the particular act of forfeiture constituted by alienation, or by an act of bankruptcy, and they held that notwithstanding the date from which the will was intended to speak, they were bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Trappes v. Meredith, overruling, as he was then, Vice-Chancellor James from holding that, never mind when that particular act of forfeiture took place, whether antecedently to the date from which the forfeiture clause was to speak, or subsequently to it, it was an act of forfeiture which would have deprived the legatee of the benefit of the estate. I do not think that that decision ought to be applied to anything else but that particular act of forfeiture. I think myself that if that particular court had had to deal with this case, they would, as far as I can judge from their judgments, have arrived at the same conclusion that I have arrived at. The result is that I think that this will does refer to marriages which occur after the death of the testator as being the marriages upon which the forfeiture is to take place. Secondly, I think there is nothing in Metcalfe v. Metcalfe which applies to such a case. I think Metcalfe v. Metcalfe applies only to the particular act of forfeiture with which the court had to deal there. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but I confess I have felt very great difficulty in dealing with the case. In this case the testator, having conferred benefits on his children, sons and daughters, has introduced a forfeiture clause upon which the whole question turns. The acts which are to occasion forfeiture are of two classes. The first is that case in which "any son or daughter of mine shall do or suffer any act." [His lordship read the bankruptcy clause.] The second clause is that if the son or daughter shall contract any marriage forbidden by the testator as afterwards expressed in the will, and the effect of the commission of any such act is that "in any such case his or her share, right, title, and interest of, in, and to my said trust estate, and the income thereof, shall thenceforth cease and determine, and my said trust estate shall thenceforth go and be held in such manner as the same would have been held if he or she had died before me leaving any child or children living at my death." Now, if there were no authority bearing on the question, I should have said that the language of the gift over with reference to the share, right, title, and interest thenceforth, which means from the occurrences of any such event as mentioned in the prior part of the clause "shall thenceforth cease and determine, and my said trust estate shall thenceforth go and be held in such manner as the same would have been held," would be strong to show that the testator was referring to the occurrence of such event after his death, but it appears to me that as regards acts of alienation, including bankruptcy, it is not open to me to come to that conclusion. In the case of Metcalfe v. Metcalfe there was equally strongly language which seemed to point to and deal with acts of forfeiture occurring after the testator's death, yet it was the view of the Court of Appeal, it may be a view taken reluctantly, that the forfeiture clause applied to acts done in the lifetime of the testator.

Therefore it appears to me that with reference to that portion of the forfeiture clause I am not at liberty to say that the events there contemplated were merely events occurring after the death of the testator. Now, what is the ground of the decision in that case, and in those cases which preceded it? It appears to me that the ground is that a somewhat unnatural construction is put on the language of the will in order to give effect, as Lindley, L.J., put it, "in such cases to the obvious intention of the testator, which is to secure the personal enjoyment by the legatee of the property left by the will." I have now to turn to the other class of cases in which the testator prescribes that a forfeiture shall take place, that is "in case any son or daughter shall contract any marriage forbidden by me, as hereinafter expressed in the will." Now, what are the events? —the marriages which are forbidden. The testator says, "And I declare." [His lordship read the clause referred to above, and continued:] Now, it is said that we ought to follow the decisions with reference to the bankruptcy cases, and that it is as obvious on the face of the will that the intention of the testator was that a child contracting a forbidden marriage should be deprived of the benefits which were otherwise intended for that child as the intention which I have already referred to in the case of alienation, that the child should enjoy personally the property given by the will. I think not. The testator provides not merely for the contracting of marriages within a certain degree, but also, in the case of a daughter, marriage without the previous written consent of the trustees or trustee. It is said that it would be an extraordinary result in this case that a son or daughter who in the lifetime of the testator contracted a marriage within the prescribed degrees of kindred is not to forfeit the benefits of his estate, while a child who after the death of the testator did so would forfeit it. Well, that is a forcible observation, but it seems to me another observation which is made, and which has no less force, is this, that a daughter who upon the terms of this will, within the lifetime of the testator, contracted a marriage without his consent would not forfeit any benefit, while in the case of a daughter who contracted such a marriage after his death without the written sanction of the trustees would forfeit. Looking at this peculiarity in the clause, I see no sufficient reason why in construing the will so far as it relates to forfeiture in the event of marriage, we should not follow the language of the will as fairly construed, and therefore I think that the daughter who did marry in the lifetime of the testator within the forbidden degree should be entitled to share.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—Although I have the misfortune to differ from my lord and Stirling, L.J., as to the way this appeal should be decided, I entirely agree as to the principles which ought to be applied. Primâ facie a will speaks from the date of the execution except as to the property comprised in it, but there may be sufficient context to show that this rule is not applicable. It is a matter of construction whether a particular clause is intended to speak and operate from the death and not from the date of the execution of the will. My doubt is simply whether there is in this particular will sufficient context to justify such a conclusion. The clause has been read before, and I will not read it again. I will only say this, that it is one clause of forfeiture; and it strikes me as a strange result to hold that as to part it is retrospective, and as to part not.

We are asked to read the clause as though it were "If any son becomes bankrupt after the date of this my will, or marries a first cousin after the date of my death, then there shall be a forfeiture." I cannot accept this view. Being bound, as we are, to hold that a bankruptcy or alienation after the date of the will would bring that forfeiture clause into operation, it seems to me that we ought to arrive at the same result in the case of a marriage after the date of the will and before the testator's death. If, therefore, it rested with me, I should be disposed to say that Kekewich, J.'s, view was correct.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Ward, Perks, & McKay.

Solicitor for the respondents, John F. Child.

From Chan. Div.
(Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.) } Dec. 19.

In the Matter of THE SAFETY EXPLOSIVES (LIMITED). (a.)

Solicitor and client — Solicitor's lien — Company in liquidation—Sale of company's property—Deeds in solicitor's possession — Proof — Secured creditor — Amendment or withdrawal of proof—Inadvertence—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict c. 71), s. 8—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), Schedule I., clause 8.

A solicitor to a company in course of being wound up was a creditor of the company to a large amount for costs, for which he proved in the company's winding up, but without disclosing any security held by him against the company. At the time he held a lien for this amount upon certain documents and title deeds belonging to the company. On the sale by the liquidator of a portion of the company's property, the solicitor, who was employed for the purpose, and to whom the purchase-money had been paid, handed over the title deeds to the purchaser without informing the liquidator that he did so without prejudice to his lien, retained the sum due to him from the company and handed over the balance. No arrangement of any kind had ever been made between the parties, but the liquidator was aware that the documents were in the solicitor's possession. On an application by the solicitor to be allowed to withdraw or amend his proof,

Held, that, under the circumstances, he was not entitled to do so, as he had not proved inadvertence, and also had allowed the liquidator to alter his position on the assumption that the solicitor had no lien.

This was an appeal from an order of Buckley, J.

The facts were as follows:

The Safety Explosives (Limited) was a company formed for the manufacture of explosives. Messrs. Cox & Lafone acted as the solicitors for the company from the date of its incorporation, and conducted for the company several conveyancing matters connected with the company's properties, and also some actions and litigious matters in which the company was engaged.

In 1902 the company went into liquidation and was wound up by a compulsory order. At the date of the commencement of the winding up of the company there was a large sum due to the company's solicitors from the company for costs and disbursements. The solicitors were not at the time aware of the exact sum to which the company's debt to them amounted, but had in their possession as the solicitors of the company the title deeds of the freehold and leasehold properties of the company, and some of the letters patent of and documents conferring patent rights in the company and other documents.

On the 2nd of September, 1902, the company's solicitors received from the official receiver notices convening a meeting of the creditors of the company, together with a form of proof of debt, which the solicitors immediately handed to their clerk, Mr. H. A. Moore, with instructions for him to do what was necessary. He at once proceeded to have the bills of costs and cash account of the company's solicitors against the company made out, and with them prepared and filled in the forms of proofs of debts with one of his principals for the amount due from the company, and attached the bills of costs to the form of proof. At the time he was quite unaware that his principals held in their possession the title deeds of the properties and some of the patents belonging to the company, and having placed the form of proof as prepared before one of his principals, it was sworn to and returned to him under the impression that it was perfectly in order. The various properties of the companies were in December, 1902, offered for sale by the liquidator by private treaty, and the only tender received was accepted, the price being £3,600. Subsequently the liquidator made inquiries of the company's solicitors with regard to the terms under which the company's leasehold properties were held, and in relation to the other properties of the company; he was also fully aware that the company's solicitors held the company's title deeds.

On the 4th of February, 1903, the purchase of the company's property was completed, and the balance of the purchase-money, amounting to £2,840, was received by the company's solicitors for the vendor. They informed the liquidator by letter of the completion of the purchase, and the receipt of the said sum of £2,840, and the title-deeds were handed over to the purchaser. They did not inform the liquidator they had handed over the title-deeds without prejudice to their lien.

Out of this sum the company's solicitors retained £824 12s. 5d. in respect of the lien, which they alleged they held as security for the debt due from the company on the deeds and patents in their possession, and they forwarded to the liquidator a cheque for the balance.

On the 23rd of September, 1903, the liquidator first gave notice to the company's solicitors that their security had been surrendered, and he asked for payment of the sum of £824 12s. 5d. which was being retained.

Messrs. Cox & Lafone, after further correspondence, applied to the court to amend their proof of debt by inserting therein the particulars of the security on the property of the Safety Explosives (Limited) which they held at the date of the commencement of the winding up of the company and the date of the proof, which security consisted of their lien as the solicitors of the company upon the title-deeds of the freehold and leasehold properties of the company and certain of the letters patent then in their possession, or in the alternative to withdraw their proof and rely on their security.

The application was made in reliance on clause 8 of the first schedule to the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), which provides that a secured creditor, if he proves his debt without valuing his security and votes in respect of the whole debt,

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"shall be deemed to have surrendered his security unless the court is satisfied that the omission to value the security has arisen from inadvertence."

Buckley, J., held that inadvertence was proved, and that inasmuch as the schedule formed part of the Act itself he had no alternative but to give liberty to amend or withdraw as asked by the summons, and he held, further, that the creditor who proved inadvertence was to be restored to the same position as he would have been in if no mistake had ever been made without regard to what might have taken place in the liquidation proceedings.

From this the liquidator appealed.

H. Reed, K.C., and E. O. Simpson, for the appellant.—There was no reference to this lien except in one letter referring to certain policies. The defendants must either put forward their proof and waive their security or withdraw their proof and rely on their security. Buckley, J.'s, order was erroneous—first, because the order would not help the defendants; and, secondly, because the position of the parties having been altered, this order never ought to have been made at all. An order will not be made when it is illusory nor when the position of the parties has been changed. Negligence in omitting to read a document because you think it is not important is not inadvertence. The order is wrong, because it allows the defendant to withdraw his proof and rest on his security, and it throws on the liquidator the burden of proof that the sum of £800 odd was not a security, but a debt. It is not shown in the affidavit of the defendant what inadvertence was.

They referred to In re Henry Lister & Co. (Limited), 40 W. R. 589 [1892] 2 Ch. D. 417; and In re Newton, 45 W. R. 63, [1896] 2 Q. B. D. 403, at p. 406.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the respondents.—The plaintiff has argued against arguments that have not been raised. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—What is the actual order?] The actual order is to amend the proof. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is impossible for us to deal with this matter unless we see that the position of the liquidator has been altered, which we do not know.] The defendants claim the £800 in respect of their lien on these properties; there was a lien over everything affixed to the soil. The defendants do not allege that the parties came together; the liquidator had express notice of the lien. The defendants should be allowed to amend their proof as they may be advised.

They referred to section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), and the following cases: Ex parte Clarke, In re Burr, 40 W. R. 608, 41 W. R. 116; and In re Piers, Ex parte Piers v. Read, 46 W. R. 207, 475, [1898] 1 Q. B. 627. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In re Hawkes, Ackerman v. Lockhart, 46 W. R. 445, [1898] 2 Ch. D. 1.]

H. Reed, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment this appeal ought to be allowed. I do not think an order ought to be made allowing these creditors to amend or withdraw their proof. I must not be understood at all as saying that they could not withdraw their proof for the purposes of correcting an inaccurate statement in it. I do not suppose the liquidator would have any objection to its being withdrawn with that object. But in my judgment they ought not now to be allowed to withdraw their proof for the purpose of relying on their lien. It is admitted that they wish to amend or withdraw their proof for the very purpose of justifying their claim to the £800 by virtue of their lien, and it is also admitted that there was not any express bargain made between them and the liquidator that they should retain the benefit of their lien. What, then, have we to do in such a case as this? We have first to apply clause 8. [His lordship then referred to the clause, and continued:] I do not desire to depart in the slightest degree from what I said in Ex parte Clark, In re Burr, 40 W. R. 608, as to what constitutes inadvertence. I there mentioned, amongst things which could not constitute inadvertence, a case in which a creditor, feeling the advantages and disadvantages of stating and valuing his security, elected not to prove for his whole debt. That is not exactly the present case. But, speaking for myself, I have been left by the affidavit of Mr. Cox in a state of great uncertainty as to the circumstances under which he failed to mention his security in his proof. The proof is in that part of Mr. Cox's affidavit in which he deals with the matter at paragraph 5. It seems Mr. Moore placed before him the proof to swear, and a general form of proxy, and that he swore the proof and signed the proxy, "In doing so I had the most perfect confidence." [His lordship read the paragraph.] I can only say that it is quite consistent with the statement that he was unaware that the proof purported to state that his firm had no security for the debt, and that he remembered at that moment the fact that his firm had the security. Now if he remembered the fact that the firm had the security, he may well have been quite unaware of the statement in the proof that they had none, and yet have thought that it was not worth while to trouble about the security because the company's assets were likely to yield 20s. in the £ for the creditors, and that, if necessary, there would be quite time enough to amend the proof by stating the security and its value. There is nothing in the affidavit which excludes the possibility of that state of mind on the part of Mr. Cox. And if that was his state of mind it would not be true to say that he omitted to state the security by "inadvertence" within the meaning of clause 8. Buckley, J., has arrived at the conclusion that the omission of the security from the proof was by "inadvertence," but his attention does not appear to have been called to the fact that the statements in the affidavit are open to the comment which I have made upon them. On the other hand, it should be said that the later affidavit of Mr. Cox, although he does not mention the state of the company's assets as the reason for omitting to value the security, shows conclusively that this frame of mind continued down to the time of his swearing the proof, by this, that he continued to take the view that 20s. in the £ would be paid to the creditors. I do not think that he has satisfied the onus which was clearly on him of showing that the omission was caused by "inadvertence." But I will deal with the case, apart from these considerations, upon the assumption that the omission was due to "inadvertence." But if it was so, what was the state of things? Here were solicitors to whom a debt is due from their clients, the company, and they are relying upon a lien on documents of the company which arose during the time of their retainer by the company, not by the liquidator. In the course of the liquidation it became necessary to realize the company's assets, Messrs. Cox & Lafone acting as solicitors for the liquidator in the matter of the realization. They put in a proof which negatived their having any lien for their debt, and allowed their client to invite tenders for the sale of the whole of the assets, including those portions of the property the title deeds of which they hold. They allowed their client to do that without in the slightest degree warning him that, when he came to realize that part of the property, the title deeds of which they held, there would be a difficulty in carrying out the contract in its entirety unless 20s. in the £ was paid to them in respect of their bill of costs. I can only say that such conduct on the part of this solicitor was perfectly consistent with the proof which he had put in on behalf of his firm, a proof which was of course within the knowledge of the liquidator. After these tenders had been sent out, on the 4th of January, a letter is written by the liquidator to Messrs. Cox & Lafone, in the answer to which there is an allegation of their lien although it is limited to their policy of insurance. As a matter of fact this policy of insurance is included in the property which was ultimately sold, although not apparently in terms, at all events in the form of tenders which had been sent out, but the document does not in any way refer either to the proof or to the lien as if it would in any way interfere with the carrying out of the contract. It is suggested that it is impossible that the liquidator should in that state of things and after the receipt of that letter have acted upon the assumption that the proof as put in was in accordance with the facts and in accordance with the position taken up by Messrs. Cox & Lafone. I do not agree as to that. I can well conceive the liquidator receiving that letter without in the slightest recalling that there was such a lien set up by these gentlemen as would interfere with the carrying out of the contract between the parties. It seems to me that the solicitors here were actuated all the way through by the confident feeling that 20s. in the £ would be paid, and under those circumstances they did not call the attention of the liquidator to the fact that they were insisting upon this lien which would stand in the way of the realisation. Now the sale took place and the deeds were handed over by the solicitor to the purchasers. The obvious duty of the solicitors, if they meant to rely upon this, was that before they handed over the deeds to call the attention of the liquidator to it, and ask him whether there was any objection (notwithstanding their being handed over) to their claim, but nothing of that sort took place. In that state of things the sale went through, and they were handed to the purchaser. The solicitors now come to us saying "Give us leave to amend our proof." I think that leave ought not to be given. I think it ought not to be given because the solicitors' object in amending the proof is to set up a state of things which is inconsistent with their own proof that was on the file at the time of the carrying through of this purchase, and is inconsistent also with their own action at the time of the sale. Counsel for the respondents did not deny the proposition that you ought not to allow the amendment of a proof if the position of the parties has been altered after that proof has been put upon the file, and while it is continued there, if the liquidator has altered his position on the basis of that proof being there. But they draw this distinction, saying, "It is not sufficient to show that the liquidator has acted in a manner which is not consistent with the claim made, but you must show that he so acts because the proof was on the file." I do not agree with that. It seems to me if one man allows a state of things to continue and another acts in a way which can be supported if that state of things existed, but could not be supported unless that state of things does exist, that you ought not to allow acts done in that way to prejudice or alter a state of things which existed at the time when he was so acting. It seems to me it would be wrong to throw upon the liquidator the obligation to show that he relied upon the proof. Whether the proof was actually present in his mind or not, he was dealing with the property upon the basis that there was no lien at all upon it. I think the whole conduct of the solicitors, apart from the letter of the 6th of January, was such as to induce him to suppose that there was no lien which a solicitor could enforce which could stand in the way of the sale and purchase, and I think that under those circumstances we ought not to allow the solicitor now to amend his proof. Therefore, in my opinion, this appeal should be allowed, first, on the ground that Mr. Cox has not satisfied the onus which was upon him of showing this proof was sworn by inadvertence. I have no doubt it was sworn by inadvertence as far as Mr. Cox was aware of it, but I am not satisfied myself that Mr. Cox had not present to his mind that his firm had that security. Secondly, I am of opinion that he ought not to be allowed to amend in a case where the trustee has acted in a way which was consistent with the facts mentioned in the proof, but which would be inconsistent with the suggestion which is now sought to be made. I think under these circumstances leave to amend ought not to be given, and that this appeal should be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I think I am of the same opinion. The first point that has to be considered is whether the court is satisfied that the omission to value the security claimed by the creditor took place by inadvertence. Now, for the reasons which have been given by my learned brother, the evidence appears to me, as it does to him, to be very unsatisfactory, but I am not prepared to say that inadvertence has not been made out. Though I agree with my lord's criticism of the affidavit I prefer to rest my decision on the ground that the granting of leave to amend or to withdraw a proof is not a matter of right, but is subject to the control of the court, and ought not to be given in a case where in the interval between the proof being carried in and the evidence as to the varying of it, the position of all parties, and of the liquidator in particular, has been altered.

Now what took place here was this. The creditor in the present case is a solicitor, and he had been a solicitor to the company which is being wound up, and he had due to him costs to the amount of over £800 in respect of his services which were provable in the winding up. He had in his office certain deeds and documents belonging to the company, and the liquidator appointed in the winding up appointed him also as his solicitor, and amongst other things on which he was called to advise upon by the liquidator was the sale of the property of the company. The property consisted of various elements. First of all there was a patent; secondly, came freeholds and leaseholds, on which were plant and machinery, I understand fixed and movable; and lastly there was stock-in-trade.

Now, that being the state of things, the solicitor had a lien on the documents which belonged to the company for the debt due to him by the company. I cannot help thinking there has been some misapprehension between the parties as to the nature of the solicitor's right. I should have imagined (of course from what I see here, though I cannot say definitely it was so) that there would be stated the security on the deed to which the deed and documents relate, but I need not say that is an entire misapprehension. The solicitor's lien simply entitled him to retain those documents in his hands until he receives payment of what is due to him as solicitor.

Now, that being so, the solicitor advised the liquidator with reference to this sale, and it seems to me it was his duty plainly to tell the liquidator what rights he had in respect of these documents. He ought to have told him "You have to sell this property, but you must remember we cannot complete this sale without our fees, and I shall not part with the deeds unless and until I am paid all that is due to me from the company." Then the solicitor would have been in a position to consider what he should do, and it might be a most important thing, indeed it would be a most important thing to consider how he should sell the property. The patent, for example, which as I understand was in the possession of the solicitor, would undoubtedly affect the title to the assets of the company. The title of the leaseholder would be again affected by the lease. As regards the fixed plant, the machinery and stock-in-trade, that would be entirely unaffected. Now, that question has arisen, not only in selling estates, but in winding up companies, and what I should expect to be done is this. That either an arrangement should be made as between the solicitor and liquidator by which the deed would be parted with if the parties were unable to come to arrangements between themselves; or that the matter must be brought before the court in some shape or form that is best, as in some cases it might be, that the sale should go on practically unaffected without the title deeds being produced at all, or these documents being affected. The liquidator gets simply an order to put them up with conditions such as will dispense with him handing over to the purchaser the deeds to which the purchaser would otherwise be entitled to. That is all. It sometimes happens a portion of a sale is allowed to go on on the ground that the solicitor directs a certain amount of the purchase-money should be set aside to meet the claim, but that is by a matter of arrangement, and between the parties themselves, or an arrangement under the direction of the court. No arrangement of any kind is admitted to have been made here. The sale was ready to take place of the whole of the property both where the title-deeds were withheld and where they were not. The sale took place and is completed, and the solicitor hands over to the purchaser the deeds of one lot, and having done that seeks to retain the amount of his lien. Now he comes to the court and asks it to assist him in making good his claim and that he may be allowed to withdraw and amend his proof. I think, under the circumstances, he should not be allowed to do so, and the appeal will be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Helder, Roberts, & Co., for W. H. Clarke, Leeds.

Solicitors for the respondent, Cox & Lafone.

From K. B. Div. (In Bkcy.) (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) } Oct. 30; Nov. 20; Dec. 11.

In re SOLOMONS.
Ex parte THE BANKRUPT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Misdemeanour of bankrupt—Discharge—"Special reasons"—Discharge suspended—Application for re-hearing refused—Right of bankrupt to apply—Practice—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 11, sub-sections 9, 10, 12—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 8, sub-sections 1, 2.

Upon an application for a discharge under section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, by a bankrupt who has been convicted of an offence against section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869, the court has a discretion, and may take into consideration as "special reasons" for granting the discharge, the circumstances under which the offence was committed.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Linklater dated the 11th of August, 1903, refusing an application to review, rescind, or vary an order of discharge dated the 27th of June, 1899.

The facts were as follows: A receiving order was made against the bankrupt in November, 1898, and an order of adjudication in bankruptcy on the 15th of December in the same year. The official receiver published his report in February, 1899, in which he stated that the debtor's bankruptcy was greatly due to his unjustifiable extravagance in living, and that he, knowing himself to be insolvent, had not kept proper books of account, and had still persisted in carrying on his trade, and also was guilty of misconduct in having accepted bills, in relation to his property, for the benefit of another person and himself, drawn so as to represent trade bills, and accepted as such by him.

Having applied for his discharge on the 28th of February, 1899, it was refused, and on the 14th of March the registrar made an order suspending his discharge for five years from the 17th of January, 1899.

On the 6th of March, 1899, an order was made by the court for the trustee to prosecute the debtor under sub-sections 9, 10, and 12 of section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c 62), for falsifying the books of his account intending to conceal the true state of his affairs. The order was carried out, and the bankrupt prosecuted at the Central Criminal Court and found guilty.

The Common Serjeant, who tried the case, ordered it to stand over till the next sessions, and meanwhile the bankrupt was kept in custody for four weeks, when the Common Serjeant, thinking he had been sufficiently punished, bound him over in a sum of £50 to come up for judgment when called upon.

The trustee later applied to vary the order of discharge under section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), but the registrar refused his discharge.

The two sub-sections 9 and 10 of the Debtors Act, 1869, under which the debtor was convicted are as follows: Section 11. "Any person adjudged bankrupt . . . shall in each of the cases following be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour . . . that is to say (inter alia), (9) If after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him or the commencement of the liquidation, or within four months next before such presentation or commencement, he conceals, destroys, mutilates, or falsifies, or is privy to . . . any book or document affecting or relating to his property or affairs, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to conceal the state of his affairs or to defeat the law." Sub-section 10 is substantially the same.

On the 3rd of April, 1900, a fresh application was made by the bankrupt to the registrar to rehear his application for discharge, when he alleged that all the facts were not fully before the court when his application was refused, and that Wright, J., had held there was no fraudulent preference upon an application by the trustee to have a payment by the bankrupt to a creditor set aside, the transaction which he had tried to conceal in his books.

This application was on the 30th of April refused by the registrar, and on the 22nd of June his appeal therefrom was dismissed, when no person appeared for the official receiver.

On the 11th of July, 1901, the registrar again refused his application for a rehearing of his application for discharge, and on the 26th of May, 1903, another application was made by the bankrupt for a day to be fixed for the rehearing, and to amend the order of the 27th of June, 1900, and this was again refused; on appeal it was referred back to the registrar to enable him to go through the evidence supplied by the bankrupt in support.

On the 11th of August, 1903, the registrar came to the conclusion that no "special circumstances" existed which would justify him granting the bankrupt's discharge under sub-section 2 of section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and that he ought not rehear the bankrupt's application on that account.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 8, sub-section 1, provides as follows: "A bankrupt may, at any time after being adjudged bankrupt, apply to the court for an order of discharge, and the court shall appoint a day for hearing the application . . ."; and sub-section 2: "On the hearing of the application the court shall take into consideration a report of the official receiver as to the bankrupt's conduct and affairs (including a report as to the bankrupt's conduct during the proceedings under his bankruptcy), and may either grant or refuse an absolute order of discharge. . . . Provided that the court shall refuse the discharge in all cases where the bankrupt has committed any misdemeanour under the Debtors Act, 1869, or the principal Act, or any other misdemeanour connected with his bankruptcy, or any felony connected with his bankruptcy, unless for special reasons the court otherwise determines . . ."

The bankrupt appealed.

Oct. 30.—H. Reed, K.C., and A. H. Carrington, for the bankrupt.—Section 8, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, was intended to give the court a discretion in proper cases, such as an application for a discharge, when the facts proved are not serious; that is, is this offence of such a kind as for the court to say that this man shall not trade again? There are special reasons in this case, lapse of time and good conduct of the bankrupt, which are not sufficient to justify a refusal of an application for discharge.

They cited the following cases: In re Tobias & Co., 39 W. R. 399, [1891] 1 Q. B. 463; In re Freeman, Ex parte Freeman, 7 Morrell 38, 38 W. R. Dig. 16; In re Lloyd, Ex parte Lloyd, 6 Morrell 297, 38 W. R. Dig. 16; Ex parte Hill, In re Bird, 32 W. R. 177, 23 Ch. D. 695, 32 W. R. Dig. 17; In re Stevens, Ex parte Board of Trade, 47 W. R. 61, [1898] 2 Q. B. 495; In re Richards, Ex parte Evans, 10 Morrell 136; Herbert v. Sayer, L. R 5 Q. B. 965.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We are of opinion that a primâ facie case for hearing this matter has been made out, and we think it desirable to deal with those circumstances ourselves; we think, therefore, we had better adjourn this matter for three weeks, that notice should be given to the official receiver, and a notice put in the newspapers to allow of any creditors to come in.

Nov. 20.—Sir E. Carson, S.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—An advertisement has been issued, and the official receiver received notice of the appeal. Under the Act of 1869 the Court of Bankruptcy had no discretion at all, they were bound to refuse the discharge, but by sub-section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, "unless for 'special reasons' the court otherwise determines . . ." The "special reasons" there referred to must be special reasons existing at the time of the order of discharge, and the court cannot get rid of the fact of the conviction. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—A refusal of discharge is in no sense a part of a punishment for a crime]. The Legislature found this state of things under the law prior to 1890, afterwards it was their intention that under the Act of 1869 a bankrupt should be placed in a position, in the interests of the community, so as to prevent him from trading, if he is convicted of a misdemeanour under that Act, and where there is a conviction, strong facts must be found to permit such a man to trade after. This is not one of the cases specially provided for in the Act, and about this particular matter the court can only affix conditions as to the discharge, and only for special reasons. The Legislature has intended that when a man has been convicted, unless he can show "special reasons," the court ought not to allow him his discharge. Whatever this man's motives, the Legislature has said that the crime of which he was convicted was a criminal offence, and that he should be deprived of his certificate of discharge. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read Lord Alverstone's judgment.] The offence is the concealment in the books, and there are no cases where a bankrupt has ever got his discharge who has committed a criminal offence under this section. His subsequent conduct after the refusal of the order of discharge is of no account; his conduct in relation to his bankruptcy alone would constitute special circumstances.

H. Reed, K.C., and A. H. Carrington, for the bankrupt.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We have already said that we think a day ought to be named for rehearing this case ourselves, instead of sending it back to the registrar, and we will now give our reasons for thinking why we should fix a day. What we have to consider with regard to this section is the meaning of the words "special reasons" in the proviso at the end of the sub-section 2. [His lordship read the sub-section.] We have to consider what is the meaning of those words. So far as the language is conclusive, there is no limitation put on "special reasons," but it is left to the discretion of the court to say what constitutes "special reasons." I am very anxious not to say anything more than is necessary, nor to fetter any court hereafter as to the construction they may put upon the term "special reasons," but the contention of the Solicitor-General was that you could not take into consideration any of the circumstances under which the offence was committed, nor the conduct of the bankrupt after his discharge had been refused, and regard that in the light of special circumstances. I do not think it is necessary to deal with the second contention of the Solicitor-General. I heard, and am greatly impressed with his argument that to say that the good conduct of a man after his bankruptcy constituted a special reason was to say that a man by abstaining from doing anything that was wrong, what may be called good conduct, created a special circumstance under the section. I do not think it is for us to decide that, although I feel the force of the Solicitor-General's argument. I will deal with the other contention advanced by the Solicitor-General—that is, that given a conviction, one could not take into consideration as a special reason the object of the offender when he committed the offence. I think you can. The very fact that the Common Serjeant, who tried the case, dealt with it in the way he did is a special circumstance, which ought to be taken into consideration. Can it, then, be said that because the learned judge so deals with an offence as to shew that in his opinion it was not comparatively a grave instance of the offence under the section, a bankrupt can say at once, "Give me my discharge now," or to wait a short time and then say, "Give me my discharge now." I think not. When once you have got the fact that there are circumstances in connection with the offence, which go in mitigation of the offence, you have a special circumstance, but it is very right that there should be a period of probation. The intention of the Legislature is, that a man who has been made a bankrupt, and who has been guilty of misconduct under section 11, sub-sections 9 and 10 of the Debtors Act, 1869, should not be allowed to exercise his rights of trading immediately. It is quite right, therefore, that in such a case an immediate discharge should not be granted, even though special circumstances may exist. A period of probation is necessary always, during which, if the bankrupt behaves badly, he would forfeit all chance of taking advantage of the mitigating circumstances which were present when the offence was committed. On the other hand, if a sufficient time has elapsed to enable one to form an opinion whether to allow such a man to trade would be dangerous to the public, then, if his conduct is of such a description as to show he is not likely to be dangerous, then I think his discharge should be granted. I think this was the view taken by Lord Alverstone in the Court of Appeal on this very matter. I do not think that he was deciding then that mere good conduct for a period of time would constitute a special reason. Under these circumstances I think a day ought to be named. I am not expressing any opinion as to what should be our judgment in regard to whether the order should now be varied. But there are special reasons existing in this case by means of what happened at the trial, and also by the light thrown on the debtor's conduct in respect of the very transaction which constituted the basis of Wright, J.'s, decision when he convicted him, that the object was not, as the trustee and official receiver at one time obviously thought, the fraudulent preference of a particular creditor. If we think that the period of probation has expired, we could fix a day, probably, to hear the application to vary, but we will ourselves dispose of the question by hearing the appeal from the refusal of the registrar to vary the order of discharge, and the onus will lie on the appellant.

ROMER, L.J.—I think that the case is so confused, and the circumstances are so peculiar, that we ought to hear the debtor's application for a discharge ourselves and dispose of the matter. Personally I desire to say that, as at present advised, I am not in doing so to be supposed to hold that the good conduct of a bankrupt in commerce since his bankruptcy would in itself, apart from other considerations, form a "special reason" within the meanng of sub-section 2 of section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. I do not think it good or advisable to try and put a construction on what are "special reasons"; but in hearing an application for a discharge on the ground of "special reasons," and in deciding what should be done upon it, I think the court cannot disregard the conduct of the debtor, at any rate in the bankruptcy, and especially with reference to the act of misdemeanour of which he may have been guilty.

STIRLING, L.J.—I should like to add that, in my judgment, in any view of the case there are special reasons in this case. First, there is the mode in which the learned judge dealt with the case of misdemeanour, and to that I think great weight ought to be attached. But it does not rest there alone, because the circumstances under which the misdemeanour of which the bankrupt was found guilty was committed have been investigated, and have been adjudicated by Wright, J., and the conclusion to which he came on that occasion tends to corroborate the accuracy of the judgment which the learned judge who tried the case formed at the hearing. In these circumstances it seems to me there are special reasons. I must also add this: that I do not forget that both these facts were before this court on the 22nd of June, 1900, when an application to fix a date for rehearing had been made before the learned registrar, and refused by him, and the court affirmed that decision. I do not think that that amounted to a decision by this court that there were no special circumstances in this case.

The record of the judgment which we have from the registrar's book seems to prove the contrary, because it seems to me to have been simply a decision that, although there were, or at any rate might be, special circumstances in the case, the time had not arrived when they ought to be taken into consideration by this court or by the court which had jurisdiction to hear the application. Three years have elapsed since then, and I am not prepared to say that sufficient time has not elapsed. I desire to say no more, leaving the rest of the circumstances under which the present application is made to be considered when we hear the argument.

Appeal allowed.

Dec. 11.—Application for discharge came on for rehearing.

Reed, K.C.—The bankrupt has since his conviction endeavoured to redress the past.

Affidavits of witnesses in reference to his good conduct were read.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We are of opinion that the bankrupt ought not to be refused his discharge for ever, yet the report of the official receiver has certainly disclosed matters which tell very heavily against the debtor in this case; and the order suspending his discharge for five years was made independently of the offence of which he was subsequently convicted, and we cannot in dealing with this question regard this fact of no account, therefore we think it desirable under the circumstances that his discharge should be suspended for one year beyond the five.

ROMER and STIRLING, L.JJ., concurred.

Solicitors for the appellant, Ralph Raphael & Co.

Solicitor for the official receiver, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

High Court of Justice.

K. B. Div. (Channell, J.) — Feb. 23.

LORD LUDLOW v. PIKE. (a.).

Landlord and tenant — Tithe — Agreement to pay additional sum by way of tithe—Legality of agreement—Tithe Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 8). s. 1 (1).

An agreement whereby a tenant agrees to pay by way of further rent "so much as the landlord shall pay for tithe rent-charge" comes within the prohibition enacted by section 1 (1) of the Tithe Rent-charge Act, 1891, and is therefore void.

Point of law raised on the pleadings.

The following are the facts of the case:

The plaintiff's predecessor let to the defendant a farm at the yearly rent of £255, and also by way of further rent-charge so much as the landlord shall pay for the tithe rent-charge on such premises. The plaintiff brought an action to recover £127 10s., being six months' rent, and the defendant paid into court £117 10s., and pleaded that the balance £10 11s. 9d. in respect of rent-charge could not be recovered by the landlord as it was void under section 1 (1) of the Tithe Rent-charge Act, 1891. That section is as follows: "Tithe rent-charge as defined by this Act issuing out of any lands shall be payable by the owner of such lands, notwithstanding any contract between him and the occupier of such lands; and any contract made between an occupier and owner of lands after the passing of this Act for the payment of the tithe rent-charge by the occupier shall be void."

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the clause in the lease came within the section.

Foote, K.C. (Garland and Foa with him), for the plaintiff.—This clause does not come within the section. The Act was passed to prohibit the occupier paying the tithe rent-charge to the tithe owner. It did not prevent the landlord transferring the burden of the tithe rent-charge to the occupier by agreement.

He cited Davies v. Fitton, 2 Dr. & W. 223, and Beadel v. Pitt, 13 W. R. 287.

Moyses, for the defendant, was not called upon to argue.

CHANNELL, J.—There may be a good many reasons why the Legislature should not have prohibited contracts of this nature, but I have, sitting here, to deal with the words of the Act and to see whether the words in the lease come within the language of the section. Now, the agreement here is to pay an additional sum for rent equal to the amount of the tithe. That puts on the tenant the burden of the tithe, giving him, on the one hand, the benefit of any reduction if the price of corn should fall, and making him pay an additional sum if the price of corn should rise. I think that comes within the prohibition enacted by the statute. I confess I do not quite see why the Legislature should have forbidden a contract of this kind.

The object of the Act would have been attained without that prohibition, but it is sometimes convenient to go beyond what is absolutely necessary in order to ensure that the particular object in view shall be attained. But whatever the reason of the prohibition it is there, and in my opinion this agreement clearly comes within the words of the section. With regard to the authorities I think that Davies v. Fitton is directly in point. In that case the Lord Chancellor of Ireland drew a distinction between a covenant to pay an exact amount of tithe, whatever it may be, and a covenant to pay a sum assessed as compensation for having to pay tithe, and expressed his opinion that the latter covenant would be perfectly good. The case of Colbron v. Travers, 12 C. B. N. S. 4, is to the same effect.

In my opinion, therefore, this agreement comes within the express words of the statute, and there must be judgment for the defendant.

Judgment accordingly.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Pinniger, Callaway, & Pinniger, Westbury.

Solicitors for the defendant, J. T. Rossiter.

K. B. Div. (Channell, J.) Feb. 22.

PARKER AND ANOTHER v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Public authority, action against — Tramway system acquired by county council—Public undertaking or commercial enterprize—Acquired and carried on with funds provided by the rates—Accident to passenger—Time within which action must be brought—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1 (a).

The defendants, a local authority, acquired under an Act of Parliament power to purchase and work the undertaking of a tramway company with funds provided out of the rates. The plaintiffs received personal injuries owing to the alleged negligence of the defendants' servants, whereby the tramcar on which they were travelling collided with another tramcar. In an action to recover damages commenced more than six months after the accident, the defendants pleaded that the action could not be maintained by reason of the provision in section 1 (a) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

Held, that the local authority could avail themselves of the protection afforded to public authorities, and that the action, therefore, not having been brought within six months, was barred.

Case stated by order of a master for the determination of a point of law raised by the defendants.

The question for decision was whether the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, availed the defendants, as common carriers, in their defence to an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiffs by the alleged negligence of the defendants' servants. The defendants were, under the London Tramways Act, 1896, proprietors of the tramways, and the plaintiffs, mother and son, were passengers on one of their tramcars from Tooting to Westminster. Another tramcar of the defendants was coming from Blackfriars to Tooting, and the drivers of each car endeavoured to get first on to a single tramway line. In doing so the cars collided and the plaintiffs thereby received the injuries they claimed damages for.

Section 1 of the Act provides that "Where . . . any action . . . is commenced . . . against any person for any act done in pursuance . . . of any Act of Parliament or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect: (a) The action . . . shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or, in the case of the continuance of injury or damage within six months after the ceasing thereof."

The plaintiffs issued the writ in this action on the 12th of January, 1903, against the defendant county council to recover damages for personal injuries received as above stated on the 16th of June, 1902. The accident took place during the electrification of the line, when two lines were placed so close together that if two cars passed at that point a collision must ensue. It was admitted for the purpose of having this preliminary point of law decided that it should be taken that the collision was caused by the negligence of the drivers of the cars, or one of them, in getting the cars into the position in which they came. The defendants by virtue of certain private and local Acts of Parliament had acquired the tramways of, among other companies, the London Tramways Co., and at the time of the accident were carrying on the enterprise in relation to the tramways with funds provided out of the rates.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants contended that they were exonerated from liability here because in carrying on the workings of the tramways the provisions of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, applied in their favour, and that inasmuch as the plaintiffs had not commenced proceedings within six months after the negligent act complained of, the action was barred by the limitation imposed by section 1 (a) of that statute.

The question of law raised was now argued.

Moyses, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants qud carriers of passengers for profit are engaged in a commercial enterprize, and are therefore not within the provisions of the Act of 1893, and cannot rely on the defence given to public bodies. Therefore the action is not barred: Corfus v. London and Brighton Railway Co., 5 A. & E. 547; Palmer v. Grand Junction Railway Co., 4 M. & W. 749.

Daldy, for the defendants.—It is assumed here that the accident was caused by the negligence of one or both of the drivers of the defendants' tramways. Therefore the claim is based on the "neglect or default" of the servants of the county council. The council was working the line under powers granted them for that purpose by Act of Parliament, and the necessary funds were provided by the rates. It follows that if the plaintiffs succeed the damages they recover and the costs that the council would in that case have to pay must be borne by the rates, and the county council are under a statutory obligation not to do anything negligently whereby expenses would be thrown on the ratepayers. The defendants here are not a commercial company, but a municipal body. Therefore we have all the elements necessary to constitute the council, as the tramways authority, a public authority as distinguished from a commercial company. It follows that they are entitled to the protection given by the Act of Parliament to public bodies against whom a claim is made based on neglect or default in carrying out a public duty. [Attorney-General v. Margate Pier and Harbour Co., 48 W. R. 518, [1900] 1 Ch. 749; The Ydun, [1899] P. 236; 47 W. R. Dig. 166; Ambler & Sons (Limited) v. Bradford Corporation, [1902] 2 Ch. 585, 51 W. R. Dig. 43; Mackey v. Tolworth Joint Isolation Hospital District Board, [1900] 2 Q. B. 454, 48 W. R. Dig. 99; Edwards v. St. Mary, Islington, 37 W. R. 347, 22 Q. B. D. 338; North Metropolitan Tramways Co. v. London County Council, 46 W. R. 554, [1898] 2 Ch. 145, were referred to.] The proviso in section 1 (a) does not avail the plaintiffs by enlarging the time within which the action can be commenced: Carey v. Bermondsey Borough, 20 Times L. R. 2.

Moyses replied.

CHANNELL, J.—I confess that during a considerable portion of the argument I was inclined to think that there were grounds upon which I could decide the question raised in favour of the plaintiffs, but I have come to the conclusion that the matter is concluded by authority, and that whatever my personal opinion may be on the facts, I am bound by the principle laid down in The Ydun to give my judgment for the defendants. The facts here were that the London County Council, under the combined operation of several Acts of Parliament, obtained the powers to acquire, and when acquired to work, certain tramways, and in particular the tramway to Tooting on which this accident arose, which was alleged to be due to the negligence of one or other of the tramcar drivers. The question which thus arises is whether an action would lie which had not been commenced within six months after the accident, and that depends on whether or not the defendants are a body to which, in relation to their tramway undertaking, the Public Authorities Protection Act applies. The case decided by Kekewich, J., of the Attorney-General v. Margate Pier and Harbour Co. shows that the tramway company from whom the defendants had purchased the undertaking would not have been protected by the statute under similar circumstances, since they were clearly a commercial company, and none the less so because they carried on their undertaking under statutory powers. The present case is different, inasmuch as the defendants carry on the enterprize as a municipal body. It is a general principle, when things have to be paid for out of the rates, that the ratepayers must bear their own burdens, and must not leave such things unpaid and thus shift the liability to some future date, to be borne possibly by other ratepayers made liable under a subsequent assessment. That principle might have been the reason why this protection was given to public authorities by the Legislature, so that as nearly as possible those who while in office incurred a liability might be the body against whom proceedings to recover damages might be instituted. However that may be, I do not rest my decision on that ground. No doubt when that Act was passed the Legislature did not contemplate the case of municipal bodies carrying on commercial enterprizes of this kind, but all that I am called on to decide here is the effect of the words that the Legislature used. If the matter had been left open for me to decide what was the intention of the Legislature, and how the words they used should be construed in a case like the present, I should, I think, have been inclined to say that on the true construction of the section the defendants would have been protected from consequences of negligence in the course of the construction of the tramways, but they would not be protected from the consequences of their servants' negligence in carrying on the work in relation to the working of the trams after the construction was completed. I think, apart from the authorities, there might well have been a good deal to be said in such an argument. But, as I have before said, the case is covered by authorities, and particularly by the case of The Ydun. In that instance a municipal corporation had become a harbour authority with power to take tolls from ships entering the harbour. The harbour-master was negligent. In an action to recover damages from the corporation for the consequences of that negligence it was held that the corporation, in carrying out their duties in respect of the harbour, were protected by the Public Authorities Protection Act, and in that case, as here, the defendants claimed exemption from liability on the ground that the action had not been commenced in time.

Therefore my judgment must be for the defendants, as I hold they are entitled to claim the protection afforded public authorities by the statute.

Judgment entered accordingly for the defendants on the point of law, with the costs of the argument.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Henry I. Sydney.

Solicitor for the defendants, W. A. Blaxland.

K. B. Div.
(Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) Jan. 22.

CHAPMAN v. WINSON. (a)

Principal and agent—Commission—"When and if the purchase is completed by private treaty."

The defendant, who was desirous of selling a house, entered into an agreement with the plaintiff that if the latter introduced to him a person who should become the purchaser of the house, he, the defendant, would pay the plaintiff as and by way of commission a certain sum "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty." The plaintiff introduced a purchaser who was accepted by the defendant, and a contract to purchase was signed and a deposit paid. The purchaser was unable to carry out the contract, and it was agreed between her and the defendant that he should release her from the contract in consideration that he should retain the deposit, and this was accordingly done.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to his commission, as the purchase was "completed by private treaty" so far as he was concerned.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of his Honour Judge Austin, sitting at the Bristol County Court.

The action was brought to recover certain commission.

In June, 1902, the defendant was trying to sell the Full Moon Hotel, particulars of which he gave to the plaintiff, who knew a lady who was a likely purchaser.

On the 8th of September, 1902, the defendant gave the plaintiff the following commission note: "If your friend is named and introduced within one week, and becomes the purchaser of the above hotel, you shall be paid as and by way of commission a sum of £50 when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty."

The lady was thereupon introduced to the defendant by the plaintiff, and on the 11th of September, she signed a contract agreeing to purchase the hotel from the defendant for the sum of £2,000, and by way of deposit she paid the defendant the sum of £200.

Subsequently she found she would not be able to complete the contract, and an arrangement was come to between the defendant and herself whereby it was agreed that the defendant should release her from the contract, and that he should retain the deposit of £200, and this was accordingly done.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action, claiming that he was entitled to his commission.

The learned county court judge gave judgment for the defendant, being of opinion that in construing the commission note he was bound to give some effect to the words "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty," and that as the purchase went off through no fault of the defendant, and was never "completed" in the ordinary meaning of the word, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover commission.

From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

J. A. Hawk, for the plaintiff.—The decision of the learned county court judge is wrong. The meaning of the words "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty" is that if the plaintiff introduces a purchaser by private treaty, and that intending purchaser enters into a contract to purchase the house, then the plaintiff is entitled to be paid his commission. The plaintiff did in fact introduce a purchaser who was willing to buy, and who did in fact enter into a contract to buy, and paid the deposit money in respect thereof. He is therefore entitled to his commission, and the fact that the defendant released the purchaser from her contract does not deprive the plaintiff of his right.

He cited Grogan & Co v. Smith, 6 Times L. R. 427, 7 Times L. R. 132; and Passingham v. King, 14 Times L. R. 39, 392.

Brook Little, for the defendant.—The learned county court judge was right in deciding that the plaintiff was not entitled to his commission. The meaning of the words "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty" is that the purchase must be completed in the sense of the purchase-money being handed over and the deed of conveyance signed. In the present case this never took place, and the plaintiff has not, therefore, earned his commission.

WILLS, J.—In this case the point we have to decide is one of some difficulty, because these words "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty" are not as clear as they might be, and I can quite understand two persons arriving at quite opposite conclusions as to what their true meaning is.

In construing a sentence it is a good general rule that, unless you are driven to a contrary conclusion, you should construe the words according to their grammatical meaning. Now, in the sentence we are construing here, the words "private treaty" attach to the word "completed," and the plaintiff is stated to be entitled to be paid a certain sum as and by way of commission when the purchase is completed in a particular way—namely, by private treaty, and I think the words "by private treaty" are meant to exclude sale by auction. If the word "completed" here means completed in the ordinary legal sense—namely, by the execution of the deed of conveyance and the handing over of the balance of the purchase-money—then I cannot see that there is any meaning in the words "private treaty" as attached to the word "completed." I think the word "completed" is used, not in its technical, but in its grammatical meaning, and I think the parties to the commission note intended to use the word in that sense. In my opinion the purchase was completed by private treaty, for if the vendor is bound by the contract to sell, and the purchaser is bound to buy, and the purchaser is accepted by the vendor, then the purchase is completed so far as the agent is concerned. I am of the opinion that the meaning attached to the words "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty" by the learned county court judge is not their true meaning, and therefore this appeal must be allowed.

KENNEDY, J.—I entirely agree. I do not see how there can be any answer to the reasonable meaning my brother Wills has placed upon these words. It would not be fair to take these words out of the order in which we find them, and read them as if they ran "when and if the purchase by private treaty is completed." If the parties had intended the words to have been so read it would have been very easy for them to have written them so.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for plaintiff, W. G. Card, for E. Woodhouse Veale, Bristol.

Solicitors for defendant, Darley & Cumberland, for F. J. Tarr & Son, Bristol.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K. B. Div.
(Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) Jan. 20.

BARRATT v. GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Goods consigned by shippers for carriage over several companies' lines under their special contract with railway company—Goods lost by fire while on rail—Privity of contract—Alternate rates—Owners' risk—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), s. 7.

Where two or more railway companies agree together to carry through goods at a special rate in consideration that the goods are conveyed at owners' risk on their respective lines, and goods are lost or damaged, the sender has no cause of action, although the loss or damage to the goods occurred through the negligence of one of the companies other than that to which the sender or his agent consigned the goods on these terms.

Appeal by the defendant railway company from a verdict and judgment entered for the plaintiff with £40 damages at the trial of the action before his Honour Judge Baugh Allen, sitting at the Bingham County Court.

The facts, so far as material, were these: The plaintiff, a nurseryman, carrying on business at Radcliffe-on-Trent, purchased a large number of plants and shrubs in Belgium and consigned them to England by Messrs. Wilson, Sons, & Co. (Limited), who shipped them from Antwerp to Hull. There the shippers handed the plants for carriage from Hull to Radcliffe-on-Trent to the North-Eastern Railway Co. and the Great Northern Railway Co. at the lower through rate in pursuance of a contract entered into by Wilsons (Limited) with the North-Eastern Railway Co. in January, 1895, whereby it was agreed that all goods to which the alternative rates applied delivered by Messrs. Wilsons should be carried at the lower rate in consideration of that firm relieving the company and all companies and persons over whose lines the goods might pass from all liability for loss and damage except upon the proof that the loss, damage, &c., arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the company's servants.

While the shrubs were being carried by the Great Northern Railway they were destroyed by fire. At the trial the defendant company pleaded that, there being no evidence of wilful misconduct, they were protected by the terms of the special contract, and that there was no case to go to the jury.

The judge ruled otherwise, and the jury found that the defendants were negligent and assessed the damages at £40.

The defendants appealed.

Lush, K.C., and Dwyer, for the defendants.—The plaintiff cannot recover damages in this case, because if there was no contract between the defendants and the plaintiff there was no breach of duty, and, therefore, an action based on negligence—that is, a breach of duty—cannot be maintained. On the other hand, if there was a contract it was one to carry the plaintiff's goods at owner's risk, and the plaintiff has failed to show that "the loss or damage arose from wilful misconduct," which would under the contract alone make the defendants liable. The Great Northern Co. must be taken to have agreed with the North-Eastern Railway Co. to make terms in its name as one of the carrying companies that would be involved in the through carriage of goods from Hull to Radcliffe. They accepted their proportion of freight based on the lower rate under the contract. That contract binding them to accept less than otherwise would have been charged, they are entitled to the benefit against liability which was the consideration for reduced rates given by that contract.

W. H. Stevenson, for the plaintiff.—The judge was quite right in entering judgment for the plaintiff, because, assuming there was no contract inter partes, a railway company to whom goods have been consigned for carriage are guilty of a tort if they are damaged in the company's care by the negligence of the company's servants: Foulkes v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 28 W. R. 526, 5 C. P. D. 157. Assuming that there was a contract with the North-Eastern Railway Co., that does not prevent the plaintiff suing the defendants, for there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendants. The defendants seek to avoid liability on the ground that the goods were consigned under a special contract at a lower rate at owner's risk. Before they can rely on that defence they must show that this was a special contract within the provisions of section 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, and Peek v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 11 W. R. 1023, 10 H. L. C. 473, is an authority against such a contention. Should this court find in favour of the plaintiff on the main question, there should be a new trial, because then the verdict of the jury must be taken as to whether the want of care that caused the loss amounted to wilful misconduct or only to negligence on the part of the defendants. Until that question is answered the defendants cannot rely on the proviso in the contract.

Lush, K.C., replied.

WILLS, J.—This is a case of very considerable importance, and it has been very completely argued, but I have come to a very clear opinion myself that the defendants are entitled to judgment, and that there is no question which necessitates the sending of the case down for a new trial.

One point I think I have already disposed of, and that is this. Mr. Stevenson wanted to make out that he would be entitled to a new trial, because he had not asked the jury at the trial to find there was wilful misconduct, and that, if he got a second trial and submitted that question to the jury, he would get a verdict. I have no doubt he would get a verdict on that or on anything else he elected to suggest to them, provided it was against the railway company; but clearly he is not entitled to such an indulgence as that. The question is, whether, on the facts known to us, and the course the case took at the trial, the defendants are entitled to judgment. No question was raised there about wilful misconduct, and therefore it does not arise here.

Now, the only difficulty in the case arises upon the question of whether there is evidence of a contract, or whether a contract has been established between the Great Northern Railway Co. and the present plaintiff. That depends upon establishing two agencies. As to one there is no difficulty. Nobody can doubt that Messrs. Wilson were agents of the plaintiff to make the contract they did with the North-Eastern Co., and the only matter about which there is any possibility of difficulty is, whether the North-Eastern Railway Co. are shown to have been the agents of the Great Northern Co. in making this contract with respect to the goods that were to be carried over the railways of both companies. One knows by this something of the regular course of railway business and railway management, and, to begin with, it is almost an impossibility that in the present day one railway company should make a bargain professing to control the rates and the proceeding of another railway company unless there was some such arrangement between them as would allow that to be done. We know, in point of fact, that the business of the country could not be carried on for a day unless these arrangements were made by which one railway company agrees with another to have goods carried on terms that are convenient to themselves and to the sender over all parts of their systems and over all systems in the country; and therefore it does not want a great deal of evidence to show that it is in the highest degree antecedently probable. It seems to me that there is abundant evidence to show it. There was one charge here—one through rate. That rate was collected, and habitually collected, by the Great Northern Co. They certainly were in business relations with the North-Eastern Railway Co., and they were certainly aware of the charges which the North-Eastern Co. were making for the carriage through. They were aware also, and they must have been aware that the North-Eastern Co. was charging the cheaper rate—the owner's risk rate—in respect of the goods it was in the habit of sending to this gentleman over their line; and under these circumstances it is quite impossible to suppose that they themselves were receiving anything but the owner's risk rate. How did they become liable to carry the goods for that smaller rate? Only by virtue of this agreement; and there seems to me to be abundant evidence that this agreement was acted upon in its entirety with the knowledge, concurrence, and consent of the Great Northern Co. If so, the Great Northern Co. have allowed the North-Eastern Co. to make this contract in its name as one of the carrying companies that would be involved in the carriage of the through goods, and having done so they were bound by it, and are therefore entitled to the benefit of it.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The agreement is constituted by two letters dated the 8th of January, 1895, which refer to all traffic that is to be sent by Messrs. Wilson. There are two rates and the North-Eastern Co. mention their two rates and they say the reduced rate is adopted when the sender agrees to relieve the company and all other companies or persons whose lines the goods may pass from liability, loss, or damage, except in the case of wilful misconduct. That is agreed to; and Messrs. Wilson write that they do agree to relieve the North-Eastern and all other companies and persons over whose lines the goods may pass of such liability. What would be the value of that, if, as is suggested, there were no contracts with the subsidiary or following lines? It would be nothing, because the state of things would arise which Mr. Stevenson so earnestly contended for—namely, that a person who for years has taken the benefit of these rates should whenever a loss occurred be able to turn round and say, "Oh, no, I have taken the benefit of this. I have got the full benefit of it for years, and having got that I will now turn round and get damages out of the company on the footing that there is no contract between us at all." That is not, I think, honest or straightforward; on the contrary it is not well founded.

Then Mr. Stevenson raised another difficulty, because he says that under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, it is necessary that on each particular occasion when goods are sent by a company there should be a special contract relating to those particular goods. I think it is going back to the year when railways were first invented to suppose anything of that kind can be necessary, or that it is consistent with the universal course of business. When people are constantly sending goods by a railway, and wish to avail themselves of the owner's risk rate, they do what is done here, they enter into a general contract and request that all their goods shall be sent at owner's risk rate, where there is one, and why that is not a perfectly good special contract I do not know. If I am right in saying that the North-Eastern Co. may be treated as the agents of the Great Northern Co. in making this contract it is just as good a special contract as if it were addressed in terms to the Great Northern Co.

But Mr. Stevenson's quiver is not yet quite exhausted; he has another objection—that the company must prove that there were two rates, and that the difference between them was not an unreasonable one under the circumstances. They did show undoubtedly that there were two rates, and whether the plaintiff knew at the time this took place or not seems to me quite immaterial. The defendants are entitled to the benefit of the plaintiff's conscience. He was stating that he knew, and what he knew to be true was very good evidence in the case whenever he learnt it. Having admitted that there were two rates, I do not think it is possible, whatever may be suggested on his behalf by Mr. Stevenson, to do him the injustice of believing that for a moment he would have suggested he was not perfecely aware that these things were being carried at the lower rate on the owner's risk. There is the clearest evidence of it, and it is impossible to believe that any man who had been twenty years in the trade could have been ignorant of that.

Then it is said it should be shewn there were corresponding advantages to the consignor which would make the condition reasonable. I fail to see that any question of that sort was raised, and I cannot believe that it was raised. It would have been perfectly futile if it had been raised, and the judge would have known at once that that which was acquiesced in by the trade all over the country was reasonable. It often happens at nisi prius that things are taken for granted as to which nobody would have been wild enough to raise a question. It is quite clear that the question would have passed at the trial as an admitted thing that there were two rates, and there was no objection to the lower rate on the ground of its not giving corresponding advantages. Therefore it would be really absurd to send the case for a new trial on a point as to which it is quite clear no question was raised, and as to such, also, if any question had been raised the answer would have been given that there was.

For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the defendants were, in my judgment, clearly entitled to succeed in the court below.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. I think there was such negligence that, if that were a proper question for the jury, they might be so far justified in finding a verdict in favour of the plaintiff, and it would not be right that we should in any way interfere with the verdict if that were the real question. But I agree with my learned brother that the appellants ought to succeed in this, that while the matter is not free from difficulty, it appears to me it is impossible to contend that the goods were carried by the Great Northern Co. except on the terms of the contract which was unquestionably made (I leave for the moment out of sight any statutory question under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act), so far as a contract could be made, by the persons who were authorized by the plaintiff himself to negotiate and arrange for the transmission of the goods from Hull by the railway—namely, Messrs. Wilson. There are cases in which an action may be properly brought, and may be successfully brought. I care not whether upon a breach of duty or breach of an implied contract for damage to goods, although no expressed contract can be proved at all; but what is the only legitimate inference from the facts here is this—that the Great Northern Co. carried these things because they received them from a railway company that had contracted for both lines. Therefore the only inference is that they took them in that way in a train which would be made up, I think, of vehicles belonging to both companies, and that they were being carried by them under an arrangement made on behalf of both companies. The jury would not be justified in finding that Messrs. Wilson were not authorized to enter into a contract that would bind them. Apart from any statutory question that is clear. It would be difficult to put any other version on the facts, because one must bring one's general knowledge to bear in these matters with regard to things that we must take notice of. These arrangements are made, we know, and in this particular case there was an allegation in the evidence before the judge and jury that arrangements were made by which Messrs. Wilson were to send over the whole distance and were to contract for the carriage on behalf of the plaintiff. Although I am going to agree with my learned brother in the result, I must frankly own, after having so much care given to the case by counsel on both sides, that I felt considerable difficulty in saying, although Messrs. Wilson must have intended to make a contract to cover both lines for the plaintiff, and were justified in doing so, whether in fact the contract was so made, as to be a contract to bind the Great Northern Co. to the plaintiff and the plaintiff to the Great Northern Co. with regard to the carriage and the limitation of risk. On the whole I think that a contract was made with all the companies with their authority as if it were joint carriers for the whole route, a contract which was a special contract. There is no doubt about that in one sense, because it is a contract and not a notice to the whole world of the terms of carriage. It is a contract made by the North-Eastern Co. with Messrs. Wilson specially. Then that contract is divided into two parts. There is the general contract which is quite common to that large trade, no doubt, but they make a contract which goes back as far as 1895, that is to apply to all goods consigned by them in the absence of any other arrangement. Then when the time comes for particular goods to go they send that particular note or order that the goods are to be sent for them with special tickets as to the place they are to be sent to, but all are under the contract which is not a general notice of rates by the railway company to the world, but a special contract with Messrs. Wilson, and signed by them. I think that the Railway and Canal Traffic Act is satisfied where there is a company which has the authority of sub-carriers or joint-carriers over whose lines the goods will go, if that company makes a contract for all, because it is one carriage of a set of goods for the common interest of all, and it actually passes over property of each and is in vehicles of the two companies which go jointly to make up the train. I see nothing in the Railway and Canal Traffic Act which obliges me to say there should be more than that. I think that is the only practical course. Many people would not know over how many lines their goods would travel. If there is a shipment of goods the contract applies to all the companies over whose lines the goods have to go.

I think there was evidence of negligence here, but not sufficient for the plaintiff to succeed, because of the terms of the special contract. Mr. Stevenson pressed for a new trial to try the question of wilful misconduct. There are no doubt cases where wilful misconduct approaches negligence very closely. He allowed the case to go to the jury, and by their verdict he must stand.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the railway company, R. Hill Dawe.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, J. H. Lee & Watts, for J. A. Simpson, Nottingham.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) April 26.

OWENS v. P. & A. CAMPBELL (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Wharf—Steamship lying alongside wharf—Fireman—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

The applicant, who was a seaman on the ship's articles, was employed as a fireman on board a passenger steamer, which made daily trips from Cardiff to places in the Bristol Channel. On the evening of the 20th of August the steamer arrived at Cardiff, and was made fast to a landing-stage outside the docks, where she remained until the following morning. She was timed to leave Cardiff at 8.15 a.m. on the 21st of August. At 8.17 a.m. on that day, while she was still made fast to the landing stage, with the gangways still out, the applicant, while attending to the boilers, was injured by the bursting of one of the boiler tubes. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,

Held (by Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J., Mathew, L.J., dissenting), that the applicant was not at the time of the accident employed "about" the landing-stage, and therefore not about a factory within section 7 of the Act, his employment having no connection with the purposes for which his employers had the use of the landing stage.

Appeal from an award of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by his Honour Judge Owen sitting at the Cardiff County Court.

The following were the agreed facts: (1) The accident in respect of which the claim was made took place on the 21st of August, 1903, on board the steamship Cambria. She was a passenger steamboat, which in the summer season made daily trips from Cardiff to Ilfracombe and other places on the Somerset and Devonshire coasts. (2) The applicant was a fireman in the employment of P. & A. Campbell (Limited) on board The Cambria, and his average weekly earnings were 32s. (3) The Cambria came into Cardiff at 7.35 p.m. on the evening before the accident, and was made fast to the landing pontoon which is at the head of the Cardiff Drain and outside the entrance to the docks. The pontoon is a wooden landing-stage which rises and falls with the tide, and by means of which the passengers land from and embark on the vessels. (4) The Cambria remained afloat from the time that she came in until about 8.30 p.m., when she was left dry on the mud. (5) She was made fast to the pontoon by ropes, and she continued to be made fast by the same fastenings until she left the pontoon. (6) The engine fires in the vessel were left in all night, and the applicant, early on the morning of the accident, went on board the vessel to perform his usual duties as a fireman. (7) The vessel was afloat about 1.30 a.m. on the morning of the day of the accident, and was timed to leave Cardiff for Ilfracombe at 8.15 a.m. (8) At 8.17 a.m., whilst the applicant was attending to the boilers, a tube in one of the boilers burst, and he was severely scalded on the face and arms. (9) The gangways from the vessel to the pontoon had been out (that is, connecting the pontoon with the vessel) for some time before the accident happened, and at the time that it happened practically all the passengers going by her were on board the vessel. (10) The main and auxiliary engines of the vessel had been worked before the accident happened. (11) The passengers on board The Cambria were after the accident transferred to the steamship Ravenswood, which left Cardiff at about 8.30 a.m. (12) It was whilst The Cambria was moored to the pontoon for the embarkation of passengers that the accident happened. (13) The applicant was a seaman on the ship's articles and engaged on his duties as a seaman at the time of the accident. (14) The applicant was still suffering from the effects of the accident and was unable to work.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The applicant filed a request for arbitration to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the employers in their answer denied their liability to pay compensation upon the ground that the employment of the applicant was not an employment to which the Act applied.

The county court judge held, upon the authority of Griffin v. Houlder Line, ante, p. 323, [1904] 1 K. B. 510, that the applicant was within the Act, and he made an award for a weekly payment to him of 16s.

The employers appealed.

J. A. Simon, for the employers.

Gatehouse (Albert Parsons with him), for the applicant.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 26.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Cardiff County Court, who held that the injured workman was entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The employers thereupon brought this appeal. The workman was a fireman employed in a passenger steamer which made daily trips from Cardiff to Ilfracombe and other places in the neighbourhood. Upon the occasion in question the vessel had been lying during the night at a wharf which was outside the docks at Cardiff, and it was timed to start on the following morning at 8.15 from Cardiff with passengers. As stated in the judge's notes, the applicant was a seaman on the ship's articles and engaged on his duties as a seaman at the time of the accident. What the applicant was doing on the occasion of the accident is also stated in the notes: "The engine fires in the vessel were left in all night, and the applicant early on the morning of the accident went on board the vessel to perform his usual duties as a fireman. The vessel was afloat about 1.30 a.m. on the morning of the day of the accident, and was timed to leave Cardiff for Ilfracombe at 8.15 a.m. At 8.17 a.m., whilst the applicant was attending to the boilers, a tube in one of the boilers burst, and he was severely scalded on the face and arms." The man, therefore, had signed on as a seaman and was employed as a seaman at the time of the accident, and he met with an accident arising out of his employment while he was attending to the boilers.

It was contended on behalf of the employers before the county court judge that they were not liable to pay compensation under the Act, as primâ facie a seaman employed in a ship is not within the Act, because a ship is not a factory, and the owners are not the undertakers within the meaning of the Act. The county court judge held, upon the authority of Griffin v. Houlder Line, ante, p. 323, [1904] 1 K. B. 510, that the Act applied. In that case the ship was in a dock, and a seaman was employed in clearing out a hold for the reception of cargo when he met with an accident. We held, upon the authority of Raine v. Jobson, 49 W. R. 705, [1901] A. C. 404, that, as the ship was in a dock, and as the dock was a factory, the seaman was at the time of the accident employed in a factory, and that, therefore, notwithstanding that he was a seaman, he came within the Act. We held that the fact that he was a seaman did not exclude his rights as a citizen under the Act, the ship being in a dock and therefore in a factory. No doubt in that case the workman was physically in a factory. The question is whether that decision governs the present case. In the present case neither the ship nor the man was in a dock. No doubt the ship was lying alongside and using a wharf, and at the time of the accident it had not completely ceased to use the wharf; and the wharf was a factory within the Act. So far as the employers were using the wharf for the purposes for which a wharf is designed for use they were "undertakers" in respect thereof, having the actual use or occupation thereof. How does that entitle the applicant to relief under the Act? That depends upon section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. That section enacts that "this Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on or in or about a . . . factory." A wharf is for this purpose a factory. Therefore the applicant has to show that he was employed by the undertakers on or in or about a wharf. That appears to me to be the only material question. Upon the facts here, can this fireman, in discharging his ordinary duties as a fireman, be properly described as being employed on or in or about a factory? Clearly he was not employed "on" or "in" a factory. Was he employed "about" a factory? We have frequently laid it down, and it is well settled, that the word "about" as used in section 7 has in it the meaning of physical proximity. It also carries with it the meaning of employment upon the business of the factory. So far as the workman is employed in relation to the purposes for which the employers have the use of the wharf, he can be said to be employed by the undertakers about the wharf. But in dealing with these cases it must not be forgotten that we are dealing with what may be called constructive factories, and we must keep clearly before our minds the nature of the factory in respect of which the employers are the undertakers and the purposes for which that factory is used. The mere fact that a man is employed by the occupier of a factory in juxtaposition to the factory will not make him employed "about" a factory within the meaning of section 7. Take this instance. The occupier of a factory is being driven home from the factory by his coachman, and at a distance of, say, fifty yards from the factory the coachman meets with an accident. The coachman would be, no doubt, employed by the occupier of the factory, and therefore by the undertaker, and at the time of the accident he would be employed near the factory; but he would not be employed on or in or about the factory within the meaning of section 7, because his employment does not concern the factory at all. It was a mere accident that he was injured near the factory. No doubt some cases come near the line, but a line, however fine, must exist, and a case must lie on one side or other of the line. The injured man in the present case was a seaman engaged at the time of the accident in discharging his ordinary duties in attending to the boilers of the ship, and his work had no connection with the purposes for which the wharf was occupied. The county court judge held that the case came within the decision in Griffin v. Houlder Line, and that the Act applied. Upon the facts here the ship was clearly not in a dock, and for the reasons I have given the employment was not on or in or about a wharf. The case, therefore, does not come within the Act, and the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment: I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that the landing-stage is a "factory" within the Act. But by the steamer being moored alongside and using the stage for the purposes of passengers and goods being taken into and from the ship, it did not become part of the wharf, or become itself as a whole a "factory." Nor, in my opinion, did every man upon and employed in the service of the ship become by the circumstances above referred to at once and of necessity employed on, in, or about a factory. No doubt a man ordinarily employed in the ship may, by the particular work he has to do while the ship is moored, be employed on, in, or about the landing-stage, and so come within the Act. But whether he is so employed must depend on the special circumstances of his employment. I can only say that in the circumstances of the present case, which the Master of the Rolls has stated and which are not in dispute, I come to the conclusion that the man was not employed on, in, or about the landing-stage, and so is not within the Act. I gather that the point on which we are deciding this case was not sufficiently brought to the attention of the learned county court judge, but the point is open to the appellants, and I think, therefore, that the appeal succeeds.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: I regret to be unable to agree with the opinions of the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J., but it seems to me that the grounds upon which we are asked to allow the appeal are less satisfactory than the reasons for its dismissal. If the accident had occurred while the applicant was employed on a vessel moored to a wharf in a dock, he would be entitled to the protection of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, for the dock would be a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and the applicant in the course of his employment would be "on or in or about" the factory: see Raine v. Jobson and Griffin v. Houlder Line. But, because The Cambria was moored to a wharf outside a dock, it was argued that the employment of the workman was one to which the Act did not apply. The wharf, it was agreed, was a factory, but it was said that, though he might be protected while passing near to and over the wharf to the steamer, he lost the benefit of the Act when he reached the deck of the steamer. From that time, it was argued, he could not be said to be working in or on the wharf, and was therefore outside the Act. It would follow that a workman going to the ship by the only approach to the wharf to do some necessary repairs, and sustaining an injury when close to the wharf on the shore side, would have no claim for compensation. It appears from the evidence that the applicant's employers had, for the purposes of their business as owners of The Cambria, the actual use and occupation of the wharf within the meaning of the Act of 1901, section 104. The vessel made daily trips from Cardiff to places on the neighbouring coast and back. On arriving at Cardiff she was brought under steam to the wharf and placed in her berth. She was fastened by ropes to the wharf, and remained fastened until her next voyage. Passengers coming on board and leaving passed over the wharf. Early on the morning of the accident the applicant came on board to attend to his ordinary duties as fireman. Steam was got up and the main and auxiliary engines were worked. At 8.17 the passengers were all on board and the steamer was on the point of departure. The applicant was standing by the boilers when a tube burst and he was badly scalded. In my view the evidence shows that the appellants could not have made the wharf available for their business without the assistance of such a workman as the applicant. He was on the steamer for a purpose directly connected with their use of the wharf, and I have come to the conclusion that in the course of his employment he was at the time of the accident employed "about" the wharf within the meaning of section 7 of the Act of 1897. If, as was assumed upon the argument of this point, the employment of the fireman was one to which the Act applied, the general intention of the Legislature must be admitted to be that there should be a right to compensation. The language of section 7 seems to me to permit effect to be given to the intention in the case of the applicant. I find nothing in the Act to suggest that the Legislature meant to distinguish between the rights of workmen of the same class or to show that while workman A was within the Act, workman B, under similar, if not the same, circumstances, was intended to be left unprotected. I therefore come to the conclusion that the appeal on this point fails.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Smith, Rundell, & Dods, for Meyrick & Davies, Cardiff.

Solicitors for the employers, Steadman, Van Praagh, & Gaylor, for W. H. Brown, Bristol.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) April 13.

DYER v. SWIFT CYCLE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Factory—Building exceeding thirty feet in height in which more than twenty persons are employed—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 22), s. 105, sub-section 2.

A building which exceeds thirty feet in height and in which more than twenty persons, not being domestic servants, are employed for wages, is not constituted a factory for the purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by virtue of section 105, sub-section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901.

Appeal from an award of his Honour Judge Rentoul, sitting at the City of London Court, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a workman who was injured by an accident whilst he was in the employment of the Swift Cycle Co. (Limited) at their premises, which they used for showing, selling, and repairing bicycles. The premises consisted of a building more than thirty feet in height, in which more than twenty persons were employed for wages by the company in their business. There was no machinery or plant worked by mechanical power on the premises. The question was whether the premises were a factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The learned judge made an award in favour of the applicant, being of opinion that the case was brought within the Workmen's Compensation Act by virtue of section 105, sub-section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, which provides as follows: "The provisions of this Act with respect to notice of accidents and the formal investigation of accidents shall have effect as if . . . (b) any building which exceeds thirty feet in height and in which more than twenty persons, not being domestic servants, are employed for wages, were included in the word 'factory.'"

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The employers appealed.

W. Addington Willis, for the employers.—The award cannot be supported. The premises are not a factory within the definition contained in section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. That definition consists of three limbs. The first is a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. The second is a dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any of the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act are applied. The third is a laundry worked by mechanical power, which may be disregarded for the present purpose. The premises do not come within the first limb, for they are neither a "textile factory" nor a "non-textile factory" within section 149 of the Act of 1901, inasmuch as no steam, water, or other mechanical power is used in them. Neither has the applicant brought them within the second limb, for it was not suggested on his part that they were a warehouse. The suggestion was that they were somehow brought within the definition by section 105, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1901. That sub-section, however, does not extend the definition, but merely provides that certain provisions of the Act shall have effect as if the buildings therein described were included in the word "factory."

A. Cairns, for the applicant.—It may be admitted that the premises do not come within the definition of either textile on non-textile factory. But they are either a warehouse to which some of the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act are applied, and therefore a factory within the Workmen's Compensation Act, or they are brought within the definition as being a building more than thirty feet in height in which more than twenty persons are employed for wages.

COLLINS, M.R.—The facts in this case are not in dispute, and the learned judge of the City of London Court arrived at two conclusions on admissions. The place where the applicant was employed was a building which exceeded thirty feet in height and in which more than twenty persons, not being domestic servants, were employed for wages, but in which no machinery was used. The question which the learned judge had to determine was whether the applicant, when he met with the accident, was employed in a factory. It was contended in the first place that the premises came within the definition of "factory" in the Workmen's Compensation Act as being a non-textile factory under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. The judge found that the premises did not come within the definition of non-textile factory, because there was no machinery in them. But it was contended, in the second place, that, though the premises did not come within the definition in the Workmen's Compensation Act as being directly a factory within the Factory and Workshop Act, yet they were brought within the definition by reference to section 105 of that Act. The judge accepted that contention, and came to the conclusion that the premises were a factory. But section 105 really negatives the idea that the premises were a factory. It says that certain provisions are to have effect as if any building which exceeds thirty feet in height and in which more than twenty persons, not being domestic servants, are employed for wages were included in the word "factory." That is tantamount to saying that such a building is not a factory. It merely enacts that certain provisions of the Act, which provisions have no relation whatever to the Workmen's Compensation Act, are to have effect as if the building were a factory. We have therefore to come back to the definition of "factory" in section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which runs as follows: "'Factory' has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901." The premises in question are excluded from that category. Then it continues: "and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901." These premises are not within the class of places there mentioned; they are not a dock, nor a wharf, nor a quay, nor machinery, nor plant. And no evidence was given at the hearing to show that they were a warehouse. We can only deal with the case on the facts which were before the learned judge. In my opinion the applicant has failed to make out that the premises were a factory for the purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and I think the learned judge was wrong in the ground on which he decided the case. The appeal will therefore be allowed.

ROMER and MATHEW, L JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the employers, Gibbs, White, & Strong.

Solicitors for the applicant, Lovett & Liddle.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 19, 20, 22; March 30.

In re DENTON'S ESTATE.

LICENSES INSURANCE CORPORATION AND GUARANTEE FUND (LIMITED) v. DENTON. (a.)

Mortgage—Guarantee—Principal and surety—Covenant by mortgagor and surety to pay mortgage debt—Surety's liability limited—Covenant by mortgagor alone to insure debt against loss—Contract with insurance office—Co-surety.

In a mortgage D. joined with the mortgagor in a joint and several covenant for repayment on demand, on failure to comply with which demand the statutory power of sale was to be exerciseable without further notice. D.'s liability was limited to £1,000. The mortgagor alone covenanted with the mortgagees to insure in their names the debt and interest against loss with the plaintiff corporation. In a proposal for insurance made to the corporation, D.'s suretyship was mentioned, and this proposal was incorporated in, and was to be deemed the basis of the "contract of insurance" intended by, a contract (headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy") by which the corporation agreed that if the mortgagees should become entitled to exercise their power of sale, and should give notice thereof to the corporation, the latter would, after six months from receipt of a claim from the mortgagees, pay to them the principal moneys for the time being owing under the mortgage and the interest within a specified limit. Thereupon the mortgage debt and interest were to be transferred to the corporation, with all securities for the same. This contract contained no express mention of D.'s suretyship or of his being a party to the mortgage. The mortgagor having made default, D. having died, and a sale of the property under the power having produced less by £984 12s. 6d. than was owing, the corporation, who had paid that sum, brought this action to recover it from D.'s estate under his guarantee. D.'s executrix claimed contribution from the corporation as being co-sureties with D.

Held, (1) that the contract was one of guarantee and not of insurance, but (2) (reversing the decision of Swinfen Eady, J., ante p. 93, [1903] 2 Ch. 670), that the corporation were not co-sureties with D., but were sureties for him and the mortgagor, on the principle of Craythorne v. Swinburne, 14 Ves. 160, and that D.'s estate was not entitled to contribution, but must bear the whole deficiency.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff corporation from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J. (reported ante, p. 93, [1903] 2 Ch. 670).

Maude Harvey, by deed dated the 2nd of November, 1899, mortgaged a public-house called the "Lord Palmerston" by sub-demise to a bank to secure £4,000 and such further sums as might be advanced to her or paid on her behalf for rent, rates, repairs, or otherwise, together with interest on such sum and sums, at a varying rate with a minimum of 4½ per cent. per annum.

George Denton joined in the deed, which contained a joint and several covenant by him and Miss Harvey to pay, on demand left at the mortgaged premises, the principal moneys that might be then owing on the mortgage, with interest at the rate aforesaid. His liability under the covenant was, however, limited to £1,000, and it was provided that although, as between himself and Miss Harvey, he was only a surety, yet as between himself and the bank he was to be considered a principal debtor to the extent of £1,000.

There was also a covenant by the mortgagor, in which Denton did not join, that she would insure and keep insured, while the security remained in force, the mortgage debt and interest against loss, in the name of the bank with the plaintiff corporation.

The deed further provided that the statutory power of sale should become exerciseable at any time after the said demand for payment had been left at the mortgaged premises without any such notice as is required by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, or any further notice whatever.

On the 28th of October, 1899, a proposal "to insure first mortgage of £4,000" had been made by Miss Harvey's solicitors to the plaintiff corporation, and it was therein stated that Mr. G. Denton would join in the mortgage deed for the purpose of guaranteeing £1,000. In pursuance of the said proposal a contract was entered into by the corporation with the bank (therein called the insured) on the 7th of March, 1900. It was headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy." It made no mention of Denton or his suretyship, and recited the mortgage deed as made between Miss Harvey of the one part and the bank of the other part; but it incorporated the said proposal and provided that the same should be deemed to be the basis of the "contract of insurance" thereby intended.

The terms of this contract (including certain printed conditions which were to be deemed part thereof) were that if the insured should become entitled to exercise the power of sale and should give notice thereof in writing to the corporation, the latter would, after the expiration of six calendar months from the receipt of a claim in writing from the insured requiring payment, pay to the insured the principal moneys for the time being due under the mortgage, together with interest for a specified period and until payment, and on such payment the mortgage debt and interest and all securities for the same were to be assigned or transferred to the corporation or their nominee or nominees.

The mortgagor having made default in payment of interest, the bank left on the mortgaged premises a demand for payment of the mortgage debt, and proceeded to exercise their power of sale. Certain sums were from time to time expended by the corporation for the preservation of the mortgaged property and in connection with the sale, with the result that the realization left the corporation out of pocket to the extent of £984 12s. 6d., and this sum, after taking a transfer of the mortgage, they claimed by originating summons to recover from the estate of Denton, who had died in 1899, under his guarantee.

It was argued for the defendant, who was Denton's executrix, that he and the corporation were co-sureties, and as such were bound to contribute rateably to the deficiency, and Swinfen Eady, J., upheld this contention, holding that the contract of the 7th of March, 1900, was one not of insurance but of guarantee, and that Denton and the corporation were under a common burden or liability and must contribute in proportion to the sums—in the one case £1,000, and in the other the whole debt—which they had respectively guaranteed.

Against this decision the corporation appealed.

Haldane, K.C., and Owen Thompson, for the appellants, argued that the corporation were insurers and not sureties, or if sureties they were sureties for Denton and the mortgagor, and not co-sureties with Denton for the mortgagor.

They cited Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corporation, 42 W. R. 227, [1894] 1 Q. B. 54, 60, 61; Craythorne v. Swinburne, 14 Ves. 160; Finlay v. Mexican Investment Corporation, [1897] 1 Q. B. 517; Seaton v. Heath, 47 W. R. 487, [1899] 1 Q. B. 782, 790; Steel v. Dixon, 29 W. R. 735, 17 Ch. D. 825; Ellesmere Brewery Co. v. Cooper, 44 W. R. 254, [1896] 1 Q. B. 75; Ellis v. Emmanuel, 24 W. R. 832, L. R. 1 Ex. D. 157.

[The Court referred to Castellain v. Preston, 31 W. R. 557, 11 Q. B. D. 380, 387, and Rowlatt on Principal and Surety, p. 165.]

Eve, K.C., and J. Henderson, for respondent.

Thompson replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 30. — The following judgments were delivered:

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is a claim made by the Licenses Insurance Corporation and Guarantee Fund (Limited), as assignees of a mortgage deed, against the estate of Denton (deceased), a party to the mortgage deed on a covenant therein contained, and the only defence raised is that the corporation and Denton are co-sureties for Miss Harvey, the mortgagor, and that Denton is therefore entitled to deduct from the claim of the plaintiff corporation the contribution due as between two co-sureties. The corporation contends that it is not a co-surety with Denton, but is surety both for the principal debtor, the mortgagor, and for Denton, the surety, under the terms of the mortgage deed; and that this being so, there is no contribution, according to the authority of the decision of Lord Eldon in Craythorne v. Swinburne.

The question whether the plaintiff and defendant stand or do not stand in the relation of co-sureties within the meaning of this decision is the only question in the case. Swinfen Eady, J., has decided that the relation is that of co-sureties, and that Denton has a right of contribution. He bases this conclusion, as I understand, on the ground that according to the terms of the policy of insurance, which embodies the guarantee of the plaintiff corporation, both the corporation and Denton are liable for the same debt upon the same default of the mortgagor.

I think that the plaintiff and defendant are liable for the same debt upon the same default of the mortgagor for the reasons given by Swinfen Eady, J., in his judgment, but there is this difference, that whereas the liability of Denton to pay arises directly on demand left at the mortgaged premises, the liability of the corporation is only to pay after the expiration of six calendar months from the mortgagee —the bank—becoming entitled to exercise the power of sale conferred by the mortgage deed, and giving notice thereof to the corporation; so that even assuming the occasion of the liability arising to be the same, because the power of sale is conferred upon the leaving a demand for payment at the mortgaged premises without any further demand or notice (thus departing from the provisions of the Conveyancing Act, 1881), yet the time when payment will accrue due differs by six months, and I do not think that this difference can be left out of consideration when determining whether the corporation and Denton are co-sureties.

Perhaps it would be convenient now to consider briefly what are the material facts in this case, and what is the nature of the claim.

Miss Maude Harvey obtained an advance of £4,000 from the London and City Bank secured by a mortgage of the "Lord Palmerston" public-house created by a deed of the 2nd of November, 1899, George Denton joining in the mortgage as surety for a limited amount. The mortgage was to secure £4,000 and further advances. The deed contained a covenant by the mortgagor and Denton to pay the £4,000 and interest, and also such further sums as should for the time being be due from the mortgagor to the bank. The deed also contained a covenant by the mortgagor with the bank that the mortgagor would insure, and at all times during the continuance of the security keep insured, the principal moneys and interest against loss in the name of the bank with the Licenses Insurance Corporation and Guarantee Fund (Limited).

A mortgage insurance policy was executed by the corporation on the 7th of March, 1900, and it is alleged by the plaintiff corporation that this policy was effected in pursuance of a proposal for insurance dated the 28th day of October, 1899, which was put in evidence. There is some little difficulty about this, as the proposal and the policy do not quite accord—the proposal relating to a debt repayable by annual instalments, which is not the case with the mortgage debt. But I think that the proposal is sufficient evidence that the insurance was effected by the corporation on the basis that the mortgage debt which the corporation was insuring would be secured by a mortgage deed in which Denton would join for the purpose of guaranteeing the repayment of £1,000 of the principal money.

The policy, however, makes no mention of Denton being a party to the mortgage deed. On the contrary, it describes the mortgage deed as made between Maude Harvey of the one part and the "insured" (i.e. the bank) of the other part.

It refers, however, to a proposal in writing of the 28th of October, 1899, for guaranteeing the said mortgage debt and interest, and recites that it is agreed that the said proposal shall be the basis of the contract of insurance intended. The premium of £18 15s. is recited as the first premium for guaranteeing the said mortgage debt and interest, and the policy goes on to witness that the corporation agree with the insured that if the insured shall become entitled under the power of sale conferred by the said mortgage deed, or otherwise, to sell the mortgaged property, and shall give notice in writing thereof to the corporation while this policy is in force, the corporation will, after the expiration of six calendar months from the receipt by the corporation of a claim in writing by the insured requiring payment, pay to the insured the principal money for the time being due under the said mortgage with any interest thereon.

I think that the proper inference of fact to draw from the proposal of the 28th of October, 1899, and the mortgage deed of the 2nd of November, 1899, and the policy of the 7th of March, 1900, is that, to the knowledge alike of the mortgagor and the mortgagee, Denton and the corporation, it was known at the date both of the mortgage deed and of the policy that it was intended that Denton should join in the mortgage as surety, and that the mortgage debt and interest should be guaranteed or insured by the corporation (the words "guarantee" and "insure" are used as synonymous in the policy).

I mention this inference because I think that the fact that there was one transaction only, to the details of which all were privy, may not be immaterial when one is considering whether the corporation ought to be regarded as co-surety with Denton for the mortgagor, or as surety for both the mortgagor and Denton under a distinct collateral security.

The summons claims that the plaintiffs, by virtue of a covenant of Denton contained in a deed of mortgage of the 2nd of November, 1899, which covenant has been assigned to them, are creditors of the estate of Denton for the sum of £984 12s. 6d. The facts as to the £984 12s. 6d. are these: The bank having left a demand at the mortgaged premises, and after giving notice to the corporation, under condition 5 of the policy, of their intention to exercise the power of sale, proceeded, not strictly in accordance with the conditions of the policy, to sell the property.

This sale realized £4,000 and discharged the whole of the principal money owing on the mortgage. The source of the money thus discharging the principal, although it may have passed through the hands of the insurance corporation, was the proceeds of sale.

The plaintiff corporation in the meanwhile had expended the £984 12s. 6d. sought to be recovered on this summons, on matters (such as repairs, &c.) clearly necessary and proper for the maintenance of the mortgage security. The utterly unbusinesslike manner in which the business of the corporation was done makes it difficult to ascertain the true facts.

It might be suggested that this was a voluntary expenditure by the corporation who had a clear interest, as Denton also had, that the mortgage security should not be wasted. But I think on the evidence that this expenditure may fairly be taken to be expenditure by the corporation at the request of the bank, and thus expenditure by the bank as mortgagees.

If the expenditure cannot be so regarded there is an end of the claim, but if it can be so regarded the only question is, as I have already stated—are Denton and the corporation co-sureties so as to entitle Denton to contribution?

In the first place I will deal with a contention raised by the corporation and based on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Dane v. The Mortgage Insurance Corporation. This contention is that, apart from anything else which might negative co-suretyship between the corporation and Denton, the very form of the obligation which they had undertaken towards the bank was sufficient to show that the corporation had not entered into a contract of suretyship but into a contract of insurance.

No doubt the form is that of a policy of insurance. But I think there is nothing in the form of the contract between the bank and the corporation, being that of a policy of insurance, to prevent the contract between one of guarantee, and I would refer to the judgment of Romer, L.J., in Seaton v. Burnand, which on this point is unaffected by the reversal in the House of Lords of the judgment of the Court of Appeal. Romer, L.J., in discussing the difference in substance between these two classes of contract, says: "The difference between these two classes of contract does not depend upon any essential difference between the word 'insurance' and the word 'guarantee.' There is no magic in the use of those words. The words to a great extent have the same meaning and effect, and many contracts like the one in the case now before us may with equal propriety be called contracts of insurance or contracts of guarantee."

The distinction in substance, in cases in which the loss insured against is simply the event of the non-payment of a debt, seems to be, as I read the judgment of Romer, L.J., between contracts in which the person desiring to be insured has means of knowledge as to the risk, and the insurer has not the same means, and those cases in which the insurer has the same means. Now it seems to me that in the case of this mortgage debt the insurance corporation, knowing the terms of the mortgage deed and the exact nature of the property forming the security, had just as much means of ascertaining the nature of the risk as the bank had, and I do not think that the mere fact that the contract was made between the creditor and the insurance corporation, and not between the mortgagor-debtor, Miss Harvey, and the corporation, would of itself determine the character of the contract to be that of insurance and not of suretyship. This being so, the form and circumstances of the contract being consistent with the relation of co-suretyship between the plaintiff corporation and Denton, let us see if the facts, date, or contents of the mortgage deed are such as to negative this contract, which, according to its terms, is a contract of suretyship guaranteeing payment by the mortgagor—being a contract of suretyship constituting co-suretyship in relation to the contract of suretyship taken by Denton on himself by the mortgage deed.

If the policy is looked at it will be seen that, in form at all events, both the insurance corporation and Denton guarantee the payment of the mortgage debt by the mortgagor, Miss Harvey. The event upon which the obligation to pay arises is the same in each case; and although the insurance corporation have six months within which to pay, yet the obligation neither of the insurance corporation nor of Denton is dependent on what the mortgage security realizes. Taking these matters into consideration there seems much to support the conclusion in fact of Swinfen Eady, J., that the insurance corporation were sureties for, and guaranteed the debt of, Miss Harvey, and were not sureties only in the event that neither Miss Harvey nor Denton paid.

If this conclusion, which seems to me to be a conclusion in fact, is right, it puts the case outside the case of Craythorne v. Swinburne. I think it is a question of fact. It seems plain from the judgment of Lord Eldon in that case, that in considering the question whether the contract of insurance—the second contract in point of date—is to be considered as a collateral or supplemental security, the court may take into consideration not only the words of the respective contracts but also extrinsic evidence, giving consideration to this evidence as well as to the words of the respective contracts. Still, sitting by myself, I should have hesitated to differ from the conclusion of the learned judge, especially as I do not think that the mere fact that the insurance corporation knew (at the time at which the policy was effected) from the mortgage deed or the proposal, that Denton was a surety, is sufficient to negative the relation of co-suretyship; and it is certainly a case in which I should have wished to have applied the maxim that equality is equity if the facts allowed it.

But as my brothers take a contrary view of the facts I do not think that in such a doubtful case, turning largely on inferences of fact, I ought to refuse to concur in the judgment of the court.

STIRLING, L.J.—The question in this case is what is the true nature of the contract entered into between the London City and Midland Bank (mortgagees of a public-house for £4,000 and interest, George Denton being surety for the mortgagor to the extent of £1,000) and the plaintiffs in the action.

The defendant in the action, who is the legal personal representative of George Denton, contends that the contract was one of suretyship, and that by virtue of it the plaintiffs became co-sureties with George Denton; and this is the view which has been taken by Swinfen Eady, J.

The plaintiffs, on the other hand, insist that the contract is not one of suretyship at all, but is one of insurance or indemnity, such as was held by Lord Esher, M.R., to exist in Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corporation; but they also urge that even if the contract was one of suretyship, the plaintiffs did not become co-sureties with Denton, but in fact guaranteed the bank against Denton's default, as was held to be the case in Craythorne v. Swinburne.

The answer to the question depends to a great extent on the construction of a document dated the 7th of March, 1900, and headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy"; but, before dealing with it I think it desirable to refer shortly to the main provisions of the mortgage deed, which bears date the 2nd of November, 1899.

By it Maud Harvey demised to the bank a leasehold public-house known as the "Lord Palmerston" at Highgate for the residue of the term for which she held the same, less one day, by way of mortgage to secure the repayment of £4,000 and interest. The mortgagor and Denton jointly and severally covenanted with the bank that they or one of them would pay to the bank on demand by the bank left at the public-house the sum of £4,000 with interest, subject, however, to a proviso that Denton should not be liable under the covenant to pay a larger sum in the whole in respect of the principal and interest taken together than £1,000 together with interest on such sum from the time of the demand being made on Denton until payment. The mortgagor also covenanted with the bank that she would insure, and at all times during the continuance of the security keep insured the principal moneys and interest thereby secured, against loss in the name of the bank with the plaintiffs, and would not at any time do any act or commit any default whereby the policy of mortgage insurance might be rendered void or voidable, and in case the policy or any new policy to be effected as aforesaid should by any means become void, would forthwith at her own cost effect a new policy for securing the repayment of the said principal sum and interest "as hereinbefore mentioned." By these last words I understand in accordance with the covenant for repayment contained in the mortgage.

It was provided by the mortgage that the powers of sale conferred upon mortgagees by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, should be exercisable by the said bank at any time after such demand should have been left as aforesaid without the necessity for giving any such notice requiring payment of the mortgage money as is provided for by the said Act or any notice whatever. The deed concludes with a stipulation that, although, as between the mortgagor and Denton the latter is a surety only, yet as between him and the bank he is to be considered a principal debtor.

Upon the covenant by the mortgagor to insure and keep insured "the principal moneys and interest against loss," I observe that it appears to me to be so framed as to entitle the mortgagees and the plaintiffs to enter into a contract of either of the kinds which the plaintiffs assert to be that of the contract actually made between them and the bank.

On the 28th of October, 1899, before the mortgage had been executed, the solicitors of the mortgagor submitted to the plaintiffs a "proposal to insure first mortgage of £4,000." In this document various particulars are given as to the terms of the mortgage which are inaccurate; but the following statement occurs: "Mr. G. Denton will join in the mortgage for the purpose of guaranteeing the repayment of £1,000 of the principal money." It is not disputed that the document of the 7th of March, 1900, was the result of this proposal. The document, as I have already mentioned, is headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy," and in the recitals the proposal of the 28th of October, 1899, is recited, followed by the words "it is agreed that the said proposal shall be the basis of the contract of insurance hereby intended."

On the other hand, the proposal is recited as being one "for guaranteeing" the mortgage debt and interest, and the premium is stated to be "for guaranteeing" the mortgage debt and interest. The mortgage deed is stated to be dated the 2nd of November, 1899, and to be made between Maude Harvey of the one part, and the insured of the other part, and it does not appear on the face of the document itself that Denton was a surety for the debt. Still, notwithstanding all inaccuracies in the proposal and in the recitals, there is no question that the mortgage of the 2nd of November, 1899, as executed by the mortgagor and Denton, was that to which the document of the 7th of March, 1900, was intended to refer, and with reference to which it must be construed. I think, therefore, that the document must be read as relating to a mortgage in respect of which Denton was to a limited extent surety for payment of principal and interest.

The operative part of the document is as follows:—"Now this policy witnesseth that the corporation agree with the insured (subject to the conditions on the back hereof, which are to be taken as part of this policy) that if the insured shall become entitled under the power of sale conferred by the said mortgage deed or otherwise to sell the mortgaged property, and shall give notice in writing thereof to the corporation while this policy is in force, the corporation will, after the expiration of six calendar months from the receipt by the corporation of a claim in writing by the insured requiring payment, pay to the insured the principal money for the time being due under the said mortgage with any interest thereon at the minimum rate which would have been or be payable if the interest were punctually paid under the said mortgage, for any period not exceeding twelve calendar months preceding the date of the receipt of the claim, and with subsequent interest up to the day of payment at the same rate."

Condition 8. "If at the time a claim is made under this policy there be any other subsisting insurance or insurances whether effected by the insured or any other person, covering the same interest in the mortgaged property, the corporation shall not be liable to pay or contribute more than their rateable proportion."

Condition 9. "Upon payment of the amount which may become payable under this policy, the insured shall assign or transfer to the corporation or their nominee or nominees the mortgage debt and interest and all securities held by the insured for the same."

Condition 10. "The insured and any claimant under this policy shall, at the expense of the corporation, do and concur in doing all such acts and things as may be necessary or reasonably required by the corporation for the purpose of enforcing any rights and remedies or of obtaining relief or indemnity from other parties to which the corporation shall be or would become entitled or subrogated upon payment under this policy, whether such acts and things shall be or become necessary or required before or after payment by the corporation."

In order that the plaintiffs may become liable under the policy it is necessary—

(1) That the insured, the bank, should become entitled under the power of sale in the mortgage or otherwise to sell; and it will be remembered that the power of sale in the mortgage becomes exerciseable upon a demand for payment in accordance with the covenant of the mortgagor and the surety being left at the public-house, and that the mortgagor and the surety both become liable upon such demand being so left; (2) that the insured should give notice in writing to the plaintiffs of their having become entitled to exercise the power of sale; (3) that the insured should make a claim in writing on the plaintiffs requiring payment.

These conditions being satisfied, the plaintiffs bind themselves after the expiration of six calendar months from the receipt of the claim in writing to pay to the insured the principal money for the time being due on the security with interest.

In arriving at this sum there would be taken into account all sums paid by the mortgagor, or by the surety, or realized out of the mortgaged property. Upon payment by the plaintiffs of the amount payable they are entitled under condition 9 to have assigned or transferred to them the mortgage debt and interest and all securities held by the insured for the same; and this would, according to the natural meaning of conditions 9 and 10, include, in my opinion, the benefit of the covenant by the surety to the full extent to which the mortgagees were entitled thereto.

The result is that a period of six months is to elapse between claim made on the plaintiffs and payment. During that period the bank were left to realize their securities as they saw fit, unless the plaintiffs chose to intervene under the provisions of condition 7. At the expiration of the period the plaintiffs were bound to pay the principal and interest remaining due on the security, quite irrespective of any question whether loss had occurred or was likely to occur. Upon payment, however, the plaintiffs, as it seems to me, became entitled to all the rights and remedies of the mortgagees, and to enforce them just as the mortgagees might have done, as well against the surety as against the mortgagor.

Swinfen Eady, J., held that the instrument of the 7th of March, 1900, was not merely an insurance against loss, and in that respect I agree with him; but it does not follow that the instrument created a mere contract of co-suretyship with Denton. The learned judge does not appear to have had presented to him the second contention raised on behalf of the plaintiffs, and strongly urged in this court; at all events he does not deal with it explicitly in his judgment. The question is, in my opinion, one of difficulty, occasioned by the inaccuracies and ambiguities which are found in the instrument of the 7th of March, 1900, an instrument framed by the plaintiffs themselves. I have, however, come to the conclusion that, regard being had to all the circumstances, the true meaning of the parties to the transaction was not that the plaintiffs were to become co-sureties with Denton, but that, as between themselves and the bank, Denton should be in the position of a principal; or, in other words, that the transaction was of the same nature as that which was the subject of decision in Craythorne v. Swinburne. Taking this view, I think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is a claim by the Licenses Insurance Corporation, hereinafter called the corporation, against the estate of Denton, who joined as surety in a mortgage by Miss Harvey to a bank. The mortgaged property has been sold for less than the amount due to the bank. The deficiency, which is less than £1,000, has been paid by the corporation to the bank, and a transfer has been executed by the bank to the corporation of the mortgage debt and all securities for the same.

There is no answer to this claim unless it can be established that the corporation and Denton were co-sureties, in which case a right of contribution only would arise. Swinfen Eady, J., has adopted this view, and has made a declaration accordingly.

The corporation appeal against this order, and they contend (1) that their contract with the bank was properly a contract of insurance and not of suretyship; and (2) in the alternative, that if they were not insurers they were sureties for both Miss Harvey and Denton, and not co-sureties with Denton for Miss Harvey.

The first contention was overruled by the learned judge. The second contention, although raised, seems not to have been strongly insisted upon before him, and it is not directly dealt with in his judgment; but it has been forcibly pressed upon us, particularly by Mr. Owen Thompson in his able argument. It is based upon Craythorne v. Swinburne.

In that case Lord Eldon held that parol evidence was admissible to show whether in truth the defendant was a co-surety with the plaintiff for the principal debtor and as such bound to contribute, or was a surety for both the principal debtor and the plaintiff, and as such under no liability to contribute. The principles there laid down are clear, but I have found great difficulty in applying them to the very peculiar circumstances of the present case.

There are three documents which, and which alone, have to be considered: (a) The mortgage dated the 2nd of November, 1899, between Maude Harvey of the first part, Denton of the second part, and the bank of the third part. It is to secure an advance of £4,000. Denton plainly joins as surety. There is a joint and several covenant for payment on demand, with a proviso limiting Denton's liability under the covenant to £1,000. Then follows a covenant by the mortgagor that she will insure and keep insured the principal moneys and interest thereby secured against loss in the name of the bank with the corporation. And there is a power of sale given to the bank exercisable at any time after demand and without any notice. There is also the usual provision that although, as between Miss Harvey and Denton, Denton was only surety, yet as between Denton and the bank Denton should be considered as a principal debtor to the extent aforesaid—i.e., to the extent of £1,000. It is apparent on the face of the mortgage deed that it was part of the bargain with the bank that a security of some kind should be procured from the corporation. (b) The "proposal to insure first mortgage of £4,000" is dated the 28th of October, 1899. It is obviously inaccurate in some respects. It refers to the mortgage as dated the 2nd of November, 1899, and states the mortgage debt as repayable by instalments, although this is not the fact. It mentions, however, that Denton will join in the mortgage for the purpose of guaranteeing the repayment of £1,000 of the principal money. (c) The document imposing a liability on the corporation towards the bank is dated the 7th of March, 1900, four months after the mortgage. It is headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy." It inaccurately recites the mortgage as made between Miss Harvey of the one part and the bank of the other part, and omits all reference to Denton. [His lordship read extracts from the policy and conditions—the more material of which are given in the judgment of Stirling, L.J.—and continued:] It will be observed that the obligation of the corporation to pay does not arise for six months after Denton's obligation to pay arises, and further that the corporation stipulate with the bank for transfer of all securities held by the bank, and to be "subrogated" to all rights and remedies of the bank against other parties as soon as the corporation pays under the policy, an event which has happened.

Now, on the construction of this document, I agree with Swinfen Eady, J., that it was not an insurance against loss, but was a guarantee of the mortgage debt; and I adopt the reasoning contained in his very careful judgment on this point.

It only remains to consider the second—or what I may call the Craythorne v. Swinburne point. What was it that the corporation guaranteed? If I look only at the policy it is reasonably clear that the corporation guaranteed the debt due from Miss Harvey, the principal debtor, and nothing more. If, however, I look at the proposal, which is "deemed to be incorporated in the policy," and also at the mortgage deed, I think it appears that the corporation guaranteed a partially guaranteed debt; or, in other words, guaranteed that Miss Harvey to the full extent, and Denton to the extent of £1,000, would pay the bank, Miss Harvey and Denton being, as between themselves and the corporation, both principal debtors. It is of no moment that Denton is not shown to have been party or privy to the proposal or the policy, for the only obligation imposed on Miss Harvey by the covenant in the mortgage deed, to which Denton was a party, was to insure against loss. This obligation would have been exactly satisfied by a policy of insurance strictly so called. Denton had no right to expect to be relieved by having the corporation as a co-surety. He must accept the position, whatever it may be, as between the bank and the corporation. Upon the whole, I think the appellants' contention on this point must prevail, notwithstanding the difficulties created by the forms of the instruments.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Jennings, Son, & Allen; Loxley, Elam, & Gardner.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) } March 17, 18, 26.

CONTINENTAL CAOUTCHOUC AND GUTTA PERCHA CO. v. KLEINWORT, SONS, & CO. (a.)

Banker—Customer—Mistake—Money paid under mistake of fact.

The defendants, who were foreign bankers, were in the habit of making advances to K., who then purchased goods which the defendants held as security; when K. found a purchaser he assigned the right to receive the purchase-money to the defendants, who accordingly released the goods. K. also carried on the same system with B. & Co. The plaintiffs bought from K. two parcels, the one released by the defendants and the other by B. & Co. K. instructed the plaintiffs to pay the defendants and B. & Co. respectively for the goods so purchased. By mistake the plaintiffs paid both sums to the defendants, who credited K.'s account, notifying K. of their having done so. The defendants acting bonâ fide continued to make advances to K., who knew of the mistake, but did not disclose it, and afterwards became bankrupt. The plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendants the sum which should have been paid to B. & Co. as money paid under mistake of fact.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the defendants were liable to refund the money which had been paid to them under a mistake of fact, even though they had paid it away to a third party in ignorance of the mistake.

Judgment of Bigham, J. (51 W. R. 541), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Bigham, J., in the Commercial Court (51 W. R. 541).

The action was brought to recover back a sum of £1,480 15s. 11d., money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants under a mistake of fact.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment of the learned judge in the court below.

Asquith, K.C. (J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and A. H. Chaytor with him), for the appellants.

Scrutton, K.C. (F. D. MacKinnon with him), for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from the decision of Bigham, J., who has held that the appellants (the defendants in the action) are bound to repay to the plaintiffs a sum of £1,480 15s. 11d. paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants under a mistake of fact. The defence is that the sum in question was paid to and received by the defendants as agents for one Kramrisch, now bankrupt, with whom they had, previous to the plaintiffs' demand, settled it in account. The facts are fully and lucidly stated in the judgment of Bigham, J., and a bare outline is all that is necessary to make this judgment intelligible. Kramrisch, above referred to, was an importer of indiarubber, carrying on business at Liverpool. He was financed by two "merchant bankers," as they are described in the case—viz., the defendants Kleinwort, Sons, & Co. and Brandt & Co., who only come incidentally into this discussion. The course of business as between Kramrisch and these firms was that when he imported a parcel of indiarubber one or other of these firms made itself liable to the vendor for the price upon the security of the shipping documents, which were deposited with the firm, and as Kramrisch effected sales of the rubber so imported the financing firm released the bills of lading covering such sale and transmitted them to the purchaser, taking from Kramrisch an authority to receive the price from the purchaser direct. The plaintiffs, before the transaction in question, had bought from Kramrisch parcels of indiarubber, some of which he had imported through the aid of the defendants and some through that of Brandt & Co., and had in each case arranged to pay direct to the defendants and Brandt & Co. respectively, according to the instructions received with each consignment. The sum in question in this case represented the price of indiarubber which was in fact payable direct to Brandt & Co., but by a mistake of a clerk of the plaintiffs it was sent to the defendants instead of to the account of Kramrisch. The defendants placed it to the credit of Kramrisch in their account with him, and apprised him of the fact, and he acknowledged and approved of what they had done. It was contended by the defendants that they were thus discharged from all liability to the plaintiffs. Bigham, J., has rejected their contention, and I am of opinion that he was right. Without going into the question whether there was an absolute assignment of the debt by Kramrisch to Kleinwort, Sons, & Co., with notice to the plaintiffs—a matter that was discussed under somewhat similar circumstances in Brandt, Sons, & Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Co, [1904] 1 K. B. 387, the undisputed facts are sufficient, in my judgment, to decide this case in favour of the plaintiffs. It is clear law that primâ facie the person to whom money has been paid under a mistake of fact is liable to refund it, even though he may have paid it away to third parties in ignorance of the mistake, for he has had the benefit of the windfall and must restore it to the true owner. On the other hand, it is equally clear that an intermediary who has received money for the purpose of handing it on to a third party, and has handed it on, is no longer accountable to the sender. In such case he is a mere conduit-pipe and has not had the benefit of the windfall. A case rather more difficult arises when the mode by which he passes it on is by settlement in account with a third party for whom he has received it involving the application of the money to the discharge of a debt due from the third party to himself. He has thus no doubt benefited by getting his debt paid, but he has done so in discharging his primary duty of passing the money on to his principal. He has constructively sent it on and received it back, and has done nothing incompatible with his position as a conduit-pipe or intermediary. He was entitled to be paid, and has been paid by his debtor, who was no doubt put in funds to do so by the receipt of the money, and who therefore, and not the intermediary, has had the benefit of the windfall. Hence the care with which the courts have considered whether the sum has in fact been effectually passed out of the hands of the agent into those of the principal, no entry by the agent in his books sufficing until the assent of the principal has completed the transaction: see Buller v. Harrison, 2 Cowp. 565. But these questions as to whether or not the sum received has been effectually passed on to the principal are only material in those cases where the person receiving is really and primarily a mere intermediary—that is to say, a person who as against his principal has no right to receive the fund except for the purpose of passing it on. Once place him in the position of a person who has a right to receive and apply the fund for his own benefit, and he is at once taken out of the category of mere intermediaries, for whom alone the defence is available that they have acted as such and passed on to another the liability to refund the windfall. I think the cases of Buller v. Harrison, 2 Cowp. 565; Cox v. Prentice, 3 M. & S. 344; Holland v. Russell, 11 W. R. 757, 4 B. & S. 14, and Newall v. Tomlinson, L. R. 6 C. P. 405, 19 W. R. Dig. 48 (particularly the judgment of Brett, J., in that case), fully establish the above propositions.

Now, in this case it is quite clear that, as between Kleinwort, Sons, & Co. and Kramrisch, the former were the persons primarily entitled to receive the purchase-money of the goods in respect of which they had released the bills of lading. Had the sum due from the buyer been deposited with a third party and become the subject of an interpleader issue between Kramrisch and the defendants, it must, I think, have been awarded to the defendants. For these reasons I think that the defendants in respect of the sum claimed are in no better position than any other persons who have received for their own benefit money paid to them under a mistake of fact. The grounds on which I base my opinion relieve me from discussing some of the points referred to in the judgment of Bigham, J., and in the admirable argument before us. In my opinion the appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment: I am of the same opinion. I will only add that, in my opinion in this case—unlike the one recently decided by us and referred to by the Master of the Rolls, Brandt, Sons, & Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Co.—the evidence is sufficient to establish an equitable assignment as between Kramrisch and the defendants. The proceeds of the rubber against which the defendants had made advances, and which was consigned to the plaintiffs for sale, were equitably assigned by Kramrisch in favour of the defendants. And, if it were essential to the present case (though, in my opinion, it is not), I should come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had notice of the assignment, and could only disregard that notice at their peril. But, in justice to the plaintiffs, I think they did not disregard the notice. On the contrary, it was, in my opinion, because the plaintiffs recognised the obligation cast upon them that they forwarded the proceeds of the rubber to the defendants, and it was by reason of the mistake in fact made on their behalf, in thinking that the moneys, the subject of this action, were proceeds of such rubber, that these moneys were forwarded to the defendants. When the mistake in fact was discovered, the plaintiffs became entitled to recover the moneys from the defendants, unless the defendants could show that they had received the moneys as agents, and before notice of the mistake had parted with them to their principal, or so dealt with them by mandate of their principal as to render it unjust to call upon them to repay the moneys to the plaintiffs. But in the present case the defendants could not show that they had so received and dealt with the moneys. In fact, they received the moneys by virtue of the rights existing between them and Kramrisch, including their rights as equitable assignees, and when they had so received the moneys they dealt with them according to those rights, and not according to any unfettered right of Kramrisch to direct how the moneys should be dealt with. The notice they gave to Kramrisch of the way in which the moneys had been appropriated by them was simply notice that they had applied them according to their own rights as previously pointed out, and not by way of obtaining a ratification from Kramsrisch of a previously unauthorized application. I agree, therefore, that the appeal fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. [His lordship having dealt at length with the facts of the case, and with the correspondence and the various transactions that took place between the plaintiffs, the defendants, Kramrisch & Co., and Brandt & Co., continued as follows:] The position of Brandt & Co. in point of law appears to me to be precisely the same as the position of Kleinwort & Co. The plaintiffs in the present case were properly advised that they had no defence to the action brought against them by Brandt & Co., and, accordingly, they paid the amount claimed. Then they naturally enough turned to the defendants in the present case and said, "You have received the money, it was paid to you under a mistake, repay it to us." The defendants refused to repay on the ground that they could not find that they had received from the plaintiffs a remittance which could be specifically designated as having been made in error. In other words, they profess to be unable to identify the remittance made to them as covering the sum of £1,480, and say that they cannot satisfy themselves that they ever received the money demanded from them. It appears to me perfectly clear that the transaction as to this sum of money as between the plaintiffs and the defendants was a final transaction. The defendants received the money as representing the goods with which they had parted; that money was theirs, and they were under no obligation to the plaintiffs to hand it over to Kramrisch & Co. Under these circumstances I am of the opinion that the money was received by the defendants on a mistake of fact and must be repaid. I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for appellants, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

Solicitors for respondents, Stephenson, Harwood, & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 4, 5.

STONE & Co. v. MIDLAND RAILWAY Co. (a.)

Railway—Rates—Carriage of non-perishable goods by passenger train—Absence of statutory duty to so carry—Inclusive charge for collection, carriage, and delivery—Right of company to impose its own terms—Equality clause—Midland Railway Co. Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. cxviii.), s. 203—Railway Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 90—Midland Railway Co. Act (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. ccxix.), Part V., clause 3.

By section 203 of the Midland Railway Co. Act, 1844, it was enacted that "all tolls for the use of the railway shall be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate. . . ."

By the Midland Railway Co. (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act, 1891, it was provided that "the company shall not be under obligation to convey by passenger train, or any similar service, any merchandise other than perishables." By the same Act a provisional order fixing maximum rates for the conveyance of goods was fixed.

Held, that both section 203 of the Act of 1844 and section 90 (the "equality clause") of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, apply only to tolls which the defendant railway company were authorized by their Act to take, and that as the company were under no statutory obligation to carry non-perishable goods by passenger train, they were entitled to demand from persons who wished to send such goods by passenger train a special rate, including collection, carriage, and delivery, although the collection had been in fact made by the sender himself.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) ([1903] 1 K. B. 741, 51 W. R. Dig. 134), reversing the judgment of the judge of the Bristol County Court.

The action was brought to recover the sum of one shilling alleged to have been received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs were common carriers at Bristol, and before April, 1900, they, as agents for the defendants, collected goods and parcels from warehouses in Bristol for transit by the defendants' railway to Southampton Docks, and handed them over to the defendants at their goods or passenger station, as the case might be, and were paid one penny commission on each package so collected.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In April, 1900, this arrangement came to an end, since which time the plaintiffs collected on their own account from the public, goods and parcels and handed them over to the defendants for transit by their railway. As regards goods so collected for transit by goods trains and carried by the defendants under a rate which purported to include a rate for collection, the defendants always paid to the plaintiffs a rebate which, on the face of the "dissected" rate, represented the charge for collection.

By the Midland Railway Co. (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act, 1891, which contains a schedule of the maximum rates and charges which the defendants are authorized to charge for the conveyance of merchandise (including clothing) by goods train, and of the maximum rates and charges in respect of perishable merchandise carried by passenger train, it is provided as follows: Part V. "The following provisions and regulations shall be applicable to the conveyance of perishable merchandise by passenger train. . . . (3) The company shall not be under obligation to convey by passenger train, or any similar service, any merchandise other than perishables."

The defendants carried parcels by passenger train from Bristol under two scales of charges, which were set out in their "List of Rates Arrangements for the Conveyance of Parcels by Passenger Trains from Bristol," one scale applying when they undertook the ordinary liability of common carriers, and the other applying where the goods were carried at "owner's risk." The first scale had this footnote: "Collection and delivery included within the usual limits." The second scale had appended to it a list of articles against each of which was placed either "c," "d," "cd," or "ss," which letters were explained as follows: "c, including collection," "d, including delivery," "cd, including collection and delivery," "ss, station to station, including neither collection nor delivery." In this list the letters "cd" were set against the item "Tailors' unfinished and finished clothing."

On the 7th of August, 1901, the plaintiffs collected and handed to the defendants, at their passenger station at Bristol, three boxes of tailors' goods to be carried by passenger train at "owner's risk," and they paid to the defendants, under protest, the sum of £1, being the amount of the scale rate for the carriage of the boxes to Southampton. The plaintiffs had notice of the terms on which the defendants carried tailors' goods by passenger train.

The plaintiffs then brought this action in the Bristol County Court to recover the sum of one shilling in respect of the collection of the goods by them, and they contended that they were entitled to recover that sum as a reasonable rebate on the ground that the charge of £1 included a charge for collection, whereas they themselves, and not the defendants, had rendered the service of collection.

The defendants contended that, as tailors' goods were non-perishable goods, they were not bound to carry them by passenger train, and that the right to a rebate did not extend to passenger train traffic where there was no maximum limit of charge, and where the defendants, not being bound to carry, could charge what they chose.

The learned county court judge, being of opinion that the proper inference to be drawn from the rate-book was that the charge for carriage of tailors' goods by passenger train at owner's risk included a charge for collection and delivery, held that, though the defendants were not bound to carry by passenger trains any articles other than perishable goods, yet if they chose to carry other articles by such trains they must carry them subject to the obligations imposed upon them by the law when they carry "small parcels" by goods trains.

He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs for one shilling.

On appeal to the Divisional Court that court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.), ([1903] 1 K. B. 741), held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any rebate, and that the action was not maintainable.

From this judgment the plaintiffs now appealed.

J. A. Foote, K.C. (Balfour Browne, K.C., and Weatherley with him), for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to recover the rebate of one shilling as money had and received to their use, on the ground that they have performed the service of collection for which they have been charged by the defendants: Baxendale v. Great Western Railway Co., 14 C. B. N. S. 1, 12 W. R. 602, 16 C. B. N. S. 137; Garton v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Co., 9 W. R. 734, 1 B. & S. 112. The distinction the defendants seek to draw between carriage by goods train and carriage by passenger train is purely arbitrary. Section 90 (the "equality clause") of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, enacts that it shall be lawful for the company, subject as therein mentioned, to alter or vary "the tolls authorized by the special Act to be taken . . . as they shall think fit; provided that all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons and after the same rate . . . ." It is not in accordance with that clause for a railway company to have only one rate including collection and delivery. Section 203 of the defendants' special Act of 1844, has the same provision for equality as in that section. It provides that "All tolls for the use of the railway shall at all times be charged equally to all persons and after the same rate in respect of all goods . . ." The charge made by the defendants for carrying non-perishable goods by passenger train is a toll within the meaning of the Act of 1845, and the "equality clause" applies to such a toll. That clause applies just as much to a toll fixed by a railway company under a discretionary power as to a toll for which a maximum has been provided by Act of Parliament. In Great Western Railway Co. v. Sutton, L. R. 4 H. L. 226, 17 W. R. Dig. 13, which approves of Baxendale v. Great Western Railway Co., Lord Chelmsford at p. 254 says that "the notion that the clauses for making equal charges are inconsistent with the power given to the defendants . . . to demand any sum they think fit for parcels not exceeding 500lbs., appears to me to be unfounded."

Cripps, K.C. (W. J. Noble and W. G. Clay with him), for the defendants.—The defendants' powers of making charges are now governed by the Midland Railway Co. (Rates and Charges) Order Confirmation Act, 1891, and under that Act they are under no obligation to carry non-perishable goods by passenger train. If they do so carry non-perishable goods they may demand any rate they please for such service, for in so carrying them they are in the position of a common carrier who is under no obligation to treat all customers equally, and may, at common law, give any particular individual any privilege he likes. The defendants may lawfully refuse to carry non-perishable goods by passenger train, but if they consent to so carry such goods they are at liberty to charge any rate they like: Dickon v. Great Northern Railway Co., 35 W. R. 202, 18 Q. B. D. 177.

Foote, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action brought by carriers against the Midland Railway Co., claiming to recover back money which they say has been improperly obtained from them by some species of duress—that is to say, that the company demanded and received from them a sum beyond that which they were entitled to charge. They claim to recover that money on the ground that either under the equality clause in section 90 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, or under the special clause of the company's own private Act they are entitled to get back this proportion of money.

The railway company say that they are not bound to carry such goods as the plaintiffs tendered, which were non-perishable merchandise, by passenger train at all, and that, therefore, being entirely free whether they will carry them or not, being under no obligation to carry them, and there being no toll by statute with respect to them, they do not come under the railway legislation as to equality at all. That is their point. Counsel for the plaintiffs, on the other hand, contend that they do. [His lordship here read section 90 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.] This section deals with the power conferred by law upon the company to demand certain tolls and to vary those tolls, and it says it is expedient that the company should be able to vary those tolls, but that such power of varying them should not be used for the purpose of prejudicing or favouring particular parties, and then follows the special clause for equality which I have just read. Now, it has hardly been contended for the plaintiffs that that clause is not directed to the tolls which by special legislation the company is empowered to demand; and recognizing that difficulty, the plaintiffs rest their case upon the equality clause in the private Act of the defendant company, and the ground for so doing is that the words of that section do not in terms appear to limit the word "toll" to the tolls specially authorized by the special Act. The clause relied on is section 203 of the Midland Railway Act, 1844, which begins thus: "And be it enacted that all tolls for the use of the railway shall be at all times charged equally to all persons." The rest of the section is practically in the same words as section 90 of the general Act. It is contended that section 203 of the special Act means all tolls which the company in fact charge, and not merely all tolls which by law they are entitled to demand, and that, therefore, the section is larger in its terms than section 90 of the Act of 1845, and brings under its operation any charges which the company in fact make, whether they are the subject of legislation by special Act of Parliament or not. However, when one looks at the position in which section 203 occurs in the special Act, one finds that it is simply a section in what I may call a particular code as to tolls; for in section 198 the Act deals with "tolls" and says: "And with respect to the tolls to be levied for the use of the railway, be it enacted that the company may lawfully demand any tolls not exceeding the following." Therefore this legislation is one empowering the company to demand certain tolls and limiting the amount of these tolls. It is to those tolls which are referred to directly or indirectly in the sections subsequent to section 198, up to section 203, and in several other sections afterwards, that in my judgment the words in section 203 apply.

In my opinion the legislation in the private Act differs in no way from the legislation in the public Act. They are both statutory enactments with respect to statutory rights to demand special tolls.

Then what are the statutory rights now governing the Midland Railway's undertaking? By section 24 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), it is enacted that "Notwithstanding any provision in any general or special Act, every railway company shall submit to the Board of Trade a revised classification of merchandise traffic, and a revised schedule of maximum rates and charges applicable thereto, proposed to be charged by such railway company. . . ." I need not read in detail the provisions of this section, but they provide in terms that the company shall submit a schedule, that that schedule shall be discussed before the Board of Trade, that when sanctioned by the Board of Trade it shall be first of all issued under the terms of a Provisional Order; and then by sub-section 4 it is provided that: "If, after hearing all parties whom the Board of Trade consider to be entitled to be heard before them respecting the classification and schedule, they approve thereof, they shall embody the agreed classification and schedule in a Provisional Order." That is the genesis of the Provisional Order. Then comes the statutory sanction. Sub-section 10 enacts that "The Act of Parliament confirming any Provisional Order made under this section shall be a public general Act, and the rates and charges mentioned in a Provisional Order as confirmed by such Act shall, from and after the Act coming into operation, be the rates and charges which the railway company shall be entitled to charge and make." Those, and no others, are the rates by which the defendants are now bound. Now the schedule of rates is set out in the Provisional Order which contains the following clauses: "The maximum rate for conveyance is the maximum rate which the company may charge for the conveyance of merchandise by merchandise train; and subject to the exceptions and provisions specified in this schedule, includes the provision of locomotive power and trucks by the company, and every other expense incidental to such conveyance not hereinafter provided for."

"Perishable merchandise by passenger train: (1) The company shall afford reasonable facilities for the expeditious conveyance of the articles enumerated in the three divisions set out hereunder (which articles are hereinafter called 'perishables'), either by passenger train or by other similar service. (2) Such facilities shall be subject to the reasonable regulations of the company for the convenient and punctual working of their passenger train service, and shall not include any obligation to convey perishables by any particular train. (3) The company shall not be under any obligation to convey by passenger train, or other similar service, any merchandise other than perishables."

Now here is a company whose rates and charges are ascertained and regulated by a Provisional Order, ultimately sanctioned by the Confirmation Act of 1891. That Act regulates its charges, and the company is under no obligation whatever to carry non-perishable merchandise by a passenger train; there is no tariff fixed for doing so, and no statutory obligation to make a tariff. The merchandise in this case was non-perishable, and was carried by passenger train. Being under no obligation to carry such merchandise by passenger train, the company, nevertheless, have given certain facilities to the public and they have announced: "We are prepared to take this traffic from the house of the sender and deliver it at its destination at a certain rate." But they say: "With regard to this class of merchandise, as to which we are entirely at large, so far as the Legislature is concerned, we are willing, of our own motion, on our own rights at common law, apart from statute law, being the owners of machinery whereby carriage of merchandise can be carried on, to give the public this facility if they like to take it. If they do not like to take it they can leave it alone, and the only facility we will give for carrying non-perishable merchandise by passenger train is, we will charge an inclusive rate for the whole service which you may avail yourself of altogether or in part, just as you like, but you must pay this inclusive charge, which is the only charge we make for this, whether you get the benefit of all the incidental services or not. If you like to collect your own goods and deliver them at our station and ask us to send them, we tell you we will make the same charge as if we ourselves had collected and delivered. That is the only rate we quote for it. We are under no obligation to quote any, and if you like to take that facility you may take it or else leave it alone."

The plaintiffs say that will not do. They say: "We collect our own goods, we tender them at your station, and therefore we ought not to be charged the same as other persons who do not collect their own goods and for whom you collect and take their goods to your station." If the plaintiffs had a right to demand a station to station rate that would undoubtedly be a very strong argument; but when they have no right to demand such a rate they cannot complain that the company refuse to grant them that rate and say that the only terms upon which they will carry non-perishable merchandise by passenger train is upon a rate which includes collection and delivery.

I think it is perfectly true to say, as the learned Lord Chief Justice said in the court below, that the plaintiffs are demanding a station to station rate, a falicity which they are not at law entitled to ask for, and that they can only send non-perishable merchandise by passenger train on the terms embracing collection and delivery. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that even if there is no obligation on the part of the company to take such merchandise from their station by passenger train, nevertheless if they do so carry such goods and make a charge for collection and delivery in respect of such merchandise which they have not collected, they have in fact charged a sum which constitutes an inequality, and that under those circumstances the inequality clause applies. In support of that contention the case of Baxendale v. Great Western Railway Co. is cited. In that case, however, the company were bound to take the goods and to carry them in the way they did, and they were entitled by law to demand a tariff for doing so. It is true that the precise amount of that charge was left to their discretion, but they had no discretion to refuse to carry the goods and they had by law the right to demand a toll for them, and, therefore, the court held that, though they were free as to the amount of the toll, they were not free as to anything else; and therefore they came under the equality clause and must deal equally with all people. But the cardinal difference in this case is that this particular traffic is governed by no statute; there is no obligation to carry, and there is no tariff imposed for carrying this merchandise. That being so, the company are outside the railway legislation. In fact I think this case may be summed up in the short and conclusive passage in the judgment of my brother Wills in the court below: "Two principles . . . apply here, and the combined effect of them is to make the case perfectly clear. One is, that there is no statutory obligation to carry these goods by passenger train; the other, that it is not ultra vires for the company to carry them if they so choose. The combined effect is that, so far as concerns the carriage of this kind of article by passenger train, the company are on exactly the same footing as a private individual."

In my opinion this appeal fails. No question of undue preference arises in this case, and it is not necessary to express any opinion whether such a claim could be supported.

ROMER, L.J.—So far as concerns carriage of non-perishable goods by passenger train, the company, since the Act of 1891, is clearly under no obligation to carry such goods, and if they do carry them, it appears to me they may prescribe as to between what termini they will carry, and as to the amount of rate. I think, therefore, the company are entitled to say that they will only carry non-perishable goods by passenger train and to charge a through rate for that carriage from house to house, including collection and delivery. Even if it be admitted that there must be equality of charge, the only equality need be that the through rate is not charged differently as between different persons availing themselves of the company's offer of carriage from house to house at a through rate. It cannot be contended that there is inequality merely because one house may be more distant than another.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that this arrangement of the company with respect to the carriage of non-perishable goods by passenger train was an option given to the public, imposing the terms upon which the goods would be carried. The company are entitled to do that as common carriers. I therefore agree with my brothers in thinking that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Burgess, Cosens, & Co., for C. E. Isbell, Bristol.

Solicitors for the defendants, Beale & Co.

High Court of Justice.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) — Feb. 5.

BAGG v. COLQUHOUN. (a.)

Justices—Jurisdiction—Power of adjournment—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 16.

Where, on the hearing of a criminal information, the justices are equally divided in opinion they have power to adjourn the case for rehearing, and are not bound to dismiss the information.

Case stated by the justices of the borough of Swansea.

The special case set out the following facts:

An information under the Licensing Acts, 1872 and 1894, had been preferred by the respondent for selling and exposing for sale intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours.

The information was heard on the 18th of August, 1903, before two justices, who, after hearing the evidence retired to consider their decision. Upon their return they announced in open court that they were divided in opinion, whereupon the appellant's solicitor asked that the information should be dismissed.

The justices decided that a more satisfactory decision could only be arrived at upon a rehearing with other of their fellow justices, and said that they had agreed to adjourn the information to a future day when they and the other justices on the rota for that day would be convened to rehear it. They further stated they were unanimous in agreeing to the adjournment. The information again came on for hearing on the 15th of September, 1903, before five justices, including the two justices who had heard it on the previous occasion.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon its being called on, counsel for the appellant objected to the jurisdiction of the justices present to rehear it, on the ground that it had been heard and determined by the two justices on the 18th of August, and that as they could not agree, and as the information was a criminal information upon which the appellant could have been fined on conviction and imprisoned in default of distress, they could not or should not have adjourned the information, but should have dismissed it; and he cited in support of his contention Reg. v. Ashplant, 52 J. P. 474, and Kinnis v. Graves, 67 L. J. Q. B. 583.

The respondent's solicitor contended that it was competent for the two justices who were divided in opinion to adjourn the information to a future date for the purpose of rehearing it by themselves and other justices, and that no decision or determination was come to by the justices when they agreed to adjourn the information; he cited Ex parte Evans, [1894] A. C. 16.

The justices determined they had power to rehear the information, and in the result convicted and fined the appellant.

The question for the court was whether upon the facts the justices had come to a correct determination in point of law.

S. T. Evans, K.C. (Ivor Bowen with him), for the appellant.—The second hearing was without jurisdiction. The only power of the justices to adjourn is given by section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, and that gives power to adjourn "before or during" the hearing only. Here the magistrates had already given their decision.

Avory, K.C., and L. M. Richards, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case no question arises as to a mandamus to the justices to rehear the information, nor as to the points which have caused difficulty in cases where a decision of the justices, though originally divided in opinion, has been embodied in the order, as in Kinnis v. Graves, where my brother Wills expressed the opinion the magistrates ought to have adjourned instead of coming to an immediate decision. The magistrates here did not give a final decision, but agreed to adjourn the hearing. In my opinion the principle of Jones v. Williams, 46 L. J. M. C. 270, applies to this case. I think, indeed, the present case is a far stronger one. It would be lamentable if we were compelled to hold, under such circumstances as those we are dealing with, that the justices had no power to adjourn. It is not necessary to decide what is the true dividing line, but in any event the mere expression of opinion by justices that they were divided does not deprive them of their right to adjourn.

WILLS, J.—I agree. I adhere to what I said in Kinnis v. Graves and am quite clear the power of adjournment was not taken away by anything that happened in the present case.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellant, Riddell & Co., for Viner Leeder & Morris, Swansea.

Solicitors for respondent, Helder, Roberts, & Co., for Laurence Richards, Swansea.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) — Dec. 11.

CLAYTON v. PEARSE. (a.)

Fishery law—Validity of bye-law—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 71), s. 39, sub-section 3.

Where conservators of a river have power to determine (inter a ia) "the length, size, and description of nets . . . for taking of salmon," they are entitled to prohibit the use of a particular kind of net altogether.

Case stated.

An information was prepared by the respondent Clayton against the appellants for that they on the 13th of May, 1903, in the parish of Goodrich, in the county of Hereford (within the Wye Fishery District), and in that part of the River Wye which lies above a line drawn across the river along the lower side of Begsweir Bridge, did unlawfully use a net other than a beating net—to wit, a draft or seine net, contrary to the bye-law.

By the bye-laws which were made on the 27th of November, 1901, and confirmed on the 27th of February, 1902, fishing in the Wye Fishery District was regulated.

The terms of the bye-law in question were: "The length, size, and description of nets, and the manner of using them . . . which may be lawfully used in the Wye Fishery District shall be as follows: (a) In that part of the said district which includes so much of the River Wye as lies below a line drawn across the said River Wye along the lower side of Begsweir Bridge . . . the description of such nets shall be draft or seine nets, beating nets, and lave nets as hereinafter determined. (b) In all other parts of the said district . . . the description of such nets shall be beating nets as above described to be used in manner above mentioned."

The licence fee as fixed by the scale attached to the bye-laws is £5 for every draft or seine net, and for every beating net £20.

It was proved at the hearing that the appellant Clayton, on the 12th of May, 1903, was using a draft or seine net above Begsweir Bridge, and that the lessee of the Huntsman Salmon Fishery, whose servant Clayton was, held a licence to use a draft or seine net, for which he had paid £5.

The justices convicted the appellant.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the bye-law was or was not ultrà vires.

By the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, s. 39, "a board of conservators may make bye-laws for the better execution of the Salmon Fishery Acts, 1871 to 1873, for all or any of the following purposes, that is to say; . . . (3) to determine the length, size, and description of nets, and the manner of using the same . . . for taking salmon, provided that no bye-law . . . shall limit the length of a hang net or limit the length of a draft net, so as to be less than 200 yards; (8) to prohibit the use of nets within a certain distance of the mouth of any river and of the point of confluence of rivers in any part of the district (not being a several fishery)."

Robson, K.C. (Lloyd with him), for the appellant.—This bye-law is bad. Section 39, sub-section 3, of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, under which it purports to be made, only gives the conservators power to regulate the kind of net, and does not allow them to forbid a particular net altogether. If it did sub-section 8 would be superfluous.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

W. Denman Benson, for the respondent.—This bye-law was confirmed after a full inquiry by the Board of Trade, and is intra vires. The conservators have power to regulate the description of net, and this includes prohibition of a particular kind of net.

Robson, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We are asked to say that a certain bye-law made under the Salmon Fisheries Act of 1873 is ultrà vires and unreasonable. As was said in Kruse v. Johnson, a strong case is needed to induce the court to hold such a bye-law void for unreasonableness. When clear powers are given by the enabling Act of Parliament, we ought not to hold that a bye-law made under those powers is ultrà vires unless it prescribes something which is clearly not within the statute, and that is certainly even more the case when the bye-law is passed, as was the case here, after a public inquiry at which all persons interested in the question might have been heard. It is plain that the conservators had power to make regulations determining the "length, size, and description of the nets to be used in the river," and also that they might apply these bye-laws to any part of their district (section 40). What they have done is to say that for a certain limited distance certain nets may be used, but that above that and higher up the river only a beating net can be used. Their right to say so depends on whether they have the right to say that as regards the whole river persons may not use a particular kind of net for fishing. It is contended such a power is not given them by the words in sub-section 8 of section 39, "description of nets and the manner of using the same." In other words, it is said they connot prohibit the use of a particular kind of net, but only the length, size, or make of such net. It would, I think, lead to absurdity, and would unduly restrict the power of the conservators, to say that the word "description" in that sub-section only means description of a particular kind of net, such as, for instance, a beating or draft net, and that it does not enable the conservators to prohibit the use of that kind of net altogether. In my opinion the word "description" means kind as comparing one kind with another, and I think that the proviso to sub-section (3) rather supports that view because it regulates the limitations of two particular kinds of nets. Such a proviso to a section enabling regulations to be made as to the description of nets, certainly suggests that a draft net or a hang net may be a description of net within the section. That, perhaps, does not carry the matter much further, but I am clearly of opinion that it would be cutting down the powers of conservators unduly to say that the Act did not allow them to prohibit the use of a particular kind of net altogether.

But it is urged that this cannot be the meaning of sub-section 3, because sub-section 8 enables the conservators to prohibit the use of nets altogether except in a several fishery. But section 39, sub-section 3, and section 40 give the conservators clear powers to deal with the control of nets in all parts of the river, and their powers, therefore, are intended to be extensive. I think the language of section 39, sub-section 3, ought to be construed as conferring on them power to make the bye-law in question.

Then it is said, to hold the bye-law to be intra vires is practically to prohibit fishing in this fishery altogether, because the payment for a licence to use a beating net is four times as great as that for a draft net. The licence duties depend on the power given by the third schedule to the Act of 1873, and there is ample provision in section 41 of that Act for enabling persons whose interests are at stake to bring forward their objections to the provisions of the bye-laws before they are confirmed. It seems to me quite hopeless to argue that this bye-law is ultrà vires because it prescribes the use of a net for which a duty of £20 is payable, and forbids the use of another for which only £5 is payable. In my opinion this conviction must be affirmed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I agree.

KENNEDY, J.—It is plain that if this bye-law is not ultra vires it must be a bye-law properly made under the powers given by section 39 of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1873. It is intended that the word "description" in sub-section 3 only refers to the characteristics of the various sorts of nets, and that it does not enable the conservators to prohibit the use of any particular kind of net altogether. It seems to me there is no reason why the word description should not be held to cover the generic description of nets as well as particular characteristics of those nets. The conservators may say, as I think, that a net of a certain description, such as a draft net or a beating net shall not be used, or they may say that its description shall be so and so, indicating its particular characteristics. I think that there is no reason for limiting the word description to the description of the characteristics of the net. For all practical purposes it must be conceded that it would be possible, by prescribing the characteristics of a particular kind of net, to make it of different degrees of efficacy, and therefore by a bye-law made under sub-section 3 of section 39 it would be possible by setting out the characteristics of a net which should be forbidden, to exclude the use of a particular kind of net altogether. In other words, according to the argument for the appellants, the conservators have powers to forbid the use of a net described by the enumeration of its points, but have not the power to exclude its use if they merely called it by its name, as a draft net or a beating net. The argument therefore leads to the fallacy that the bye-law would be good if the net had been described without naming it, but it is bad because it names without describing it.

As to the alleged inconsistency between sub-section 3 and sub-section 8, it is difficult to see why sub-section 8 should not be added, for there is no conflict between it and sub-section 3. I do not think that the mere adding of the powers given by sub-section 8 makes a bye-law made under sub-section 3 ultrà vires. Further, sub-section 8 allows the prohibition of all kinds of nets within a certain distance of the mouth of the river, and I do not see how that in any way limits the powers of the conservators under sub-section 3. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Solicitors for appellants, Robson, Meredith, & Co., for Wallis, Hereford.

Solicitor for respondent, R. J. Owen, Builth.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) May 3.

JAMES v. OCEAN COAL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Average weekly earnings—Review of weekly payment—Fall in wages—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule I., clauses 1 (b), 2, 12.

A haulier in a colliery was injured by an accident which for a time totally incapacitated him for work, and, by arrangement, his employers paid him one-half his weekly wages as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Subsequently he was able to do light work, and his employers took him back into their employment as a lamp man, and paid him the same amount of wages as hauliers were then receiving, hauliers' wages having fallen since the accident. The employers thereupon discontinued the weekly payment. The workman filed a request for arbitration under the Act of 1897 to assess the weekly payment. The county court judge refused to award any weekly payment upon the ground that the maximum which had been originally fixed on the average weekly earnings before the accident was subject to variation according to the variation in the wages, and that, as the wages which the workman was receiving were the same as he would have received if there had been no accident and he had continued in the same employment, he was not entitled to any weekly sum as compensation

Held, that the county court judge was wrong in holding that the original maximum was subject to variation, and that he was bound as a matter of law to award the workman no weekly sum as compensation, but that he should consider, in the exercise of his discretion, whether he would award any, and if so what, proportion of the difference between the wages earned by the workman previous to the accident and the wages which he was earning in the new employment since the accident.

Appeal from an award of Judge Gwilym Williams, sitting at the Bridgend County Court of Glamorganshire, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was a workman who was in the employment of the respondent company as haulier. On the 9th of October, 1901, he met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and thereby sustained injuries which totally incapacitated him from performing any work until the 15th of June, 1903. His average weekly earnings during the twelve months previous to the accident were 34s. The company by arrangement paid him by way of compensation a weekly sum of 17s. On the 15th of June, 1903, he undertook light employment as a lampman under the same employers. The wages paid him as a lampman on his undertaking this light employment were at the rate of 29s. 5d. per week—that is, 4s. 7d. less than he was receiving before the accident. The respondent company thereupon ceased to pay him the weekly sum of 17s. On the 18th of August, 1903, he filed a request for arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, claming payment of the weekly difference between the wages earned by him previous to the accident and those which he had been earning since the 15th of June, and a declaration of the respondents' liability. The medical evidence showed that the applicant still suffered from the effects of the accident, and that he would probably never be able to do heavy work.

It appeared that the wages of the workmen in the employment of the company were subject to fluctuations occurring from time to time in percentages on the wages, which were subject to an increase or decrease upon the standard rate of wages, the percentages being regulated by a conciliation board; and that in the interval between the 9th of October, 1901, the date of the accident, and the 15th of June, 1903, the date on which the applicant undertook light employment, there had been a drop or reduction in the percentages, brought about in the regular and usual way. It appeared also that the wages which the applicant was receiving, viz, 29s. 5d., were the same as would be received by any other workman engaged in the same class of work as the applicant was engaged in at the time of the accident—namely, as a haulier.

The county court judge, in delivering judgment, said: "The principal question, therefore, for decision in this case is whether, when the amount of compensation has been decided, either by award or agreement, on the basis of the earnings of the injured person prior to the accident, by which for a time he was totally incapacitated from working, that compensation is subject to revision when he is able to undertake light employment, and whether it is subject to the variations governing the wages paid to persons doing similar work to that which he performed prior to the accident. I am of opinion that the proper principle to be adopted in such circumstances is that the basis—i.e., the wages on which the amount of compensation was originally fixed—should be varied to the extent of the variation of the percentages in the wages earned by persons performing similar work at the time, but that the wages earned by the injured person when he undertook light employment should be supplemented by a sum which would bring up his earnings to the same amount as are paid to persons in similar employment to that in which he was engaged prior to the accident. . . . The effect of my decision is to place the injured person in the same position with regard to earnings as he would have been in if he had not been injured, for if he had continued to work without interruption his wages would have been subject to the variations in the percentages, and would therefore in this case be less than those which he earned prior to the accident. On the other hand, if the applicant's contention is to be allowed—viz., that the wages earned by him in undertaking light employment are to be supplemented by a sum which would bring them up to those which he earned prior to the accident—he would be receiving higher wages than those who were at that time engaged in a similar capacity. That, in my opinion, would be absurd. In arriving at these conclusions I have not lost sight of the fact that he is as a consequence of the injuries he received still unable to undertake the duties which he performed prior to the accident, or indeed any heavy work." He found that the applicant was receiving the same rate of wages as those hauliers now received who performed the same duties as he did prior to the accident, their wages having by the drop in the percentages been reduced to the same amount as he was now being paid. He therefore declined to order any weekly payment, but he made a declaration of liability.

The applicant appealed.

Abel Thomas, K.C., Rhys Williams, and John Sankey, for the applicant.

Ruegg, K.C., and Albert Parsons, for the employers.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Jamieson v. Fife Coal Co., 5 Fraser 958, was referred to.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from an award of the county court judge, which was made upon the application of the workman, not in the strict sense for a review, but to have the amount of compensation determined. What happened was this. The workman, who was a haulier in the respondents' employment, met with an accident in the course of his employment, which resulted in his complete incapacity for work. His average weekly earnings before the accident were 34s., and the employers paid him half that amount—namely, 17s.—a week for a considerable time. Afterwards the workman sufficiently recovered to do light work, and he was taken back into the respondents' employment at light work, and was paid wages at the rate of 29s. 5d. a week. It happened that that was the full rate of wages for hauliers at that time. In these circumstances the employers refused to pay, in addition to the sum of 29s. 5d. a week, any further sum as compensation under the Act. The workman, not being satisfied with that decision of the employers, applied to the county court judge to settle what sum should be paid. The county court judge found that 29s. 5d. was sufficient, at the same time making a declaration of liability.

If the judge had simply said that he saw no reason for interfering with the arrangement by which the workman was receiving 29s. 5d. a week, and had not travelled into a discussion as to the reasons and principles of his decision there would have been no ground for interfering. We have no right to say whether a county court judge is right or wrong in merely assessing a certain sum as compensation which he has a discretion to assess. The real difficulty arises from the reasons given by the judge for his decision, which raise questions that both parties are desirous of having determined. The judge has laid down a hard and fast rule as to the calculation of the amount, a rule which I am not prepared to adopt. The county court judge has stated two questions for his own consideration in determining the case. The first is this: "The principal question, therefore, for decision in this case is whether, when the amount of compensation has been decided either by award or agreement on the basis of the earnings of the injured person prior to the accident, by which for a time he was incapacitated from working, that compensation is subject to revision when he is able to undertake light employment." So far the answer to that question is clear. The amount of compensation is clearly subject to review when the injured person is able to undertake light employment. By clause 2 of Schedule I. to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "in fixing the amount of the weekly payment, regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident, and to any payment not being wages which he may receive from the employer in respect of his injury during the period of his incapacity." By clause 12, "any weekly payment may be reviewed at the request either of the employer or of the workman, and on such review may be ended, diminished, or increased, subject to the maximum above provided, and the amount of payment shall, in default of agreement, be settled by arbitration under this Act." Therefore the first question admits of only one answer—namely, that the amount of compensation is subject to revision. Now comes the second question, which, when analyzed, seems to me to involve a misconception of law, and so far as it was a factor in the determination of the amount of the compensation to be awarded, and so far as it had any bearing upon the final decision arrived at by the judge, it was wrongly taken into consideration. The question is: "And whether it"—that is, the compensation which ex hypothesi was the maximum in case of total incapacity—"is subject to the variations governing the wages paid to persons doing similar work to that which he performed prior to the accident?" That is the second question which the judge put to himself, and I think, on analyzing the words, that they mean whether the sum awarded on the basis of total incapacity was subject to the variations governing the wages paid to persons doing similar work to that which the injured man performed prior to the accident, and the question was put upon what must be treated as in substance an application to review the weekly payment. The judge, in his judgment, went on to say: "I am of opinion that the proper principle to be adopted in such circumstances is that the basis—i.e., the wages on which the amount of compensation was originally fixed—should be varied to the extent of the variation of the percentages in the wages earned by persons performing similar work at the time, but that the wages earned by the injured person when he undertook light employment should be supplemented by a sum which would bring up his earnings to the same amount as are paid to persons in similar employment to that in which he was engaged prior to the accident." It seems clear, therefore, that the judge held that the maximum which has been originally fixed on the average amount of the wages may on occasion of review be varied to the extent of the variation of the percentages in the wages. So far as the judge adopted that view I think that he was wrong, for, in my judgment, the maximum fixed in the first instance is entirely independent of fluctuations in wages afterwards. That maximum is not to be altered. This is in accordance with the decision in Jamieson v. Fife Coal Co., and with the scheme of the Act. Having once arrived at that maximum, it is not to be altered by anything happening afterwards. If it were subject to alteration, the effect would be to introduce a fluctuating maximum. I do not say that the county court judge would necessarily be wrong, in the exercise of his discretion in a particular case, in supplementing the workman's wages by awarding the whole or part of the original maximum so as to bring the injured man's earnings up to the same amount as were at that time paid to persons in similar employment to that in which the injured workman was employed at the time of the accident. But the county court judge cannot lay down a rigid rule which obliges him to arrive at the same result in different cases. In each case the judge must exercise his discretion. So far as he laid down a general rule of arithmetic, he was wrong; and in so far as that rule involves the proposition that the original maximum is subject to variation, it was wrong. In so far as that error entered into the calculation, the principle applied was wrong. The Act seems to me to be clear. When there is total incapacity arising from accident, the judge in assessing compensation has to find out what the average weekly earnings of the injured man before the accident have been, and having ascertained that amount he cannot award him more than one-half of it. When that is once ascertained that matter is concluded. Then, by clause 2 of Schedule I., "in fixing the amount of the weekly payment regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident." So that upon an application to review a weekly payment a new factor is introduced, and the county court judge has to find out what, in all the circumstances, the injured workman should be paid. Any element of uncertainty in the original maximum is entirely remote from the discussion. The judge has to look at the maximum in view of the fact that the incapacity has ceased to be total and has become partial, and he is to have regard to the facts specified in clause 2. It was entirely in the discretion of the judge, subject to clause 2. That is all that is laid down. He is to have regard to the average weekly earnings before the accident and the average amount which the workman is able to earn after the accident. Neither of those facts embrace the consideration as to whether the maximum is subject to fluctuation. I do not know how far, if at all, this element affected the mind of the county court judge. The case must therefore go back to him. It may be that when the judge comes to reconsider the matter he may make no difference in his award. I am unable to say how this may be. As, however, the point was pressed upon him, his decision may have been influenced by it, and therefore there may have been a mistake. In these circumstances there is no alternative but to send the case back to him.

ROMER, L.J.—My brethren are of opinion that the county court judge has misdirected himself, and that consequently he may not have exercised his discretion properly in the matter. That being so, I do not differ from them upon that point, because there are certain passages in the county court judge's judgment which do not accurately state the law. The case must therefore go back. I regret this result because, in my opinion, the judgment of the county court judge worked substantial justice. The judge, in assessing compensation, can take into consideration the fact that the injured man is earning the same wages which he would have earned as a haulier if there had been no accident, and I cannot say that the judge would be wrong in refusing to award a further sum so long as the injured man was paid those wages. I cannot help thinking that the judge will probably arrive at the same conclusion after he has exercised his discretion in the matter, and that the only result of sending the case back to him will be to make further costs.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether or not the county court judge, when asked to review the weekly payment, was bound to decline to order any weekly payment if, upon looking at the wages earned by the workman, he found that they were the same as he would have earned if there had been no accident and he had continued in the same employment as he was in before the accident. The county court judge held that he was so bound, and in my opinion he was wrong in so holding. It is then said that we ought to deal with the case on the footing that the judge in refusing to order any weekly payment did so in the exercise of his discretion. The judge, however, does not seem to have exercised his discretion. He only considered one point—namely, that the injured man was earning the same wages as men were earning at the same work as he was engaged upon before the accident. If the judge had told us that he had considered all the circumstances, that he had looked forward to the future as well as backward to the past, and had considered that the man was not the same man as before with regard to his earning capacity, he would have exercised his discretion, and the case would have been different. But he did not do so. The case must therefore go back to him. I refrain from giving him any direction as to what he should do when he reconsiders the case.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Smith, Rundell, & Dods, for Walter Morgan, Bruce, & Nicholas, Pontypridd.

Solicitor for the employers, H. P. Becher, for Simons & Powell, Pontypridd.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Feb. 26.

ELLIOTT v. CRUTCHLEY AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Contract—Impossibility—Contract to supply refreshments for steamer for Coronation Naval Review—Cheque given in part payment—Review abandoned—Condition in contract that if review was cancelled before caterer incurred expense there should be no liability on charterers.

The plaintiff and the defendants entered into a contract whereby the former was, in consideration of £300, to be paid in advance, to supply refreshments on board a pleasure steamer chartered by the latter for the purpose of taking passengers to see the Coronation Naval Review. In the letter accepting the contract the defendants wrote, "It is, of course, understood that in the event of the cancellation of the review before any expense is incurred by the caterer there shall be no liability on our side." Enclosed in this letter was a cheque for £300 in part payment of the contract. The review was on the next day cancelled before any refreshments were supplied or the cheque presented for payment, and the defendants stopped payment of the cheque.

Held, that upon the true construction of the contract, the parties had agreed that if the review was cancelled there was not merely to be a release of both from any further performance thereunder, but as nearly as possible a restitutio ad integrum, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the value of the cheque.

Semble, the fact that the part payment was made by cheque, which had not been cashed before the review had been officially announced as cancelled, did not alter the rights of the parties.

Chandler v. Webster, ante, p. 290, [1904] 1 K. B. 493, distinguished.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of Ridley, J.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover £300 from the defendants as drawers of a cheque for that amount.

In March, 1902, an arrangement was made by which a company agreed to let their pleasure steamer Yarmouth Belle to the Navy League, of which the defendants were members of the executive committee, for the purpose of taking passengers to see the Naval Review proposed to be held on the 28th of June, 1902, and under that agreement the plaintiff was to have the catering for the steamer. It was in reference to the supply of refreshments that the present action was brought, the agreement for which was contained in two letters.

The first letter written by the plaintiff's manager to the defendants, was dated the 4th of March, 1902, and so far as material was in these terms: "I now beg to set out the arrangement Mr. Elliott is willing to agree to as verbally reported to you this afternoon by telephone. That is to say, that he will supply the three meals as per menu at 12s. 6d. per head . . . you guaranteeing not less than 600 passengers and paying for all over that number . . . £300 to be paid to Mr. Elliott on account of the refreshments on the Monday previous to the review day."

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the following day the defendant Crutchley, on behalf of the Navy League, wrote to the plaintiff accepting the terms contained in the letter of the previous day, but added in a postscript a term to the contract as follows: "It is, of course, understood that in the event of the cancellation of the review before any expense is incurred by the caterer there shall be no liability on our side."

It was subsequently agreed that the price to be paid for refreshments should be £1 1s. per head, but in other respects the contract was unaltered. The defendants sent the plaintiff a cheque for £300 on the 23rd of June, being the Monday previous to the day fixed for the Naval Review. The next day the review was cancelled, and the defendants gave notice to the plaintiff, and the steamer never started on the proposed excursion.

After negotiations the cheque was stopped, the defendants contending that the consideration under the contract for which it was paid had wholly failed. At the trial they pleaded also by way of counterclaim that if anything was due to the plaintiff in respect of expenses incurred in connection with the contract such expenses must have been less than £300, and they were entitled to be repaid the balance on the cheque, after the plaintiff had deducted such an amount for expenses as he might be entitled to.

Ridley, J., in giving judgment, said he understood that all along the defendants offered to make good all expenses incurred by the plaintiff, but the latter at first insisted on payment of the full amount to which he would have been entitled on performance of the contract, and later on upon payment only of the cheque. The conclusion he had come to was that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the amount of the cheque, and he gave judgment accordingly for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Witt, K.C., and Poley, for the plaintiff.—The money sued for being due and payable under the terms of the agreement prior to the abandonment of the review, the defendants are not entitled to withhold payment of the cheque. Chandler v. Webster, ante, p. 290, [1904] 1 K. B. 493, decides that the contract is not rescinded ab initio, but that the further performance of it having been removed out of possibility anything yet to be done under the contract could not be demanded. Therefore, if this cheque had not been payable until after the date of the abandonment, it could not have been sued for. Here the money was due when paid, and if it had been paid in cash could not have been recovered. The fact that payment was made by cheque, which was not cashed prior to the date when the contract became impossible of performance, does not alter the relationship or liabilities and rights of the parties.

Montague Shearman, K.C., and Eustace Hills, for the defendants, were not heard.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is one of a series of cases which have arisen out of the cancellation of the Coronation Procession and the Naval Review which occurred in consequence of the unfortunate illness of the king. In deciding them this court has endeavoured to follow the same principle of law in order as much as possible to lay down a general rule, and has declined to decide any one on its particular merits. Now what are the facts here: The defendants, Commander Crutchley, and Mr. H. T. Knox are two gentlemen who were interested in the Navy League, and they desired to secure a steamer for the purpose of enabling a number of persons to view the Naval Review. They had necessarily to make some provision for catering, and with that object came to an agreement with the plaintiff. That agreement was put into writing, and is contained in two letters, so that we have not to draw an inference here as to what was the real intention of the parties when they entered into the agreement. [His lordship having read the letters, the substance of which is set out above, continuing said:] When the day arrived on which the £300 was to be paid, the defendants sent the plaintiff a cheque for that amount. The plaintiff did not immediately present the cheque for payment; the review was cancelled the next day, and he still kept the cheque in his possession, and it was not until some time afterwards that the defendants stopped payment. I agree with Mr. Witt's contention so far, that the plaintiff, by accepting a cheque was in no worse and no better position thereby, than if he had been paid cash, and that the stopping of the cheque did not affect the rights of either party to the money. The courts have on several occasions laid down the rule as to the rights of the parties to a contract where an event on which the performance of the contract depended has without the default of either become impossible. The rule is that if before the impossibility is ascertained either party has paid money under the contract, he cannot recover it back, but he is relieved from making any further payment under the contract. The contract—as was pointed out in Chandler v. Webster—is not by the mere fact that something outside the contemplation of the parties when they contracted has happened which makes the contract impossible, thereby rescinded ab initio, but the further performance under it cannot be demanded by either party. Mr. Witt said that the present case came within that rule, and that the payment having been made before the fact of the abandonment—the event that rendered further performance impossible—became known to either party, the money so paid could not be recovered back. And he said the giving of the cheque was equivalent to the payment of the money. If the facts had been as Mr. Witt put them, that argument, on the authority of Chandler v. Webster, must have resulted in our judgment being for the plaintiff. But the rule laid down in that case is not applicable here, for the simple reason that the parties themselves in the present case dealt with the matter which the court would have had to deal with had they been silent. The parties themselves contemplated the contingency of the naval review not taking place, and they themselves made special provision for that contingency. Mr. Witt, for the plaintiff, argued that the postscript to the second letter—the letter by the defendants accepting the contract—only affirmed what the law would have said if the parties had been silent. The postscript was in these words: "It is, of course, understood that in the event of the cancellation of the review before any expense is incurred by the caterer there shall be no liability on our side." The learned counsel relied on the use of the future tense in the words "there shall be no liability on our side," and he said the part payment by the cheque was not made thereby conditional, and that the liability there referred to was a liability arising from and after that date. In my opinion, the fair meaning of that postscript is that if the review did not take place, the parties were to be in a position in which the law could not in the absence of such an agreement have placed them, had they been silent in the matter. The true meaning, in my opinion, to attach to those words is that in the event which happened there was to be a rescission of the contract with as nearly as possible a restitutio ad integrum. I understand that the defendants have all along expressed their willingness to pay the plaintiff's actual out-of-pocket expenses, and that by consent, if the judgment entered for defendants stands, some small sum is to come off. With that we have nothing to do, as we are asked merely to decide the question raised by the payment of the cheque for £300.

In my opinion the plaintiff, for the reasons I have given, is not entitled to judgment, and therefore this appeal fails.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., agreed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Samuel Price & Sons.

Solicitors for the defendants, Dowson, Ainslie, & Martineau.

From K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J.) Jan. 29.

BRANDTS, SONS, & CO. v. DUNLOP RUBBER CO. (a.)

Practice—Assignment of debt—Absolute assignment in writing—Notice—Written request to debtor to pay third party—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 6.

The plaintiffs sued the defendants to recover £3,263, which the plaintiffs claimed had been assigned to them by K. & Co. K. & Co., who owed money to the plaintiffs, sold goods to the defendants for £369 and £3,263 respectively. On the 6th of January, 1903, K. & Co. wrote to the plaintiffs enclosing a document which the plaintiffs were to forward to the defendants. This document was written on one sheet of paper which consisted of two detachable parts, and was as follows: "To D. & Co. (the defendants). Dear Sirs,—Kindly sign the attached letter and forward the same to Messrs. B., Sons, & Co. (the plaintiffs).—Yours truly, K. & Co." "To Messrs. B., Sons, & Co. (the plaintiffs). Dear Sirs,—Herewith we beg to confirm that we shall remit, subject to the approval of goods, the amount of invoice—£369 for eight, and £3,263 for seventy-five, packages raw rubber received to-day from K. & Co. When due, direct to your good selves for account of K. & Co." This part was intended to be signed by the defendants. The plaintiffs, on the 7th of January, forwarded this document to the defendants to their local works at Birmingham, and the letter attached was signed by the local manager of the defendants at Birmingham, who returned it to the plaintiffs. The local manager of the defendants had no authority from the defendants to sign the document on their behalf, and he omitted to notify the defendants that he had signed it. The defendants being unaware of the letter so signed, paid the sum of £3,263 to K. & Co. direct, who subsequently became bankrupt. The plaintiffs thereupon brought the present action.

Held that the document above referred to was not an assignment of the debt due by the defendants to K. & Co., and that the action should be dismissed.

Decision of Walton, J. (8 Com. Cas. 174), reversed.

Appeal by the defendants against a judgment entered against them in an action brought to recover £3,263 alleged to be due from the defendants to the plaintiffs under an assignment, or alternatively under an agreement.

In November, 1901, the plaintiffs, who were bankers in London, entered into an arrangement for the purpose of financing certain commercial transactions of a Liverpool firm, Kramrisch & Co., by which Kramrisch & Co. would buy goods for shipment from abroad, and would sell the same to customers in England, the plaintiffs to accept bills drawn by the sellers abroad for the prices of these goods; and Kramrisch & Co., among other steps for securing the plaintiffs, would direct their customers to pay the invoice price to the plaintiffs. Among the various transactions on this footing which took place, Kramrisch & Co. bought two lots of rubber, and resold the same to the defendants for £369 and £3,263 respectively (the latter sum being the amount now in question), and on the 3rd of January, 1903, the following letter was written to the plaintiffs by Kramrisch & Co.: "Dear Sirs,—We beg to advise having received from Messrs. Blessig, Braun, & Co. for your account delivery orders of two lots of rubber of about nine tons and one and a-half tons respectively, and we hereby engage receiving such goods, to hold same in trust on your behalf, and as such goods are forwarded to buyers (as per statement overleaf) to send you the new documents (unless forwarded by rail); in any case to grant you the sole and absolute lien on said goods and their proceeds until you have received full payment, plus charges of the advance granted by you to us on said goods for £3,430, and we further engage to hold this transaction separate from any other."

The statement overleaf was as follows: "Transaction No. 251. Sold to the Dunlop Rubber Co. (Limited), Para Mills, Birmingham," the two lots of rubber above mentioned.

The plaintiffs accepted bills for payment to the sellers, being for a sum less than the invoice prices.

On the 6th of January, 1903, Kramrisch & Co., in accordance with the above arrangement, wrote to the plaintiffs enclosing a printed document which by the letter they requested the plaintiffs to forward to the defendants for their signature. This document consisted of two parts, which were detachable; one part was signed by Kramrisch & Co., it was addressed to the defendants at their Birmingham office (Para Mills), and was as follows: "Dear Sirs,—We should thank you to kindly sign the attached letter and forward the same to Messrs. Brandts, Sons, & Co." The other part (the attached letter above referred to) was addressed to the plaintiffs, and was intended for signature by the defendants; it was in these terms: "Dear Sirs,—Herewith we beg to confirm that we shall remit, subject to approval of goods, the amount of invoices £369 for eight, and £3,263 for seventy-five, packages raw rubber received to-day from Messrs. Kramrisch & Co., Liverpool. When due, direct to your good selves for account of Messrs. Kramrisch & Co."

On the 7th of January the plaintiffs forwarded this document to the defendants at their mills at Birmingham, where the rubber had been delivered, in a letter which said: "We request you to kindly return to us the counterpart duly signed by your good selves"; and on the 9th of January the attached part was returned to the plaintiffs, having been signed in the name of the defendant company by their manager there, a Mr. Gooding. The registered office, however, of the defendant company was in London, and Gooding omitted to inform the head office of the receipt of the letter.

The goods were approved, and the sum of £369 was duly paid to the plaintiffs (the invoice containing a direction to pay the plaintiffs), but the £3,263 was paid by the defendants from the head office direct to Messrs. Kramrisch's general bankers (the invoice not containing any direction to pay the plaintiffs); and Kramrisch & Co. having become bankrupt, the defendants refused to entertain the plaintiffs' demand for payment, who thereupon brought this action.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case was tried by Walton, J., without a jury; the learned judge held that the documents above referred to amounted to an absolute assignment of the debt in question by Kramrisch & Co. to the plaintiffs, and notice of such assignment to the defendants; and he accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Bray, K.C., and Schiller, for the defendants.—There was not here an absolute assignment of the debt within section 25 (6) of the Judicature Act of 1873; by the agreement there was at most an hypothecation of a larger sum as security for a smaller: Durham Bros. v. Robertson, [1898] 1 Q. B. 765, 46 W. R. Dig. 9; Mercantile Bank of London v. Evans, [1899] 2 Q. B. 613, 47 W. R. Dig. 8; Fisher v. Calvert, 27 W. R. 301. The document was a revocable authority or request to the defendants to pay the plaintiffs: Ex parte Hall, 27 W. R. 385, 10 Ch. D. 615, shows that letters in this form do not of themselves constitute an assignment. Secondly, there was no sufficient notice of the assignment—no "express notice in writing." Moreover, if the transaction, which clearly does not amount to an absolute assignment, is to be treated as an equitable assignment within the Judicature Act, 1873, the plaintiffs must fail as they cannot sue in their own names. Under the Companies Act, 1862, notice must be sent to the registered office of the company, where the financial business of the company is conducted, whereas here it was sent to the company's mills at Birmingham, and the manager there had no authority to make the agreement as alleged.

Hamilton, K.C., v. Loehnis, for the plaintiffs.—The document, as a business document, clearly amounts to an absolute assignment of the debt for which the defendants attorned to the plaintiffs: Hamilton v. Spottiswoode, (1849) 4 Ex. 200. It is no legal objection that this absolute assignment is in the form of an order to the debtor to pay the creditor: Harding v. Harding, 34 W. R. 775, (1886) 17 Q. B. D. 442. [They also referred to Brice v. Bannister, 26 W. R. 670, 3 Q. B. D. 569; Fleet v. Perrins, 17 W. R. 862, (1868) L. R. 3 Q. B. 536; Percival v. Dunn, 29 Ch. D. 128, 33 W. R. Dig. 38.] The notice of the assignment having been sent to Gooding, who was the manager at the Birmingham office, was a good notice to the company under sections 39 and 62 of the Companies Act, 1862.

Bray, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The conclusion I have come to here is that the contention of the defendants that this document was not an absolute assignment of the debt within section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, is right, and that their appeal therefore must succeed.

It was contended by the plaintiffs that the document must be construed as amounting to an absolute assignment, either legal or equitable, of the debt within that sub-section, and that they could sue in their own names. The plaintiffs therefore have to show an absolute assignment by writing, under the hand of the assignor (not purporting to be by way of charge only), of the debt or other legal chose in action, of which express notice was given to the debtor. It is obvious that unless we arrive at the conclusion that this document in question amounts to an absolute assignment no question of notice arises, therefore that is the question to be decided first. The plaintiffs sought to make out an absolute assignment in writing sufficient to satisfy the statute, by the document containing the two detachable letters sent by them to the defendants. The letters were, we are told, attached together, one being signed by Kramrisch & Co.; and if the other part of the document does amount to an absolute assignment the document would, in my opinion, be duly signed by the assignor. The other part of the document on its face did not purport to be an assignment at all, but merely a request to the defendants to sign the attached letter agreeing to remit the amount of the invoices to the plaintiffs, and if the defendants had signed the letter they would have been in the position like that of the defendants in Harding v. Harding, 34 W. R. 775, 17 Q. B. D. 442, which was relied on by the plaintiffs, and where it was held that the document was a valid assignment of the balance in the hands of the defendants, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount. The difficulty here, however, is to see why this document should be treated as an assignment of the debt. Nor do I see any really satisfactory answer to the question, why, if the surrounding circumstances can be looked at, it is to be assumed that there has been, as the foundation of the document, any assignment in writing signed by Kramrisch & Co. of the debt at all. In my opinion the request signed by Kramrisch & Co. to the defendants to sign the attached letter was merely a request and did not amount to an assignment of the debt. The document is consistent with the plaintiffs having merely a floating lien. I do not base my judgment on the fact that three days before there was a letter from Kramrisch & Co. to the plaintiffs making themselves trustees of the money for the plaintiffs and giving the latter a lien. Nevertheless if it cannot be said that the document on the face of it is an absolute assignment, and if it is allowable to go outside the document to see what the true nature of the transaction was, it seems to me clear that the plaintiffs have not got an absolute assignment of the debt. It is to be noted, moreover, that the defendants did not assent to the request.

For the reasons I have given I have come to the conclusion that the document relied on by the plaintiffs does not fulfil the conditions of the section, and the plaintiffs therefore are unable to maintain this action.

During the argument several cases were cited on each side, and with regard to them they no doubt were useful in so far as they indicate the principle on which any particular case should be decided, but to a great extent the decision in each case must depend on the particular circumstances under which the question arises. In Harding v. Harding Wills, J., did undoubtedly express an opinion that the document in question there was an absolute assignment within the section. In that case the decision turned very much on the words in the letter "I hereby instruct the trustees in power to pay," but the real ground of that decision seems to me to be this—that the defendants (the trustees) had assented to the direction to pay the money to the plaintiffs, and were, therefore, bound so to pay it, on equitable principles, apart altogether from section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873. Ex parte Hall, 27 W. R. 385, 10 Ch. D. 615, was another authority cited, where a letter written by the landowner authorizing the tenant of his farm to pay rent to certain bankers from whom the former had borrowed £200, was held to be a revocable assignment, which was in fact revoked by the bankruptcy of the landowner. The decision in that case really seems to have turned on the fact that the transaction related to an interest in land, and so came within the Statute of Frauds. It is doubtful, therefore, if that case can be treated as anything more than an illustration of the principles that govern cases of this kind; and we ought not to treat it as an authority that the words "I hereby authorize and request you to pay" could or could not in other circumstances amount to an assignment within the Judicature Act. Those two cases are not therefore authorities covering the present case. Mr. Loehnis has also satisfied me that the doubt which Chitty, J., expressed in Durham Brothers v. Robertson, [1898] 1 Q. B., at pp. 773, 774, as to Lord Coleridge's decision in Brice v. Bannister, 26 W. R. 670, 3 Q. B. D. 569, which was cited also in Ex parte Hall, was not so much that the language employed in Brice v. Bannister could not amount to an assignment, as that the assignment, if any, being the assignment of a part of the debt only, could not come within the statute. If the view I have taken in the present case is correct it is unnecessary to decide the question of notice to the defendants, but while resting my decision of the other ground, I confess that I should have felt some difficulty in overruling the decision of my brother Walton, who held that the notice was in this case a good notice.

COLLINS, M.R.—It is with some hesitancy and with very great diffidence that I have come to the conclusion that the decision of Walton, J., in this case must be reversed. My lord has covered all the ground, and it is only in reference to the main point—namely, as to whether this was an absolute assignment, that I desire to add anything to what has been already said.

The conclusion I have come to is that the words in this document do not fulfil the requirements of section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873. On the face of the document itself there is no absolute assignment. On the face of it there is merely a request from Kramrisch & Co., addressed to the defendants, asking them to make an agreement with the plaintiffs whereby they were to pay to the plaintiffs a sum of money which would otherwise have been payable by the defendants to Kramrisch & Co. but for the suggested arrangement. I fail to see how that suggestion itself amounts to an assignment. No doubt the document may presuppose an arrangement between the plaintiffs and Kramrisch & Co. as to the moneys payable by the defendants, to be carried out by means of the letter which the defendants were requested to sign, but I fail to get from the document itself an absolute assignment of the debt to the plaintiffs. Much during the argument was addressed to us on the word "confirm," and I agree that it is a word that is often employed not in its strict sense. But read with the context here it seems to me that it was used in its strict sense, and that all that Kramrisch & Co. "confirmed" was the first part of the document, which was a request merely that the defendants should "sign the attached letter and forward the same to Messrs. Brandts, Sons, & Co." The letter was in the form of a proposed undertaking by the defendants to pay the plaintiffs direct for account of Kramrisch & Co., and it contained an invitation to the defendants to confirm some arrangement by which they would have become liable by contract to pay this money to the plaintiffs. Where was there any absolute assignment in writing of the debt on the face of the document? For my part I can see none. Then they were invited to collect it from the surrounding circumstances. But when those surrounding circumstances are looked into, and when all the correspondence that has been put in is considered, it seems to me only to show that there had been an arrangement previously made between the plaintiffs and Kramrisch & Co., by which a lien is given by Kramrisch & Co. to the plaintiffs on certain documents and on the debt due from the defendants. The document of the 6th of January is primâ facie more consistent with such an arrangement in the nature of a lien than with an absolute assignment. If there had been an absolute assignment in writing there would have been no necessity to suggest making any such contract as is suggested in that document. Indeed, it seems to me clear that the words "for account of Messrs. Kramrisch & Co." point to there being some retention of interest by Kramrisch & Co. in the debt incompatible with an absolute assignment of it. For these reasons I agree with the judgment delivered by my lord.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. The question is whether the document relied on by the plaintiffs constituted in itself an assignment of the debt and notice of that assignment to the defendants. In using the word "assignment," I include for the present purpose an equitable assignment, not within section 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873. There is no doubt considerable difficulty in construing the document in this case, and none the less so because we are bound to confine our attention to the terms of the document itself, and not bring into consideration the relations between the plaintiffs and Kramrisch & Co., which were not disclosed by the document, and were not known to the defendants. The document on its face appears, at any rate in terms, merely to import a request by Kramrisch & Co. to the defendants that they should bind themselves to pay to the plaintiffs the debt which they owed to Kramrisch & Co. It states no reason why Kramrisch & Co. or the plaintiffs should make such a request or indicate the nature of the relations between Kramrisch & Co. and the plaintiffs, except so far as to show that the plaintiffs were to receive the moneys remitted to them "for account of Kramrisch & Co." There is no mention or suggestion of any charge on or assignment of the debt. I do not think that the defendants were bound to speculate as to what the relations were between Kramrisch & Co. and the plaintiffs, or why they wished the defendants to sign the document put before them. The defendants were not bound to sign that document; and I ask myself the question whether it was in such terms that they were bound to assume, if they did not sign it, that Kramrisch & Co. had in that condition of affairs given them a clear mandate to pay the amount to the plaintiffs, which they could not afterwards revoke. It does not appear to me that it was, and although the case is not free from difficulty to my mind, I do not think the defendants were bound to regard the document itself as being an assignment of the debt or as giving notice of the existence of such an assignment.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

Solicitors for the defendants, John B. & F. Purchase.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 11.

BLOVETT v. SAWYER. (a.)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—Employment—Bricklayer paid so much an hour—Accident during dinner hour—Workman permitted to remain on premises—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 1, sub-section 1.

A workman employed on a building which exceeded thirty feet in height was paid by the hour for the number of hours per week that he was actually engaged on his work, not including the midday dinner hour. The workman, without being under any obligation to do so, remained on the premises during the dinner hour, and was eating his dinner under a wall which he had been building when the wall was blown down and he was injured.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment within section 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the dinner hour not causing a break in the workman's employment with his master.

Appeal by the applicant from the refusal of the judge of the North Shields County Court to award him compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of injuries caused to him by an accident.

The applicant was a bricklayer in the employ of the defendant, and was engaged on the day the accident happened on a building over thirty feet high. He left his work at noon for dinner, having an hour off for this purpose. It was admitted that it was open to him either to stay upon the premises for his dinner or to go away and have it elsewhere. However, on this particular day it was very wet and windy, so he and some of the other men decided to stay, and sat down under the lee of the wall of the building on which the applicant was engaged. He was just about to commence his dinner when part of the wall fell, and he was seriously injured.

The only evidence upon the judge's note as to the wages of the applicant was that he received about £2 per week, but on the arguments of the appeal it was stated that admissions were made at the hearing that he was paid weekly at a fixed rate per hour for the hours that he had worked, and that the dinner hour was excluded in calculating the number of hours for which he received pay.

The county court judge expressed the opinion that, as the applicant had sat down under the wall for the purpose of eating his dinner, the accident did not arise either out of and in the course of his employment, and he dismissed the application.

The applicant appealed.

Ruegg, K.C., and Chester Jones (Harold Morris with them), in support of the appeal.—The workman is entitled to compensation in this case for the necessary hour off work for dinner does not constitute a break in the day's employment. To hold that it did would be to take too narrow a view of the Act as laid down repeatedly in this court. The continuation of employment after work has actually ceased is illustrated by Brydon v. Stewart, (1855) 2 Macq. 30, and Cowler v. Moresby Coal Co., (1885) 1 Times L. R. 575. These cases show that if a man is either on his way to or from work when he meets with an accident he is entitled to compensation, and it cannot logically be argued, therefore, that an accident happening to the workman during the dinner hour, which time, although included in the man's day, was not paid for, is not within the scheme of the Act.

Meynell, for the employer.—As the man was paid by the hour, and not by the week, he could have been dismissed at any moment. The onus, therefore, is on the applicant to show that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment. When the accident happened he not only was not being paid, but he was doing something entirely for his own benefit, and the master is not liable, for the employment had for the dinner interval ended: Smith v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, 47 W. R. 146, [1899] 1 Q. B. 141; Armitage v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., [1902] 2 K. B. 178, 50 W. R. Dig. 112; and Lowe v. Pearson, 47 W. R. 193, [1899] 1 Q. B. 261.

Ruegg, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. We are told that the applicant was a bricklayer who was paid so much an hour, although that does not appear from the judge's notes. The evidence only stated was that he was receiving about £2 a week. He was at liberty either to go away during the dinner hour or to stay on the premises. He stayed, and sat down under a wall on which he had been at work, for the purpose of eating his dinner, when the wall fell, and he was injured. The county court judge gave judgment in a few words. He said, "I was of opinion that as the applicant had sat down for the purpose of eating his dinner when the accident happened, the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment, and therefore dismissed the application." On the evidence as it stands on the judge's notes I should not have felt any difficulty in coming to a conclusion, because it would appear primâ facie to indicate that the man was in his master's employment during the whole of each day from the time that he went to his work to the time when he came away, and equally during the dinner hour, if he stayed, as during any other part of the time. In my opinion the time of employment embraces all the time occupied in coming, going, and stopping for any purpose ancillary to the applicant's work. But we are told that there were admissions made between the parties which do not appear on the judge's notes; that men in the position of the applicant were not paid by the day or week, but the hour, and that the dinner hour was excluded from the computation of his wages, and was not a time during which he was earning pay. That creates a difficulty, or at all events requires consideration. It seems to me, however, that if the dinner hour can be brought in as part of the time which is given by the workman for some purpose ancillary to his work, such as feeding himself, which, of course, is essential to enable him to do his work, it would be taking too technical a view to say that the pause in the actual course of his work for this purpose was a break in his employment from the time that he stopped work to the time when he began again. Therefore, notwithstanding the fact that the applicant was paid by the hour, and the dinner hour was excluded, we must take a broader view and treat the dinner hour as part of the time of employment. A workman would do his work all the better by taking his meal at that time, and if it is part of the contract between him and his master that he may do so upon the works instead of going away, that may very well be a matter of mutual convenience. From the mere fact that he was not paid for this particular time, and that he was not engaged in the main purpose of his work, it cannot as a matter of law be said that he had ceased to be in the employment of his master. On the other hand, the accident to the applicant can, as it seems to me, be properly said to have arisen out of and in the course of his employment, and that being so, the appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., gave judgment to the same effect.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Shaen, Roscoe, Massey, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Busk, Mellor, & Norris, for C. J. R. Brown & Holliday, North Shields.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Kekewich, J. } Feb. 23.

In re HOUGHTON.
HAWLEY v. BLAKE. (a.)

Executor—Power to compromise claim of co-executor—"Compromise"—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 21—Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3.

The power of an executor to compromise claims against his testator's estate extends—in a proper case—to claims made by a co-executor, and where such a claim has been allowed by an executor acting honestly and reasonably the transaction is valid and binding on the residuary legatees.

Adjourned summons.

Charles Houghton, by his will made in 1889, gave the income of his residuary estate to his wife Esther for life, and directed that after her death such estate should be realized, and the proceeds divided among his nephews and nieces, and he appointed his wife, the defendant John S. Blake (a nephew of the wife), and the defendant F. Houghton executors of his will.

The testator died in 1894, and his will was proved by the widow and the defendant Blake, power being reserved to the defendant Houghton.

The widow died on the 7th of June, 1902, having appointed the defendant Blake her sole executor.

This was a summons by the residuary legatees under Charles Houghton's will, seeking to charge the defendant Blake with (in effect) the amount of a claim allowed by him under the circumstances mentioned below.

Soon after Charles Houghton's death, and before probate, the defendant Blake and the widow, Esther Houghton, had an interview with reference to the estate, and Mrs. Houghton produced certain securities from an iron safe, but stated that in fact some of such securities represented her own money up to a sum of £1,180, and that it had come to her partly from her father and partly from her mother, and she produced a memorandum of four items equalling the sum of £1,180.

The defendant Blake thereupon consulted the solicitors who were acting in the administration of the estate upon the matter, and made inquiries also of the family, and certain receipts were shown to him evidencing Mrs. Houghton's statement, although as to part of the money there was no evidence that she was entitled for her separate use, so as to gain a title as against her husband and his estate. In these circumstances the defendant Blake raised no objection to the widow's claim, and allowed her to retain securities sufficient to cover the amount.

In May, 1903, the defendant Blake delivered to the residuary legatees a cash account of the administration of the estate showing an entry on the credit side in this form:

"April 1.—Shares, &c., allocated to Mrs. Houghton in discharge of moneys belonging to her separate estate and lent to the deceased, £1,180."

The residuary legatees declined to recognize the validity of this allowance, and asked by the present summons for an inquiry what amount (if any) was owing to Mrs. Houghton by the deceased, and for an order upon the defendant Blake, as executor of Mrs. Houghton (in effect), to pay or transfer the moneys and securities retained by Mrs. Houghton to the joint names of himself and the defendant F. Houghton as part of the residue of Charles Houghton, and for the administration (if necessary) of Mrs. Houghton's estate for that purpose.

As to £820, part of the £1,180, the court was satisfied that Mrs. Houghton was entitled for her separate use, but as to the balance there was no evidence of title as against the husband, and the solicitor who was consulted by the defendant Blake was dead.

C. James, for the plaintiffs, the residuary legatees.—There is no decision to the effect that an executor can compromise a claim by his co-executor. I rely on De Cordova v. De Cordova, L. R. 4 A. C. 692, 27 W. R. Dig. 83; in this case as in that the alleged compromise was unfair and prejudicial to the estate. It is impossible for an executor to exercise an independent judgment in such circumstances.

Warrington, K.C., and T. Ribton, for the defendant Blake.—The defendant relies on section 21 of the Trustee Act, 1838, and the fact that he had in the circumstances acted "honestly and reasonably" within section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896.

KEKEWICH, J., stated the facts as above set forth and continued as follows: The question is whether John S. Blake, as one of the executors of Charles Houghton, could compromise this claim by the other executor, Esther Houghton, by allowing it in full. I use the word "compromise" advisedly. In one sense it was not a compromise since there was no give and take, Mrs. Houghton simply taking all that she claimed. On the other hand, she had possession of the securities, which could only be obtained from her by discussion and perhaps litigation. It was entirely for those representing the estate to say whether there should be litigation with delay and expense, or whether the claim should be acceded to. That is a compromise. Very little was given up, but there was reason in the transaction, when the avoidance of litigation was in view. I think, therefore, that, if honest, it was a compromise. About the honesty there is no doubt. No imputation has been made on the honesty either of J. S. Blake or of Mrs. Houghton. Therefore I come to the question whether it was competent to J. S. Blake to admit the claim of his co-executrix, she being the widow of the testator. The latter fact seems to me to make no difference; she was not a stranger as regarded his estate, but she was a stranger as to the claim and the compromise of it, notwithstanding that she was also co-executrix. So that the bare question is whether one of two executors can make a compromise with the other. Very large powers of compromising are given to an executor by the common law, and he has also statutory authority, though that in reality adds nothing to the common law powers which have been recognized again and again. Executors are seised of their office per mie et per tout; each of them represents the estate for all purposes. I think I should be infringing that rule if I were to say that one executor could not compromise the claim of another. The position, however, is a delicate one, and an executor in that position would do well to apply to the court for direction as to whether he is at liberty to make the compromise. But, under the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, I should have to consider whether he "acted honestly and reasonably and ought fairly to be excused for the breach of trust and for omitting to obtain the directions of the court in the matter in which he committed such breach." Upon the latter point I cannot form an opinion. I cannot say whether he ought to have applied to the court, but I have no doubt that he acted honestly and reasonably. Therefore, whether I take this case simply on his powers as executor or whether I take only the last statute to which I have referred, it seems to me that I must uphold this executor as having done what is right.

(a.) Reported by ALAN C. NESBITT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Clarke, Rawlins, & Co., for Percival & Sons, Peterborough; Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Senior & Furbank, Richmond.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } April 21, 22.

In re THE LEEDS AND HANLEY THEATRES OF VARIETIES (LIMITED).

Ex parte THE CONSOLIDATED EXPLORATION AND FINANCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding-up—Damages owed company for misfeasance—Debenture debt owed by company—Cross-claims—Set off—Proper administration of assets.

T. Co. was promoted by F. Co., and was in liquidation. T. Co. owed F. Co. £5,100 upon a debenture. It was owed by F. Co., which was also in liquidation, £4,323 under the following circumstances: F. Co. had been held liable to pay T. Co. £12,000 as damages for misfeasance, and, having at the time no other creditors, it was ordered to pay, and did pay, all its assets, which amounted to £7,677, to T. Co., without prejudice to its rights to prove in the liquidation of that company. Subsequently other persons established claims against F. Co. The liquidator of T. Co. out of this £7,677 distributed about £3,900 among its creditors other than F. Co. as a dividend of 16s. 8d. in the £, but refused to pay any dividend to F. Co. until that company had paid it the £4,323 still owing of the £12,000.

Held, that until the dividend due to the F. Co. exceeded the £4,323 owing by it, no dividend was payable to it, and that the proper way of administering the assets of the T. Co. was notionally to add the £4,323 to its assets, and, calculating the dividends upon that total sum, only pay the F. Co. the excess (if any) of the dividend thus appearing due to it over the £4,323.

Summons.

This was a summons in the winding up of the above company by the liquidator of the Consolidated Exploration and Finance Co. (Limited), and involved a consideration of the proper method of administering the assets of a company in liquidation in respect of the claims of a creditor of the company who was at the same time liable to the company for a sum of money awarded as damages or compensation in proceedings against him for misfeasance in connection with the company.

The Leeds and Hanley Theatres of Varieties (Limited) was incorporated in February, 1897, and was promoted by the Consolidated Exploration and Finance Co. (Limited). At the trial the former company was spoken of as the "Theatres Co.," and the latter as the "Finance Co."; and these terms will be adopted in this report.

In November, 1898, the Finance Co. went into voluntary liquidation.

In November, 1899, an order was made for the compulsory winding up of the Theatres Co. At this time the Theatres Co. owed the Finance Co. a sum of money due upon the security of a debenture of the 19th of February, 1897. This sum, with interest and certain costs, amounted to £5,100 11s. 2d., and this amount was subsequently, under an order made in April, 1903, proved for by the Finance Co. in the winding up of the Theatres Co. This debt was the only one subsisting between the two companies.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Subsequent legal proceedings (reported in In re Leeds and Hanley Theatre of Varieties (Limited), 51 W. R. 5, [1902] 2 Ch. 809) were taken which resulted in an order of Wright, J., in July, 1901, and of the Court of Appeal in July, 1902, under which the Finance Co. were held liable for misfeasance, and were ordered to pay to the Theatres Co. £12,000.

In August, 1902, all the proving creditors of the Finance Co. had been paid, with the exception of the Theatres Co., and the Finance Co. had remaining assets to the amount of £7,677.

On the 26th of August, 1902, an order was made in the winding up of the Finance Co., and under that order, the liquidator of that company paid to the Theatres Co., or to its liquidator, this sum of £7,677, the liquidator of the latter company undertaking to set aside thereout £1,000 to provide for any claim for costs of the winding up of the Finance Co. But this order was expressly made without prejudice to any rights which the Finance Co. might have to prove in the liquidation of the Theatres Co.

In February, 1903, actions were commenced by certain shareholders in the Theatres Co. against the Finance Co. for misrepresentation in the prospectus of the Theatres Co., and under orders made in these actions in July and August of that year the Finance Co. became liable to pay sums amounting to £5,490 and interest to these persons.

The liquidator of the Theatres Co. had distributed out of the assets of the company among its creditors, other than the Finance Co., the sum of £3,905 5s. 10d., being a dividend after the rate of 16s. 8d. in the £ upon their claims. There was, at the date of the last account in November, 1903, the sum of £3,028 18s. 3d. standing to the credit of the Theatres Co. in the books of the Board of Trade.

Under these circumstances, the liquidator of the Theatres Co. claimed to set off the difference between the sum of £12,000 ordered to be paid him by the Finance Co., and the sum of £7,677 actually paid against all dividends otherwise payable to the Finance Co. in respect of the debt of £5,100 owed to this company by the Theatres Co., and he refused to pay any dividend to the liquidator of the Finance Co.

The latter thereupon took out this summons asking for a declaration that the liquidator of the Theatres Co. was not entitled to retain or make any set off against the dividend due to the applicant in respect of his claim under the debenture issued by the Theatres Co. of the 19th of February, 1897, and for an order that the liquidator of the Theatres Co. should pay the dividend to him, and should repay to him (the applicant) the sum by which the amount received by the liquidator of the Theatres Co., under the order of the Court of Appeal of July, 1902, exceeded the dividend on the £12,000 pro rata with the other creditors of the Finance Co. on the balance of the account between that company and the Theatres Co.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Martelli, for the Finance Co.—The Theatres Co. have no right to set off the remainder of the £12,000 ordered to be paid to them as damages or compensation in misfeasance proceedings, against the dividends due from them to the Finance Co. upon their debenture debt: In re Anglo-French Co-operative Society, Ex parte Pelly, 31 W. R. 177, 21 Ch. D. 492, In re Exchange Banking Co., 31 W. R. 174, 21 Ch. D. 519; In re Goy & Co. (Limited), 48 W. R. 425, [1900] 2 Ch. 149. The saving clause in the order of the 26th of August, 1902, was intended to prevent the payment of the £12,000 prejudicing the creditors of the Finance Co. It was never intended by that order that the creditors of the Theatres Co. should be paid in full before the creditors of the Finance Co. could receive anything at all. The rights of the creditors of the two companies must be considered upon the footing that the £7,677 had not been paid.

Younger, K.C., and C. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the Theatres Co.—The Finance Co. cannot claim to participate in the assets of the Theatres Co. until they have contributed to those assets the whole of the debt they owe to the Theatres Co.: see Cotton, L.J., in 32 W. R. 601, In re Milan Tramways Co., Ex parte Theys, 25 Ch. D., p. 593.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 22. — BUCKLEY, J. — As between the £5,100 11s. 2d. owed by the Theatres Co., and the £12,000 ordered to be paid by the Finance Co. there could be no set off. There was no mutual credit. That there is no set off is plain from In re Anglo-French Co-operative Society, Ex parte Pelly. In that state of facts in August, 1902, the winding up of the Finance Co. had proceeded to a point at which all proving creditors of the Finance Co. had been paid, with the exception of the Theatres Co., which had just established its right to the £12,000, and the Finance Co. had assets to the amount of £7,677 remaining to be disposed of. Under the order of August, 1902, the liquidator of the Finance Co. paid the Theatres Co., or its liquidator, the £7,677, the liquidator of the Theatres Co. undertaking to set aside £1,000 for costs of the Finance Co. But this order was to be without prejudice to any rights, of the Finance Co. to prove in the liquidation of the Theatres Co. In other words, there being, so far as was known, no creditor at all of the Finance Co. other than this creditor, the Theatres Co., all the remaining assets of the Finance Co. were handed over to the Theatres Co. upon the terms that the costs of the winding up of the Finance Co. so far as not provided for should be provided for, but it was to remain open to the Finance Co. to say that the Theatres Co. was still its debtors. Now, the Finance Co. did say that, and were creditors of the Theatres Co. for £5,100 11s. 2d. After 1902 there turned up other creditors of the Finance Co., whose total debts amounted to £5,490. They were people who established rights for misrepresentation or misfeasance, or something of that kind. I have, therefore, a Finance Co. which has no assets at all, but which has now some new creditors—I mean new in this sense, that they came in after all its assets have been disposed of in the way that I have described. Of course they cannot disturb prior dividends, or prior payments, but they are people who would be entitled if the Finance Co. had any money—which it has not—to have a claim to dividends; just as the Theatres Co. had before the Theatres Co. could get anything more. That is the position in which the Finance Co. is placed. In the liquidation of the Theatres Co. the position is this, that they have got the funds. There is a cash sum of a little over £600. There is the £7,677 which they have received under an order of August, 1902. And they have this further asset, they are entitled, as against the Finance Co., to get, if they can, the balance of their debt of £12,000, that is, £12,000 less £7,677, which seems to be £4,323. The assets side of the Theatre Co.'s balance-sheet for the moment is £600 odd, and £7,677 received from the Finance Co., and the right to prove against the Finance Co. for £4,323. On the other side of the balance-sheet their liabilities are a liability to the Finance Co. of £5,100 11s. 2d. and £4,685 3s. 1d. to other people who have proved in the Theatres Co. liquidation. The question is, how the fund ought to be administered. What I have said is not quite accurate in this sense, that the Theatres Co. have paid out of the £7,677 to these other creditors for £4,685 3s. 1d. the sum of £3,905 5s. 10d. as being dividends of 16s. 8d. in the £, but that payment does not affect the principle upon which the balance should be dealt with.

Now what is the proper way to administer the fund? In my opinion what I have to do is this. I am administering the assets of the Theatres Co. There is a person — namely, the Finance Co.—who is both a debtor to the fund to be administered and a claimant against it. I think that that person cannot come and say that he is entitled to a dividend out of the fund until he has first made complete the fund out of which he says he is entitled to a dividend. I think the observation of Cotton, L.J., in In re Milan Tramways Co., Ex parte Theys, 21 Ch. D., p. 593, applies: "The appellant also relied on this, that the company could say to Hütter, 'You shall not receive anything from the assets till you have paid what you owe us.' Probably the company could effectually say so." Applying these words to this case, it means that the Theatres Co. can say to the Finance Co., "You shall not receive anything from our assets until you pay what you owe to our fund." In point of fact, of course, the Finance Co. cannot pay what it owes to the Theatres Co. because it has no money, and the only question is whether it can get anything out of its proof against the Theatres Co. The proper administration, in my judgment, therefore is this. Notionally, treat the Finance Co. as having paid the £4,323 to the Theatres Co. Take the sum thus arrived at and apply it in payment of a dividend upon all the debts of the Theatres Co.—that is to say, the £5,100 due to the Finance Co. and the £4,685 due to other people. That will thus attribute to the Finance Co. a certain sum. If that sum should be greater than the £4,323 which the Finance Co. owes, the Finance Co. will get the difference. If it be less or equal, the Finance Co. will receive nothing. If the dividend arrived at in that way on the £4,685 cannot be satisfied in full—because, of course, the notional sum is not really paid—then the creditors for the £4,685 would take the whole of the assets of the Theatres Co., as they would be less than the notional dividend calculated upon the footing that the Finance Co. have paid that which it in fact has not paid. I believe, however, that in fact the figures will work out the other way when the notional payment has been treated as made, and that there will be enough to answer the £4,323, and that the result will be that the £4,685 will be satisfied.

Solicitors for the liquidator of the Finance Co., Walls & Stallard.

Solicitor for the liquidator of the Theatres Co., G. B. W. Digby.

Chan. Div. } Joyce, J. } Feb. 6.

ASHWORTH v. ENGLISH CARD CLOTHING CO. (LIMITED) (No. 1). (a.)

Practice—Costs—Taxation—Inspection of property the subject of the action—Inspection without an order—Taxing-master's discretion—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 50, r. 3.

The fact that an inspection of property, the subject-matter of an action, has been carried out by an arrangement between the solicitors of the parties and not in pursuance of an order under ord. 50, r. 3, is not of itself sufficient reason why the costs of such inspection should be disallowed.

(a.) Reported by ALAN C. NESBITT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Adjourned summons.

An action for infringement of the plaintiff's patent was dismissed on the ground that the patent was invalid for want of subject-matter and that infringement was not proved.

In taxing defendants' costs the taxing-master disallowed fees to counsel and an expert for inspecting certain machinery involved in the patent, the inspection having been arranged by agreement between the respective solicitors in order to avoid the expense of an order under ord. 50, r. 3. In answer to defendants' objections the taxing-master said that, considering the nature of the action, an inspection was in itself reasonable and proper, but that in the absence of agreement between the parties themselves, he could not properly allow the costs of the inspection of property, the subject of an action, against the unsuccessful party unless an order had been made and the costs either expressly given under the order or made costs in the action. He referred to Mitchell v. Darley Colliery Co., 31 W. R. 549, 10 Q. B. D. 457, and said that it had never been the practice of the taxing-master to allow such costs without an express direction.

This summons was by the defendants to review the taxation.

Younger, K.C., and A. J. Walter, for the summons.

Terrell, K.C., and J. C. Graham, for the plaintiff.

JOYCE, J.—The inspection is found and also admitted to be necessary and proper, and I think it would be the worst possible precedent if the costs of it were disallowed merely because the inspection was made without an order of the court having been obtained. I therefore allow these costs.

Solicitors for the defendants, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Ramsden, Sykes, & Ramsden, Huddersfield.

Solicitors for plaintiff, W. J. & E. H. Tremellen, for Blair & Seddon, Manchester.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.)

Feb. 29; March 1, 28.

GRAND JUNCTION WATERWORKS CO. (Appellants) v. RODOCANACHI (Respondent). (a.)

Water—Waterworks—Supply of water—Defective communication pipe—Non-repair by occupier of premises—Waste of water—Right to cut off supply—Right to receive supply—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 28, 29, 30, 43, 52—Metropolis Water Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 113), ss. 28, 29, 32.

A communication pipe from the plaintiff company's main pipe to certain stables in the metropolis in the occupation of a servant of the defendant became defective, and thereby there was a leakage and waste of water. The communication pipe was the property of the defendant. The company served notice to repair, and intimated that unless the pipe was repaired they would cut off the supply of water. The defendant failed to repair the pipe, and the plaintiffs cut off the supply. The defendant thereupon preferred an information against the plaintiffs for penalties under section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, for refusing to furnish a supply of water.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to cut off the water and cease to supply the defendant, as the duty to repair a defect in a communication pipe being cast by section 28 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, upon the owner or occupier of the premises, he had, after notice to repair, permitted the pipe to remain in a condition in which it would cause waste of water, and had wrongfully failed to prevent the waste within the meaning of section 32 of the same Act.

This was a case stated by T. D'Eyncourt, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate.

An information was preferred by the respondent against the appellants—the water company—under section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, for refusing, on the 6th of June, 1903, to furnish to the respondent a supply of water for 113, Eastbourne-mews.

Upon the hearing the magistrate convicted the appellants and imposed a penalty of £6, being 40s. a day for three days, and awarded the respondent £12 12s. costs.

The respondent was the lessee of 113, Eastbourne-mews under a lease, by the terms of which the lessor was liable for all internal repairs. No. 113, Eastbourne-mews was a stable with a dwelling-house above, and the dwelling-house was inhabited by two grooms in the respondent's service. Eastbourne-mews is a public street repairable by the local authority, and is within the district of the appellants. The supply to the premises in question was a supply for domestic purposes, and was a constant supply under the provisions of the Metropolis Water Acts, 1852 and 1871.

The notices under section 27 of the Act of 1871 were duly served, and the prescribed fittings were duly provided.

The water rate for the period from the 6th to 10th of June, 1903, was to be taken to have been paid. Before Saturday, the 6th of June, 1903, there were indications in the roadway opposite 113, Eastbourne-mews of the existence of a small leak. Upon that day it became evident from the subsidence of the cobble-stones in the roadway (which was thereby rendered dangerous to vehicles) that the leak was serious; and on an investigation being made by a ganger in the employment of the appellants it was discovered that there was a leak in the communication pipe (which was the property of the respondent) supplying 113, Eastbourne-mews close to the junction of the said pipe with the appellants' main under the roadway. The leak was at the rate of about 1,500 gallons in twenty-four hours. The ganger who opened the ground thereupon served upon the respondent's coachman, who was on the premises, a notice requiring the repair of the said communication pipe to be forthwith undertaken by the respondent, and intimating that otherwise the water would be cut off. The notice was addressed to the occupier of 113, Eastbourne-mews, and was in these terms: "Sir,—Upon opening the ground opposite No. 113, Eastbourne-mews a leakage of water was found to exist from the defective state of your communication pipe, and unless you forthwith repair the same it will be the duty of the company to disconnect such pipe from their main. Immediately after the repair, rendered easy by the ground being now open, the company will reconnect the pipe with their works, and will undertake to fill in and make good the ground upon payment of the expenses incurred thereby, amounting to 15s." The coachman took the notice immediately to the respondent's house, but found that the respondent had left for the city, and would not return for some hours. The coachman then returned and explained this fact to the ganger, and in answer to a suggestion by the latter that he would request the plumber usually employed by the respondent to do the necessary work of repair, stated that he had no authority to order any repairs to be executed to the said pipe. Beyond communicating with his landlady the respondent at no time took any step to have the communication pipe repaired or the waste stopped. The water was thereupon cut off by the company, and it remained cut off till Wednesday, the 10th of June, when the repairs were executed by order of respondent's landlady, and the water was thereupon restored. The soil removed was too wet to be replaced, but the ground was refilled with dry earth by the company by 11.30 on the morning of Saturday, the 6th of June, and it remained filled in until Wednesday, the 10th of June, when, at the request of the respondent's landlady, the roadway was again broken up by the appellants and the repairs were executed by her order. The time occupied in executing the repairs was stated to be about two hours.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It would be necessary to disconnect the supply during the repairs. On the afternoon of Saturday, the 6th of June, the respondent wrote the following letter to the appellants complaining of the cutting off of the water: "Dear Sir,—113, Eastbourne-mews.—I am informed that your men have cut the water off at these stables without notice. As this is illegal, if the water is not on at 10 a.m. on Monday morning my solicitor will take proceedings. I am also writing to the borough authorities. These stables, I may add, belong to 113, Westbourne-terrace, and the owner of that house keeps them in repair.—Yours, &c."

That letter was received by the appellants on the 8th of June, and their secretary replied as follows on the same day: "Dear Sir,—113, Eastbourne-mews.—In reply to your letter of the 6th inst., I have to inform you that the company's men opened to a leakage in the above mews opposite No. 113, and found that the 1¼in. lead pipe supplying these premises was broken. The defective pipe was shown to your coachman, and a notice was also handed to him stating that the company would have no alternative but to disconnect the pipe from their main unless the repair was taken in hand forthwith. This was not done, and accordingly the pipe was disconnected from the company's main. The company cannot permit the pipe to be reconnected to their main until the necessary repairs have been carried out by your plumber.—I am, &c."

It was contended by the appellants (1) that the appellants ought not to be convicted because the respondent was not entitled to a supply of water at the time of the alleged refusal of the appellants to give a supply; (2) that upon the true construction of the Acts of Parliament governing the matter the appellants were entitled to cut off the supply, and were under no obligation to supply water after the communication pipe had been severed until the same had been restored; (3) that the appellants were entitled to disconnect the defective communication pipe from their main and prevent the waste of water, the respondent having wrongfully failed to keep the said pipe in proper repair, and to do what ought to have been done to prevent waste; (4) that the appellants did not on the 6th of June, 1903, or on any other day, refuse to furnish a supply of water within the meaning of section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847; (5) that even if they did refuse they were within the exemptions mentioned or referred to in sections 42 and 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, in that the supply was not given only during necessary repairs; (6) that even assuming the appellants could be properly convicted the maximum penalty which could be imposed was not £6, but only £4, being at the rate of 40s. for the two days which elapsed between the receipt of the respondent's letter of the 6th of June, 1903, demanding a supply and the time when the supply was restored.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended (1) that there was neglect or refusal on the part of the appellants to furnish a supply of water to 113, Eastbourne-mews within the meaning of section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847; (2) that the severing of the pipe was a wrongful act on the part of the appellants, and that the respondent did not by reason of such severance cease to be entitled to a supply of water for his premises; (3) that section 42 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, had no application, and that in any event "necessary repairs" only continued for about two hours on the morning of Wednesday, the 10th of June; (4) that there was no power in the respondent to dig up the public highway, and no liability on the respondent to repair this pipe; (5) that upon the true construction of the Acts of Parliament the appellants could only justify cutting off the supply of water if the conduct of the respondent in failing to repair was either wilful or negligent; (6) that there was no evidence of any wilful wrong or of any negligence on the part of the respondent; (7) that the penalty of £6 was rightly imposed.

The magistrate was of opinion that the respondent's contention was correct, and convicted and fined the appellants.

The questions for the opinion of the court were (1) whether, upon the facts stated, the magistrate had properly convicted the appellants; and (2) whether the magistrate was justified in imposing a penalty of £6.

Macmorran, K.C. (Acland with him), for the appellants.—The company acted within their legal rights in cutting off the supply, and until the respondent had repaired the defect in the communication pipe he was not entitled to demand a supply. The company are therefore not liable to penalties under section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. In Sheffield Waterworks Co. v. Wilkinson, 28 W. R. 241, 4 C. P. D. 410, it was held that the company were not liable to penalties imposed by that section until the tenant had restored the communication with their main pipes. Section 3 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, enacts that the term "fittings" includes, inter alia, communication pipes, and section 28 provides that the owner or occupier of the premises shall keep all fittings in proper repair. The respondent failed to do so. The learned magistrate was therefore wrong in convicting and fining the appellants.

W. Finlay, for the respondent.—The respondent could not lawfully repair the pipe, as the occupier or owner of premises has no statutory authority to break up a street, and in order to repair the pipe in this case it would have been necessary for him to do so. The appellants alone had power to break up the street for the purpose of repairing the communication pipe: Chapman v. Fylde Waterworks Co., 43 W. R. 1, [1894] 2 Q. B. 599. There has, therefore, been no wrongful act on the part of the respondent within the meaning of section 32 of the Act of 1871, and the appellants consequently were not justified in cutting off the water and refusing to furnish a supply. The conviction was right.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 28.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following judgment of the court: This was an appeal from a special case stated by Mr. d'Eyncourt, police magistrate, in a complaint preferred by the respondent against the appellants for refusing to furnish a supply of water, contrary to section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. The case was extremely well argued by Mr. Macmorran on behalf of the appellants, and by Mr. Finlay on behalf of the respondent, and raises a point of general importance. It is not necessary to refer to the facts in detail, as to which there was no dispute and which are clearly set out in the special case; it is sufficient to say that on Saturday, the 6th of June, 1903, a leak having occurred under the roadway opposite 113, Eastbourne-mews, the road was opened and the leak was found to be in the communication pipe, the property of the consumer. Notice was thereupon given to the respondent's coachman, who was occupying the premises which were supplied with water, to repair the pipe, and the notice stated that it would be the duty of the company to disconnect if the pipe was not repaired. The respondent took no steps to repair it, and the water was then cut off by the company. The pipe was subsequently repaired by the appellants at the request of the respondent's landlady. The magistrates convicted the appellants, the water company, and fined them a penalty of £6 for neglecting, or refusing, to supply water in accordance with section 43.

The question we have to consider is whether there was any evidence upon which this conviction can be supported. It must, we think, be taken upon these facts, and, in fact, it was so stated in the course of the argument, that the only refusal to supply the water was by the company's cutting it off upon the 6th of June, and continuing to keep the water cut off until it was again supplied on the 10th. The questions we have to decide are whether in the metropolis, if a leak is found in a pipe belonging to a consumer, the company is entitled to cut off the water until the pipe is restored; and, secondly, does a refusal to supply under the circumstances of the present case constitute an offence under section 43? It is found as a fact in the case, and for reasons which we will state later on, it must be the fact, that the pipe was the property of the consumer—i.e., the owner of the premises let to the respondent. Under section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, if the undertakers, except when prevented, as provided in an earlier section, neglect or refuse to furnish to any owner or occupier entitled under the Waterworks Clauses Act, or the special Act, to receive a supply of water during any part of the time during which the rates for such supply shall have been settled, or tendered, they shall be liable to a penalty. The exception referred to in the earlier words of that section is to be found in the provisions of section 42, and does not, in our opinion, apply. Under section 28 powers are given to the undertakers to open the streets and lay down service pipes and other works for the supply of water; under section 29 they may not enter private property without consent, except in a case which does not apply here, and by section 31, before breaking up the street, they must give certain notices. By section 48 the owner or occupier of any dwelling-house who wishes to have water brought into his premises may open the ground between the pipes of the undertakers and his premises and lay communication pipes, and section 52 empowers such owner or occupier to open or break up the street for such purpose. There are also provisions in sections 44-47 as to the laying of communication pipes by the undertakers which are only material as supporting the view that communication pipes are, under ordinary circumstances, the property of the consumer. The Metropolis Water Act, 1871, contains a group of sections—sections 26-32—which were referred to in argument and require consideration. Under these sections the company may prescribe fittings, which by the interpretation clause, section 3 of the same Act, include communication pipes, and section 28 provides that in the case of a constant supply the owner or occupier of the premises shall provide all supply fittings, and from time to time keep the same in proper repair. Section 29 enables the company, if the fittings are out of order, to give notice requiring the owner or occupier within twenty-four hours to cause the same to be repaired so as the prevent any waste of water, and, if any person fails to comply with the terms of such notice, the company may repair the fittings of such person and may recover the expenses incurred. Section 32 provides that if any person wilfully or negligently causes or suffers any fittings to be out of repair, or to be so used that the water supplied to him is likely to be wasted, he shall be liable to a penalty, and the second paragraph of the same section provides that if any person supplied with water wrongfully fails to do anything which ought to be done for the prevention of waste, the company may cut off any pipes by or through which the water is supplied to such customer, and may cease to supply him with water as long as the cause of injury remains or is not remedied.

It will have been observed that neither the Waterworks Clauses Act nor the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, nor any other Act to which our attention has been called, contains any express provision giving the consumer the right to open the street for the purpose of repairing the pipe, and this we gather from the statement in the special case and from the judgment of the learned police magistrate to be one of the grounds on which he decided against the appellants. It is true that Bramwell, L.J., sitting in the Court of Queen's Bench, expressed the opinion, in the case of the Sheffield Waterworks v. Wilkinson, 4 Q. B. D., at p. 421, that the right to break up the soil followed from the right which the consumer had to lay down fresh pipes for the purpose of obtaining a supply, and it may be that the obligation imposed upon the owner and occupier by section 28 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, to keep the prescribed fittings, which include communication pipes, in proper repair may give the consumer a right to open the road for the purpose of repair. On the other hand, the Court of Appeal, in the case of Chapman v. Fylde Waterworks, [1894] 2 Q. B. 607, expressly decided that the Waterworks Clauses Act gave the consumer no power to open streets for the purpose of repair. In the view, however, we take, this does not seem to us to be conclusive of the case. The question still remains—Is the consumer who, having the opportunity of doing so without opening the street, does not choose to repair his own communication pipe a person entitled to demand a supply of water under section 43? We do not think for the purpose of this question that any distinction can be drawn between owner and occupier. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the duty of repairing the pipe rested with his landlord. The water company have no means of knowing what the contractual relations between the occupier and his landlord are, and, in our opinion, the liability of the company in respect of an offence under section 43 cannot depend upon the relations between the owner and occupier of the premises. No question in this case arises as to the opening of the street. The street was opened by the company; notice was given, and the company offered to reconnect the pipe upon payment of the expenses; they at the same time gave notice that if the pipe was not repaired the water would be cut off. In our opinion the duty to repair the defect in the communication pipe is by section 28 of the Act of 1871 cast upon the owner or occupier. We think that the owner or occupier who, after notice to him that the communication pipe belonging to him is out of repair, permits the pipe to remain in a condition in which it would cause waste of water has wrongfully failed to do something to prevent the waste within the meaning of the second paragraph of section 32 of the Act of 1871, and that under these circumstances the company were entitled to cut off the water and to cease to supply him as long as the injury to the pipe remained unremedied. It might be that the owner or occupier of a house did not wish to continue the supply, or preferred to put in a better, larger, or different communication pipe. The fact that the company could, if they were so minded, have repaired the pipe after twenty-four hours' notice under section 29 does not disentitle them from exercising their rights under section 32, and we therefore think that the owner or occupier who, under such circumstances as the present, will not repair the pipe which causes the waste is not a person entitled to receive a supply of water under section 43. We think the true view to be taken of the facts is that indicated by the court in Young v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co., 69 L. T. 144; and, although no doubt in one sense it may be said that the question is one of fact, we think that the magistrate ought as a matter of law, upon the evidence in this case, to draw the conclusion which we have indicated upon the facts as stated. The appeal will therefore be allowed, with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Bircham & Co.

Solicitors for respondent, Markby, Stewart, & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) Jan. 19.

OLIVER v. CAMBERWELL BOROUGH COUNCIL. (a.)

Metropolis—Public health—Nuisance—Intimation notice threatening proceedings—Repair of sewer in consequence of such notice—Right of owner to recover cost of work from sanitary authority—Voluntary work—Work done under compulsion—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 3, 4.

The plaintiff, the owner of certain premises, was served by the defendants with an intimation notice under section 3 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, of the existence of a nuisance on his premises, and requiring him to abate the same within seven days, failing which the sanitary authority would commence proceedings against him by the service of a statutory notice. The nuisance was specified as a defective "drain." The plaintiff complied with the notice, and during the course of the work it was discovered that the so-called "drain" was in fact a "sewer," which was legally repairable by the defendants. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action to recover from the defendants the money he had expended in complying with their notice.

Held, that the plaintiff could not recover such expenses, because work done in compliance with an intimation notice under section 3 of the above Act, as distinguished from an abatement notice under section 4, must be regarded as work done voluntarily, and not under compulsion.

Thompson and Norris Manufacturing Co. v. Hawes, 59 J. P. 580, followed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of his Honour Judge Emden, sitting at the Lambeth County Court, in favour of the defendant corporation.

The plaintiff in his action sought to recover from the defendants the sum of £17 in respect of the expenses he had incurred in doing certain work necessary to abate a nuisance in an alleged drain under his house in compliance with an intimation notice of the defendants under section 3 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891. In carrying out the work the plaintiff discovered that the alleged defective drain was a defective sewer repairable by the defendants. The plaintiff, however, carried out the work without waiting for a statutory notice under section 4, and then sued the defendants for the recovery of the expenses on the ground that he was, by the notice, compelled by the local authority to execute works which the local authority were legally compellable to do.

The defendants disputed the claim on the ground that the plaintiff had done the work voluntarily and not under compulsion.

The learned county court judge gave judgment for the defendants, holding that work done in compliance with an intimation notice under section 3 of the Act, as distinguished from an abatement notice under section 4, must be regarded as work done voluntarily and not under compulsion.

From this judgment the plaintiff now appealed.

The notice served upon the plaintiff by the officer appointed by the vestry was as follows: "The Vestry of Camberwell. Public Health (London) Act, 1891. Public Health Department, Vestry Hall, Camberwell, S.E. 18th March, 1903. Intimation. To the Owner, 117, High-street, Peckham. Take notice that I, the undersigned, having visited the above premises, find that the nuisances numbered 9, 12, 21, 38, and 40 in the schedule at the back hereof, which are liable to be dealt with summarily, exist thereon. I, therefore, now by this written intimation, make the existence of the said nuisances known to you, as being the person who is required to abate them, and I have to request that the same be abated within the period of seven days. At the end of this time I shall again visit the premises, and if the necessary works have not then been completed, the vestry, as the sanitary authority for the parish, will commence proceedings against you by the service of a statutory notice. (Signed) E. Home, the officer appointed by the vestry of the said parish to take proceedings under the above-named Act."

The Public Health (London) Act, 1891, provides as follows:

Section 3. "Information of a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily under this Act in the district of a sanitary authority may be given to that authority by any person, and it shall be the duty of every officer of that authority and of every relieving officer, in accordance with the regulations of the authority having control over him, to give that information; and it shall be the duty of the said authority to make the said regulations, and also the duty of the sanitary authority to give such directions to their officers as will secure the existence of the nuisance being immediately brought to the notice of any person who may be required to abate it, and the officer shall do so by serving a written intimation."

Section 4. "(1) On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily under this Act the sanitary authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or if such person cannot be found, on the occupier or owner of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the same within the time specified in the notice, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose, and, if the sanitary authority think it desirable (but not otherwise) specifying any works to be executed."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Naldrett, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff was entitled to recover the costs he had incurred in complying with the notice. He did under compulsion the work which the defendants were legally compellable to do. A notice under section 4 compels the person upon whom it is served to carry out the work necessary to abate the nuisance: Andrew v. St. Olaves, 46 W. R. 424, [1898] 1 Q. B. 775. A notice under section 3 is equally compulsory. In North v. Walthamstow Urban District Council, 62 J. P. 836, the plaintiff in compliance with a notice to abate a nuisance served upon him by the sanitary inspector did certain repairs to what he believed to be a drain, but which turned out to be a sewer repairable by the defendants, and Channell, J., there held that the plaintiff had done the work under pressure, and though the notice under which he acted was not a statutory notice with which he was bound to comply, there was sufficient compulsion to entitle him to recover from the defendants the expenses he had incurred. The plaintiffs in the present case are, therefore, entitled to succeed.

Courthope-Munroe, for the defendants.—The plaintiff in this case cannot recover the expenses incurred by him in doing the work. There is direct authority for this contention. In Thompson and Norris Manufacturing Co. v. Hawes and Another, 59 J. P. 580, the plaintiffs, who were the lessees and occupiers of premises owned by the defendants, received from the vestry a notice addressed to the "owner" requiring them to abate a nuisance on the premises, warning them that unless this was done within a certain time the statutory steps would be taken. The plaintiffs, without forwarding the notice to the defendants, or communicating with them in any way, forthwith executed the repairs necessary to abate the nuisance. The Court of Appeal (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby L.JJ.) there held that the plaintiffs, being not legally compellable to execute the repairs, were not entitled to recover the costs of them in an action for money paid on behalf of the defendants. Lindley, L.J., in giving judgment, said: "It is obvious upon the face of the notice that it was not a formal notice, for in it is a reference to the statutory proceedings which will follow if its requirements are not complied with. This notice was, therefore, not the first step in the hostile proceedings under the Act, but it was a warning notice, an intimation that if certain things were not done within a certain time hostile proceedings would be commenced." Then a little lower down, having pointed out that they should have sent the notice to the owners but did not do so, and that they began to execute the repairs, his lordship continues: "And even if we assume that no more was done than was necessary, still the fact remains that the plaintiffs did this for their own convenience, expecting to be reimbursed." That decision is binding on this court.

The following cases were also referred to: Proctor v. Islington Borough Council, 62 J. P. 836; Sillas v. Fulham Borough Council, [1903] 1 K. B. 829; Harris v. Hickman, [1904] 1 K. B. 13; and Ellis v. Bromley Rural District Council, 63 J. P. 711.

Naldrett, in reply.—Thompson's case is distinguishable, as the decision appears to have been given there on another ground, namely, that the plaintiffs, who were only the occupiers of the premises, acted on a notice addressed to the owners of the premises.

WILLS, J.—I confess to giving the decision I am about to give with some reluctance, but I can hardly think that the question is open to us after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Thompson and Norris Manufacturing Co. v. Hawes. It is quite true that that decision does not go entirely upon the point now in question, but the point now in question was distinctly raised, and is distinctly dealt with in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., because there can be no doubt he had before him a notice which was substantially in the same form as the notice in the present case; and he held that a notice under section 3 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, is not equivalent for the purpose of compulsion to a notice under section 4. My brother Wright has twice decided the same thing on the same point; and, although sitting here as a Divisional Court we are not bound by his judgment, still it is an important factor in considering what our judgment ought to be. Inasmuch as these three cases deal with the very point in question in the present case, and there is really no substantial difference of any kind to be drawn between the notices in those cases and the notice which is in question in the present case, I think we are bound to follow those decisions and to say that there was no legal compulsion in this case upon the plaintiff to do the work, and that, therefore, he cannot recover against the defendants.

I give this judgment with great reluctance, and only because I am bound by authority. To my mind a perfectly different view of sections 3 and 4 might have been taken. I think it might very well have been held that a notice under section 3 was intended to be one with which a man might comply if he was so disposed without waiting for a notice under section 4.

Where a person complies with the intimation of the vestry, which they accompany with a threat that they will make it compulsory for him to do the work if he does not do it voluntarily, it seems to me contrary to natural justice that he should stand in a worse position than if he refused to do what they have told him to do, and waits for a further compulsory order. I think the fact has been overlooked that in section 3 there are words which seem to indicate that the notice is something more than a mere intimation, because what is said is that the sanitary authority shall give such direction to their officers as will secure the existence of a nuisance being immediately brought to the notice of any person who may be required to abate it. I think that those words seem to indicate that when he gets the notice he is required to abate it. It seems to me a very thin distinction indeed to say that if a notice is given, such as has been given in the present case, there is less compulsion because the person who receives it is told that if he does not do the work within a week the sanitary authority will take proceedings against him. Counsel for the respondent says "that is only the language of the inspector." I do not agree. An inspector does not use forms of this kind without the knowledge of his employers; and the sanitary authority which give him these forms, and allow him to make use of them, are, I think, legally as well as morally liable for their contents; and if they allow him to sign himself as the officer deputed by them to take proceedings under this Act, and to state that unless the notice be complied with within a week proceedings will be taken without any further decision of the sanitary authority, I think that they must be bound by such a statement, and that the notice must be taken as their notice that they will proceed to make it compulsory. As I say, the distinction is a very thin one and is not one which commends itself to my judgment. I am far more disposed to take the view which was taken by my brother Channell in the case of North v. Walthamstow Urban District Council than I am to take the view taken by my brother Wright, and by Lindley, L.J., in Thompson's case. However, I am bound by the latter authority, and I follow it loyally, but, at the same time, inasmuch as this question will probably be further argued elsewhere, I think there is no objection to my expressing my individual opinion; and I do so the more readily because I think many of the considerations which I have dealt with in the course of this case have not really been before the courts which have dealt with the question.

I think we must therefore dismiss this appeal.

KENNEDY, J.—I have come to the same conclusion, and I wish to add that I join in the expression of my Brother Wills as to his feeling of reluctance in the decision we are compelled to arrive at.

In this case the only point which we have to decide is whether or not the work the plaintiff undertook was or was not voluntarily undertaken by him. If he incurred the expense of this work voluntarily, he cannot, on finding that he need not have gone to the expense of doing the work, and that another person ought to have done it, go to that person and say, "I have paid what you ought to have paid and you must repay me." If, on the other hand, the payment has been made by him, not voluntarily, but under pressure, and under pressure from the very person who ought to have done the work and incurred the expense, then he is without doubt entitled to recover the cost from that other person. Therefore, shortly, the question is whether owing to the fact that the plaintiff did the work after receiving and in consequence of the intimation of the 18th of March, 1903, that is sufficient to deprive the conduct of the plaintiff of its voluntary character.

Now it is obvious from the different decisions that have been given and the different views of the two decisions of my brother Wright, on the one hand, and the decision of my brother Channell, on the other, that the question is not an easy one to answer, and I should feel great difficulty in coming to the conclusion I have been obliged to come to if it had not been for the decision of the Court of Appeal in Thompson and Norris Manufacturing Co. v. Hawes. If my judgment had been unfettered, I should have found it very difficult to say that it really mattered, as regards the voluntariness of what was done by the plaintiff, whether he did it on receiving an intimation in the form in this case or on receiving a notice under section 4 (b). There was no compulsion in the sense of duress or in the sense of having a penalty imposed if he did not comply with the intimation per se; but was not the work done by him, not because he wished to do it for somebody else or for himself, but, because a public authority intimated to him that it was his bounden duty to do it, and that if he did not do it legal proceedings would be taken against him? There is the duty of a citizen to obey, primâ facie, a public authority governing his district, in an urgent matter of public health, which is alleged to be affected by his want of care or his wrong doing in the management of his premises. In a form, recognized by that public authority, an intimation is conveyed to him that if he does not carry out the work required, legal proceedings will be taken against him. Is not the work he does under such an intimation involuntary? While no doubt it is true that the intimation in the present case was under section 3 and not under section 4, there is in each case a notice which emanates from the local authority and is signed, in accordance with the schedule to the Act, by "the officer appointed by the vestry of the parish to take proceedings." I am, however, bound to follow the decision of the Court of Appeal in Thompson's case. It may be that the only report of that case, which is evidently a summarised report, does not fully represent, in their right proportion, the views of the learned Lord Justices. It may be that there was much more stress laid upon the fact that the plaintiffs in that case had taken upon themselves to treat a notice addressed to somebody else as addressed to them, than appears in the report, but I am bound to say, reading that report fairly, and in its natural meaning, that I think that, at any rate, the majority of the court did base their decision upon the distinction between a document served under section 3 as an intimation, and a document consisting of a notice requiring an abatement of a nuisance under section 4, as if the latter would constitute a proceeding a compliance with which, by the person who received it, would be an involuntary act, whereas an intimation under section 3 would leave the person who received it so far free that he could not say he was acting under it, except voluntarily. Therefore, it seems to me, we must decide as my brother Wills has decided, whatever otherwise might have been our view.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Leave given to appeal.

Solicitors for plaintiff, Mead & Sons.

Solicitors for defendants, Marsden & Son.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) — April 19.

GUARDIANS OF WEST HAM UNION v. GUARDIANS OF HOLBEACH UNION. (a.)

Poor law—Settlement—Three years' residence—Child under sixteen—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), ss. 34, 35.

Where a child has, while under the age of sixteen, resided with its parent in a parish for three years in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as render a person irremovable, the child may, on attaining the age of sixteen, claim the benefit of the three years' residence as giving it a settlement in the parish under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 30, [1903] 2 K. B. 627) affirmed.

Reg. v. Elvet, 7 W. R. 586, 2 E. & E. 266, followed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.) on a special case stated under the provisions of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11 (ante, p. 30, [1903] 2 K. B. 627).

On the 3rd of December, 1901, the respondents, the Guardians of Holbeach Union, obtained an order from two justices of the peace for the county of the parts of Holland, Lincolnshire, whereby it was adjudged that the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union, in the county of Essex, was the place of the last legal settlement of George Ernest Neep, aged about two years, a pauper, and it was ordered that the appellants, the Guardians of the West Ham Union, should receive and provide for the said pauper according to law.

Notice of appeal to quarter sessions having been given, this special case was stated for the opinion of the court.

The facts set out in the case were as follows:

George Ernest Neep, hereinafter called the pauper, is the illegitimate child of Emma Neep, and was born in the Holbeach Union Workhouse on the 25th of October, 1899.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Emma Neep, the mother of the pauper, is the illegitimate child of Mary Ann Neep, and was born in the parish of Tilney St. Lawrence, in the Wisbech Union, on the 11th of April, 1879.

Mary Ann Neep married Alfred Frederick Chapman, at Tilney St. Lawrence, on the 23rd of December, 1881.

From the 27th of June, 1890, to the 7th of September, 1893, Alfred Frederick Chapman resided in the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union, with his wife for a term of three years in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would, in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf, render him irremovable therefrom and settled therein.

From the 7th of September, 1893, Alfred Frederick Chapman continued to reside in the parish of West Ham and was in receipt of relief from the West Ham Union until his death on the 8th of September, 1894. His wife, Mary Ann Chapman, resided with him until his death.

From the 8th of September, 1894, Mary Ann Chapman (the widow of Alfred Frederick Chapman and the mother of Emma Neep) continued to reside in the parish of West Ham, and was in receipt of relief from the West Ham Union from the 8th of September, 1894, until the 28th of November, 1895, when she ceased to reside in the West Ham Union. She died in the Poplar Union Infirmary on the 14th of October, 1896.

From the 27th of June, 1890, to the 28th of July, 1893, Emma Neep (the mother of the pauper) resided with Alfred Frederick Chapman and her mother, Mary Ann Chapman, in the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union. On the 28th of July, 1893, she went into service in the Poplar Union, and has since had no settled residence.

Before the justices the appellants affirmed that the settlement of Emma Neep could not be ascertained without inquiring into the derivative settlement of her parent, Mary Ann Chapman, and that she must be deemed to be settled in the parish of Tilney St. Lawrence where she was born.

The respondents affirmed that Emma Neep acquired a legal settlement in the parish of West Ham by reason of the residence therein of Alfred Frederick Chapman and his wife, or by reason of the residence of Emma Neep for upwards of three years prior to the 28th of July, 1893, in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would, in accordance with the provisions of the several statutes in that behalf, render her irremovable therefrom.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the facts above stated, Emma Neep acquired a settlement under the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, sections 34 and 35, in the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union.

The Divisional Court affirmed the order of the justices, being of opinion that Emma Neep acquired a settlement for herself in the West Ham Union by residence therein for three years, under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act.

The Guardians of the West Ham Union appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Montague Lush, K.C., and W. J. Grubbe, for the appellants.—The words "any person" in section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act mean any person who is sui juris. The section does not apply to unemancipated children or married women; unemancipated persons are dealt with by section 35: per Lopes, L.J., in Guardians of Medway Union v. Guardians of Bedminster Union, 36 W. R. 851, 21 Q. B. D. 278. This view was approved of by Lords Watson and Macnaghten when the case was heard before the House of Lords together with Guardians of Reigate Union v. Guardians of Croydon Union and another case, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465. Emma Neep, therefore, having been an unemancipated child during her three years' residence in West Ham, did not acquire a settlement there under section 34. Being a child under the age of sixteen, her only settlement was that of her parent, by virtue of section 35. And, being an illegitimate child, she came within the second clause of that section. The future tense in that clause, "shall retain," means that an illegitimate child is, first, to take the settlement of its mother while it is under sixteen, as if the first clause of the section applied, and then to retain that settlement after the age of sixteen until the child acquires another settlement on its own account. It is not till the child attains the age of sixteen that it becomes a person within the meaning of section 34 capable of acquiring a settlement for itself. Emma Neep, however, never acquired a settlement for herself after she attained the age of sixteen. She therefore came within the third clause of section 35. That clause applies only to children who have attained the age of sixteen. It says, "If any child in this section mentioned"—that is to say, any child whether legitimate or illegitimate—"shall not have acquired a settlement for itself"—that must necessarily refer to a child who is capable of acquiring a settlement for itself; that is to say, a child who is over the age of sixteen—"and it cannot be shown what settlement such child derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born." Here it cannot be shown what settlement Emma Neep derived from her mother, Mary Ann Neep, without inquiring into Mary Ann Neep's derivative settlement. It follows that Emma Neep's settlement must be the parish in which she was born. The cases of Guardians of West Derby Union v. Guardians of Atcham Union, 38 W. R. 361, 24 Q. B. D. 117; Guardians of Mitford and Launditch Union v. Guardians of Wayland Union, 38 W. R. 632, 25 Q. B. D. 164; Overseers of Manchester v. Guardians of Ormskirk Union, 38 W. R. 778, 24 Q. B. D. 678; and Guardians of West Ham Union v. Churchwardens of Bethnal Green, 42 W. R. 573, [1894] A. C. 230, are all authorities in the appellants' favour. Reg. v. Elvet, 7 W. R. 586, 2 E. & E. 266, was before the Divided Parishes Act, and the pauper child in that case had become emancipated, although she was under the age of sixteen, her father and mother both being dead.

Rawlinson, K.C., and C. B. Marriott, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—A somewhat intricate question as to the settlement of a pauper has been presented to us in this case; but it seems to me, after hearing the matter fully argued on the part of the appellants, that it really comes down to a single point. The pauper with whom we have to deal, George Ernest Neep, was born in the Holbeach Union Workhouse in 1899. He was the illegitimate child of Emma Neep, who was herself also an illegitimate child. She was born in the parish of Tilney St. Lawrence. The question is whether Emma Neep acquired a settlement for herself in the parish of West Ham by three years' residence there with her mother while was herself under the age of sixteen years. She lived there for more than three years with her mother and a man named Chapman whom her mother had married. During the three years in question Chapman resided in the parish of West Ham with his wife and her child in such a manner and under such circumstances in each of the years as would render him irremovable therefrom and settled therein. Section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, deals with this state of facts. It is as follows: "Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would, in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf, render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise." In this case Chapman had acquired a settlement in the parish of West Ham under that section. Under the first clause of section 35 his wife took the same settlement. What about the child, Emma Neep? Being an illegitimate child, her case is dealt with by the second clause of section 35, which is as follows: "An illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquires another settlement." The section continues: "If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or being a female, shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born."

If Emma Neep acquired no settlement for herself in West Ham, then, inasmuch as it cannot be shown what settlement she derived from her mother without inquiring into her mother's derivative settlement, it is contended that she must be deemed to be settled in the parish where she was born. But if a settlement other than a derivative settlement can be found for her in West Ham, then the pauper child with whom we have to deal is also settled in West Ham. Now, Emma Neep resided in West Ham for a period of three years in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would by the statutes render her irremovable. But this residence took place before she attained the age of sixteen. The question is whether residence for three years in such a manner and under such circumstances by a person under the age of sixteen is capable of conferring on such person the right of acquiring a settlement mentioned in section 34. The appellants contend that that section does not deal with unemancipated persons or persons under sixteen, but only with persons over the age of sixteen. In my opinion the court is relieved from the necessity of considering the case of a child under sixteen with regard to that section. The question seems to me to have been decided by authority in the case of Reg. v. Inhabitants of Elvet. At the time of that decision the age of emancipation had not yet been fixed at sixteen. In that case the pauper lived with her father until his death, when she was about fourteen years of age. She then continued to live in the same parish until she became chargeable, when an order was made for her removal to a parish where her mother had recently, before and since the father's death, been maintained as a pauper lunatic. This order was quashed by the quarter sessions, and their decision was affirmed by the Court of Queen's Bench. Lord Campbell, C.J., said: "I am of opinion that the pauper, by her residence with her father, acquired the status of irremovability. This status, which the father had acquired before he received relief through his wife, was not taken from him by such subsequent receipt of relief. And at the time that the order for her removal was made the pauper continued irremovable, her mother being then dead." Wightman, J., said: "By her residence with her father the pauper became irremovable, and, as she continued to reside in the respondent township down to the time that the order for her removal was made, and her mother had died before that time, she was then still irremovable." Erle, J., said: "The fact that the father of the pauper received relief after he had acquired the status of irremovability does not appear to me to affect the question. When her father died the pauper had acquired an independent status of irremovability, which she retained down to the time that the order for removal was made." In my opinion Reg. v. Elvet is a clear authority that a person, who while unemancipated resides in a parish for the necessary period, can on emancipation claim that residence as founding a right to a status of irremovability. That case was considered by the House of Lords in Guardians of Reigate Union v. Guardians of Croydon Union, and the two other cases that were heard at the same time. Lord Halsbury, L.C., in dealing with the second of the three cases, said he thought it was concluded by the authority of Lord Campbell, C.J., and Wightman and Erle, JJ., in Reg. v. Elvet, which he would be very sorry to see disturbed. He continued thus: "The pauper had by more than the necessary period of residence acquired a status of irremovability, and so was settled in the parish of Rhydgwern. It is true that during a part of that period she was under sixteen years of age, and it is true that if it be assumed, as it was by the Court of Appeal, that unemancipated residence will not suffice, then she had not accomplished the necessary period of emancipated residence. The statute knows no such distinction. It makes the emancipated and unemancipated equally irremovable; and, if so, the periods of emancipated and unemancipated residence may be put together." Neither Lord Watson nor Lord Macnaghten said anything to the contrary of this. It was suggested on the part of the appellants that the judgment of Lord Watson ought to be treated as being the really authoritative statement of the law, and that the view of Lord Watson on this point was different from that of the Lord Chancellor. But the passage in Lord Watson's judgment on which the appellants rely, when it is read in its context, does not seem to me to show any difference from the view taken by the Lord Chancellor. In one part of his judgment Lord Watson said: "I have been unable to find in section 34 any provision, express or implied, to the effect that an emancipated child claiming a settlement under its provisions is not to have the benefit of residence whilst it was under the age of sixteen." But the appellants point to another part of his judgment which they say is inconsistent with this. Speaking of the third clause of section 35, he said: "The provisions of the clause have, in my opinion, no application to children under the age of sixteen." I do not think that that is inconsistent with the rest of his judgment. He was then referring to an unemancipated person during the period of non-emancipation.

I am of opinion that we have here an unambiguous affirmation by the House of Lords of the principle laid down in Reg. v. Elvet. Applying that principle to the present case, Emma Neep is now entitled to claim the benefit of her three years' residence in West Ham when she was under sixteen as giving her the settlement which section 34 says is to be deemed to be acquired by the residence therein mentioned. The only difference that I can see between Reg. v. Elvet and the present case is that there the pauper continued to reside in the parish for some time after her father's death, and it may be that she would then be deemed to have been emancipated. But in my opinion the principle of Reg. v. Elvet governs this case, and Emma Neep's status, acquired under section 34 by residence while she was under sixteen, became good on her attaining the age of sixteen. The judgment of the Divisional Court will therefore be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of opinion that the appeal fails. I think that this case is governed by the second of the three cases heard together in the House of Lords, Guardians of Highworth and Swindon Union v. Guardians of Westbury-on-Severn Union, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465. That was a decision that a child after emancipation may claim to have acquired a settlement in a parish under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act by residence therein under the circumstances mentioned in the section, though the child was during a portion of that residence under the age of sixteen. The Lord Chancellor says expressly that the statute knows no distinction between emancipated and unemancipated residence. The other learned lords do not differ, and they all treat Reg. v. Elvet as an authority on which the case should be decided.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellants, F. E. Hilleary.

Solicitors for the respondents, Callard & Vulliamy, for Richard P. Mossop, Holbeach.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) March 16, 17, 29.

In re FRASER.

LOWTHER v. FRASER. (a.)

Will—Construction—Excepted gift—Residuary gift—Codicil—Intestacy—Rent-charge issuing out of leaseholds—Chattel real—Vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money—Next-of-kin—Locke-King's Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113), s. 1—Amending Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 69)—Amending Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 34), s. 1.

When in a will property is specifically excepted from a general gift and is afterwards specifically bequeathed, but the bequest fails by lapse or otherwise, then it is to be taken that the object of the testator in making the exception was simply to give the property to the specific legatee, and, that being the sole object, upon the failure of the bequest it will be held to be included in the residuary gift. If, however, the testator makes no disposition by will of the excepted property, this reasoning does not apply, and the property passes as on an intestacy. Where, therefore, a testator having made a bequest of his personal estate except chattels real, and bequeathed the chattels real to a legatee who predeceased him, subsequently made a codicil in which he referred to the death of the legatee and confirmed his said will, without making any disposition of the chattels real,

Held that the chattels real passed to the next-of-kin, and did not fall into residue.

Held also, that a rent-charge issuing out of leaseholds is a chattel real. A rent-charge of this nature is within the provisions of Locke-King's Act, 1854 read together with the Amending Acts of 1867 and 1877. Consequently where a testator, who has contracted to purchase such a rent-charge dies intestate in respect thereof, it passes to the next-of-kin subject to the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money.

Decision of Byrne, J. ([1904] 1 Ch. 111), on this point affirmed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal against the decision of Byrne, J. (reported 52 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 383, [1904] 1 Ch. 111).

An application had been made in the court below by the trustees of the will of the late Sir William Augustus Fraser, for the determination of two difficult questions occasioned by the failure, in the events which had happened, of a devise of real estate and chattels real contained in his will and codicils; the first point was whether a rent-charge for £402 issuing out of and charged upon some leaseholds was a "chattel real," in which case this rent-charge admittedly passed to the next-of-kin as undisposed of; and the second question thereupon arose—viz., whether this class of property passed to the next-of-kin subject to an existing liability to discharge the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money in accordance with the provisions of Locke-King's Act, 1854, and the subsequent amending Acts, or whether these Acts did not include this property so that the next-of-kin would be entitled to have the purchase-money, £11,110, discharged for them out of the testator's personal estate.

In the month of April, 1898, the testator agreed to purchase a rent-charge issuing out of land held for the residue of a term of 99 years. He died in the month of August, 1898, and in January, 1899, the purchase was completed and the purchase-money of £11,110 was paid out of the general personal estate.

By his will, dated the 1st of December, 1886, the testator gave all the personal estate and effects to which he should at his death be entitled, or over which he should at his death have a general power of disposition (except what he otherwise disposed of by his will or any codicil thereto and except chattels real) to trustees in trust for conversion, and to pay his debts, legacies, and duties, and to invest and accumulate for twenty-one years, and then to hold the capital and accumulations on trusts in favour of various persons nominatim for life with remainder to their respective children.

The testator gave and bequeathed all real estate and chattels real in England to which he might be entitled at his death, except what he had otherwise disposed of by that his will, to Charles Crauford Fraser absolutely, for all his estate and interest therein.

Charles Crauford Fraser predeceased the testator, who, by a codicil dated the 21st of July, 1898, referred to C. C. Fraser's death, and after making certain dispositions (not affecting chattels real) in all other respects confirmed his said will.

The trustees took out an originating summons for the determination of the following questions: (1) Whether or not the interest which the testator had contracted to purchase was a chattel real, in which case the testator died intestate in respect thereof; and (2) if so, whether the chattel real passed subject to a liability to discharge the vendor's lien for the purchase-money, or whether the payment of the purchase-money should properly be borne by the testator's general personal estate.

Byrne, J., held that the rent-charge was a chattel real, and that the next-of-kin took it subject, as between them and the other persons claiming through the deceased, to a primary liability to pay the amount of the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money.

The next-of-kin appealed.

At the trial in the court below it was assumed by all parties that there was an intestacy, but as will be seen below it was argued in the Court of Appeal that the rent-charge in question fell into residue.

Levett, K.C., and Byrne, for the appellant.—This rent-charge is admittedly a chattel real, and being undisposed of passes to the next-of-kin of the testator. The question is whether the words in section 1 of the Real Estate Amendment Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 34) "any land or other hereditaments of whatever tenure" can apply to this rent-charge. We submit that they cannot. It is not a hereditament, inasmuch as it is not a thing which passes to the heir by hereditary succession: Challis Real Property, p. 43; Termes De La Ley, sub-tit. Hereditaments. Nor is it a subject of tenure: Burton on Real Property (7th ed.), p. 321.

They also referred to Carson's Real Property Statutes, p. 429.

Lecke, for another person in the same interest.

Norton, K.C., and Merivale, for the first tenant in tail.—On the true construction of this will the testator was referring to leasehold property by the words "chattels real in England," and not to this rent-charge. A rent-charge is a chattel but not a chattel real, the notion of which involves physical occupancy: see Coke Litt. 1186. But if this be not so, we submit that there is no intestacy, but the chattels real fall into the residue on the lapse of the legacy to Charles Crauford Fraser. In this will the testator gives everything except his chattels real to the trustees, and the chattels real are excepted out of the gift merely for the purpose of the legacy to C. C. Fraser. There is therefore here a true residuary gift which is increased by lapsed or void legacies: Blight v. Hartnoll, 31 W. R. 535, 23 Ch. D. 218. There must be a clear intention to exclude the excepted property from the residue: In re Bagot, Paton v. Ormerod, [1893] 3 Ch. 348, 42 W. R. Dig. 78; Bernard v. Minshull, Joh. 276, 7 W. R. Dig. 104; Evans v. Jones, 2 Coll. 516. But if this is a chattel real and does not fall into residue, then it is within the Acts of 1867 and 1877, and passes to the next-of-kin subject to a liability for unpaid purchase-money. This an interest which may be described as a hereditament though it does not descend to the heir. In Tomkins v. Jones, 37 W. R. 328, 22 Q. B. D. 599, it was held that leaseholds were hereditaments within the County Courts Act, 1888, though they do not descend to the heir: see, too, Challis Real Property, App. 1, p. 387. Nor is it necessary that this rent-charge, if it be a hereditament, should be a subject of tenure. In Great Western Railway Co. v. Swindon and Cheltenham Extension Railway Co, 32 W. R. 957, 9 A. C. 787, Lord Bramwell held that hereditaments of any tenure in the Lands Clauses Act, s. 3, ought to be construed as meaning "hereditaments of whatever tenure, if any." The words "hereditaments of whatever tenure" in section 1 of the Act of 1854 ought to be construed in the same way. If all three Acts be read together, it is plain that they deal with any estate or interest in land: In re Kidd, Brooman v. Withall, 43 W. R. 51, [1894] 3 Ch. 558. Reading the Acts together, therefore, this rent-charge is within them notwithstanding the omission of the words "next-of-kin" from section 1 of the Act of 1877, and passes to the next-of-kin as "persons claiming through or under the deceased person." It cannot have been the intention of the Legislature that the legatee should take his legacy cum onere, but that the next-of-kin should get it discharged from liability.

They also cited In re Cockcroft, Broadbent v. Groves, 32 W. R. 223, 24 Ch. D. 94.

Levett, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

STIRLING, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: The first point to be dealt with on this appeal is one which was not taken in the court below. It was contended that the testator's chattels real in England, which formed part of the chattels real in terms excepted from the general bequest of the testator's personal estate contained in his will, have nevertheless fallen into that bequest by reason of the death of the legatee of those chattels real in England under that will—viz., Charles Crauford Fraser—in the testator's lifetime. In support of that contention, Blight v. Hartnoll was mainly relied on. The law appears to be that, when in a will property is excepted from a general gift of the testator's personal estate and is afterwards specifically bequeathed, but the bequest fails by lapse or otherwise, then it is to be taken that the object of the testator in making the exception was simply to give the property in question to another; and, that being the sole object, there is no reason why upon the failure of the bequest it should not be held to be included in the residuary gift. If, however, the testator makes no disposition by will of the excepted property, this reasoning does not apply, and the excepted property passes as on an intestacy. If this decision turned on the will alone there would be much to be said in favour of the contention referred to. But the testamentary dispositions of the testator include several subsequent codicils, and in particular one of the 21st of July, 1898, which begins by reciting the death of Charles Crauford Fraser (the legatee of the chattels real in England), and contains a confirmation of the will as altered by prior codicils. The effect of this is to bring the will down to the date of the codicil, and effect the same disposition of the testator's estate as if the testator had at that date made a new will, containing the same dispositions as the original will, but with the alterations introduced by the various codicils: see Doe v. Walker, 12 M. & W. 691; In re Champion, [1893] 1 Ch. 101, 41 W. R. Dig. 275.

The result in the present case is that the testator has, on the face of the testamentary dispositions existing at his death, excepted the chattels real from the general bequest, and has not really made any bequest, the apparent bequest being on the face of the instruments themselves ineffective. In my opinion, therefore, the doctrine of Blight v. Hartnoll does not apply. As regards the two points decided by Byrne, J., I agree with him. I have nothing to add to the reasons given by him for holding that the rent-charge in question is a chattel real. As regards the construction of Locke-King's Act, 1854, and the amending Acts of 1867 and 1877, I think that these Acts are to be read together. The language of the first part of section 1 of the Act of 1854, though admitted in itself to be wide enough to extend to all interests in land, was, by reason of the subsequent clauses of the same section being confined to heirs and devisees, held to be limited in its operation to freehold interests: see Solomon v. Solomon, 12 W. R. 540; In re Wormsley's Estate, 25 W. R. 141, 4 Ch. D. 665. By the Amendment Act of 1877, the Legislature has clearly shown that this limitation is no longer to operate, and it has been held that the Acts now extend to leaseholds: Drake v. Kershaw, 36 W. R. 413, 37 Ch. D. 674. It is true that legatees only are spoken of in the Act of 1877, and not next-of-kin; but, in my opinion, there is in the Act of 1877 enough to show that the Act of 1854 ought no longer to receive the narrow interpretation placed on it in Solomon v. Solomon and In re Wormsley's Estate. Notwithstanding some difficulties arising from the language of the Act of 1877, I think it is decidedly preferable so to construe the Act of 1854 rather than to hold that the next-of-kin escape from a liability to which the legatee would have been subject had he survived the testator.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred in the judgment delivered by Stirling, L.J.

Solicitors, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co.; Bompas, Bischoff, Dodgson, Coxe, & Bompas; Fox, Trotter, Thicknesse, Patteson, & Hull.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) } March 2, 3, 5, 23

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND AND OTHERS. (a.)

Inland revenue—Succession duty—Alienation of succession—Disentailing deed—Devise by alienee—Liability of devisee to duty on original succession—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 15.

A tenant for life of settled real estate and the tenant in tail in remainder, having executed a disentailing deed, joined in conveying a parcel of land, part of the estate, in fee to a purchaser. The purchaser devised the parcel of land to his wife, who devised it to their daughter, who paid succession duty in respect thereof on her mother's death. Subsequently the tenant for life died.

Held, that succession duty was payable by the daughter on the death of the tenant for life also.

Judgment of Ridley, J. ([1903] 2 K. B. 71, 51 W. R. Dig. 71), affirmed.

In re Cooper and Allen to Harlech, 25 W. R. 301, 4 Ch. D. 802, overruled.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Ridley, J., upon an information by the Attorney-General claiming succession duty ([1903] 2 K. B. 71, 51 W. R. Dig. 71).

The defendants were the Duke of Northumberland, Caroline Frances Murray, and Charles William Bell.

In the year 1816 certain estates in the counties of Northumberland and Middlesex, including the piece of land comprised in the indenture of the 1st of December, 1870, hereinafter mentioned, stood limited (subject to certain charges) to the use of Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland, for life, with remainder to the use of his eldest son, Hugh, then Earl Percy, afterwards third Duke of Northumberland, in tail male. By virtue of two common recoveries in 1816 and of indentures of lease and release dated the 22nd and 23rd of January, 1817, the said estates became limited to such uses as the said second Duke of Northumberland and Hugh, third duke, should jointly appoint.

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 19th of April, 1817, the second and third dukes exercised their joint power of appointment, and limited the estates to uses under which, and by reason of the deaths of the second, third, and successive dukes, the estates at the date of the disentailing assurance of the 19th of December, 1868, hereinafter referred to, stood limited and settled to the use of Algernon George, sixth Duke of Northumberland, for life, with remainder to the use of his eldest son, the seventh and present duke, in tail male, with remainders over.

By an indenture dated the 19th of December, 1868, duly enrolled as a disentailing assurance, the sixth and seventh dukes (the latter being at the time Earl Percy), disentailed the estates and conveyed them to such uses as the sixth and seventh dukes should by deed jointly appoint, and in default of appointment to the uses which under the settlement of 1817 or by reference thereto were then subsisting.

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 21st of December, 1868, the sixth and seventh dukes, in exercise of the joint power of appointment given to them by the indenture of the 19th of December, 1868, appointed the estates to such uses as the sixth and seventh dukes should by deed or deeds jointly appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of the sixth duke for life, with remainder to the use of the seventh duke for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail male, with divers remainders over in strict settlement.

By an indenture dated the 1st of December, 1870, the sixth and seventh dukes, in exercise of the power given to them by the indenture of the 21st of December, 1868, appointed, in consideration of £250 paid to them, a piece of land, part of the said hereditaments, to the use of Lord James Murray, in fee simple.

Lord James Murray died on the 3rd of June, 1874, seised of the piece of land conveyed by the above indenture of the 1st of December, 1870, free from incumbrances, and by his will, dated the 8th of May, 1868, he gave, devised, and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his wife, Lady Elizabeth Marjory Murray, in fee simple.

Lady Elizabeth Marjory Murray died on the 11th of October, 1888, seised of the said piece of land, and by her will she devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate to her daughter, the defendant Caroline Frances Murray, absolutely.

On the death of Lady Elizabeth Marjory Murray, succession duty at 1½ per cent. was paid on the value of the interest of the defendant Caroline Frances Murray (considered as an annuity for life) in the real estate devised to her by her mother, including the piece of land conveyed by the indenture of the 1st of December, 1870.

The sixth duke died on the 2nd of January, 1899.

By an indenture dated the 13th of May, 1902, the defendant Caroline Frances Murray sold and conveyed the piece of land to the defendant Charles William Bell.

The Crown claimed succession duty on the death of the sixth duke in respect of the land conveyed by the indenture of the 1st of December, 1870, at the rate of 6½ per cent., viz. 5 per cent. under section 10 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, the present duke being a descendant of a brother of the father of the third duke, and 1½ per cent. under section 21, subsection 1, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888.

For the Crown it was contended that on a disposition of property being made no title to the property could be free of the duty, though such duty was only payable on the succession coming into possession; that if Lord James Murray had outlived the sixth duke, it could not be denied that duty would have been payable; that this particular case could not be distinguished, and that duty was payable under section 15 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, either as on a succession which, before the successor became entitled thereto, had become vested by alienation or by a title not conferring a new succession in some other person, or as on a succession the title to which had been accelerated by the extinction of a prior interest.

For the defendants it was contended that no duty was payable beyond that already paid by Miss Murray; that the original succession was dead by reason of the disentailing deed of 1868; that even if it were not so, the succession in this case had become vested in Miss Murray by a "title conferring a new succession"—that was to say, the title derived from her father or mother which conferred a succession on her—and therefore the case did not come within section 15; and that, in any case, a succession to real property could not be subject to double duty.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, "Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, to any other person in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution a 'succession'; and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled; and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, disponer, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived."

By section 15 it is enacted as follows: "And where, after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, any succession shall, before the successor shall have become entitled thereto or to the income thereof in possession, have become vested by alienation or by any title not conferring a new succession in any other person, then the duty payable in respect thereof shall be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if no such alienation had been made or derivative title created; and where the title to any succession shall be accelerated by the surrender or extinction of any prior interests, then the duty thereon shall be payable at the same time and in the same manner as such duty would have been payable if no such acceleration had taken place."

Ridley, J., gave judgment for the Crown.

The defendants appealed.

Haldane, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the defendants.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 23.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: In this case the Crown claims succession duty on the death of the sixth Duke of Northumberland in respect of a piece of land, a portion of the Northumberland estates settled in 1817. Ridley, J., has decided in favour of the Crown. The defendants appeal. The material facts are thus stated by Ridley, J.: "By a settlement dated the 19th of April, 1817, large estates in Northumberland were limited to certain uses, and in 1867 (in the events which had happened) they stood limited to the use of the sixth Duke of Northumberland for life, with remainder to his eldest son in tail male. In 1868 disentailing deeds were executed giving a joint power of appointment to the sixth duke and his eldest son, Earl Percy, now seventh duke; and on the 1st of December, 1870, under that power of appointment a parcel of land, which was part of the estates so brought into settlement, was conveyed to Lord James Murray in fee. In 1874 Lord James Murray died, having devised his estates to his wife, and in 1888 the widow died, having devised them to her daughter, Miss Murray, one of the defendants. She paid succession duty under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, s. 10 and 51 & 52 Vict. c. 8, s. 21, at the rate of 1½ per cent. on the value of the interest derived from her mother (considered as an annuity) in the real estate so devised to her, including this particular parcel of land. On the 2nd of January, 1899, the sixth Duke of Northumberland died, and it was now contended that succession duty became payable on his death in respect of this piece of land, under the same statutes, at the rate of 6½ per cent. But it was not contended by the Attorney-General, having regard to the date of the sale to Lord James Murray, that section 18 of the Finance Act, 1894, applied, and, therefore, it was asked that the percentage should be calculated on the value of the interest considered as an annuity under section 21 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853."

The contention of the Crown, which Ridley, J., has accepted, is that the second half of section 15 applies to the case, and that duty is payable under that section by Miss Murray in respect of the succession of the seventh Duke, which passed to her father by alienation under the indenture of the 1st of December, 1870, and of which she was in possession at the date of the death of the sixth duke, and that the fact that she has paid succession duty in respect of her own succession upon a devise from her mother, who survived Lord James Murray and took the succession under a devise from him, is no answer to the Crown's claim. The appellants rely on In re Cooper and Allen to Harlech, 25 W. R. 301, 4 Ch. D. 802, decided by Sir George Jessel, which, if well decided, governs the present case. They also contend that the disentailing deed of 1868 and the settlement which followed upon it had the effect of destroying the succession of the seventh duke created under the settlement of 1817. Subject to this point the question on this appeal is whether In re Cooper and Allen to Harlech was well decided. Before going further it is necessary to refer to certain sections of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. Section 1 provides that "the term 'succession' shall denote any property chargeable with duty under this Act." [His lordship then read section 2, and section 15 from the words "and where, after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act," to the end.] Section 20 provides that "the duty imposed by this Act shall be paid at the time when the successor, or any person in his right, or on his behalf, shall become entitled in possession to his succession, or to the receipt of the income and profits thereof." Section 42 provides that "the duty imposed by this Act shall be a first charge on the interest of the successor, and of all persons claiming in his right, in all the real property in respect whereof such duty shall be assessed."

Subject to the point as to the effect of the disentailing deed, both sides are agreed that the deed of the 1st of December, 1870, was an alienation of the seventh duke's succession to Lord James Murray within section 15, and that had he survived the sixth duke, not having himself transferred it, he would have been liable to pay the duty on the death of the sixth duke. Had he devised it to his daughter and died, she would have had to pay duty in respect of her succession to her father. Does the fact that her father predeceased the sixth duke make any difference? I think the reasoning of Lord Herschell in Lord Wolverton v. Attorney-General, 47 W. R. 97, [1898] A. C. 535, is conclusive that it does not. By section 42 of the Act of 1853 the duty is a first charge on the interest of the successor. Therefore the succession came to Miss Murray subject to this charge. How has she got rid of it? "If the person has had a succession conferred upon him, he cannot by parting with it prevent it from being a succession; that is, prevent it from being property liable to the duty. It continues a succession, and will be, when the proper time comes, a succession enjoyed in possession, into whatever hands it has come": per Cleasby, B., delivering the judgment of the court in Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society, 21 W. R. 854, L. R. 8 Ex. 233. "I am unable to find in the Act," says Lord Herschell in Lord Wolverton v. Attorney-General, "any warrant for the view that a succession once created can, by the act of the successor, cease to exist and another succession be substituted for it." But it is only by substituting the new succession of Miss Murray for the original succession of the seventh duke that the appellants can succeed. It is not necessary to examine once again the numerous cases decided upon section 15 before Lord Wolverton v. Attorney-General, nor to repeat at length here the reasons given by Lord Herschell for his opinion, but they are to my mind conclusive that In re Cooper and Allen to Harlech was wrongly decided. Therefore on this, which was the point principally discussed in argument, I am of opinion that the decision of Ridley, J., is right.

Next with regard to the effect of the disentailing deed. Here too I agree with Ridley, J. I think the point is concluded by authority. Lord Braybrooke v. Attorney-General, 9 W. R. 601, 9 H. L. C. 150, and the other cases cited in the same volume, and Lord Lilford v. Attorney-General, 15 W. R. 595, 2 L. R. H. L. 63, seem to me to establish that the effect of such a deed and the resettlement which followed was not such as to absolve the seventh duke from the obligation of paying succession duty. "I consider it my duty," says Lord Campbell, "to remind your lordships of the extreme inconvenience which may arise from departing from the broad rule laid down by the Court of Exchequer, that a tenant in tail in remainder cannot vary the succession duty to which he will be liable by barring the entail and resettling the estate": Lord Braybrooke v. Attorney-General. In that case, on disentailment by tenant in tail in remainder after a life estate in his father, and a resettlement by father and son to such uses as they should appoint, an appointment was made by them to the father for life, remainder to the son for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail, and on the father's death it was held that the son took a succession under a disposition made by himself under section 12 of the Act. The disentailing deed did not annul the father's life estate. Therefore what the son had to dispose of was a succession liable to duty. The succession was not destroyed by the enlargement of the estate tail into a fee. Lord Campbell, and probably Lord Kingsdown, would have reached the same conclusion under section 15. In other words, the transaction involved an alienation of a succession. So here, if there had been no sale under the power to Lord James Murray, the seventh duke would have taken a succession under a disposition made by himself. The point, therefore, that the succession was wiped out by the disentailment is no longer open. I have dealt with the case without reference to the clause as to acceleration by the surrender or extinction of prior interests in section 15, which certainly does not assist the appellants.

With regard to the point that the duty should be calculated by reference to the life of the original successor, the seventh duke, and not that of the ultimate alienee, Miss Murray, we cannot decide in favour of the appellants without overruling Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society, decided more than thirty years ago, and continually acted upon since. This I am not prepared to do, even if I disagreed with it, which I do not. The appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment: I agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in this case, and only desire to add some observations on certain points.

In the present case a tenant for life and remainder-man conveyed land to such purposes as they should appoint, and then appointed the land to a person in fee. For the purposes we have to consider on this appeal, I think it is clear on the authorities that the case should be dealt with as if they had conveyed the land direct to that person in fee. That being so, the question arising in the present appeal may be stated as follows: A., tenant for life, and B., tenant in tail, alienate land to C. in fee by disentailing deed duly enrolled. C. then enters into possession, and dies in the lifetime of A., having devised the land to D., who thereupon enters into possession, and pays succession duty as succeeding C. Then A. dies, and the question is whether succession duty is then payable by D. as on A.'s death; and, if that question be answered in the affirmative, there is a subsidiary question as to how the duty is to be estimated.

The appellants say that no succession duty is payable. They contend, in the first place, that, even if B. had been tenant in fee, no duty would have been payable; and, as a second point, they contend that, even if duty would have been payable, had B. been tenant in fee, it is not payable, because B. was only tenant in tail.

With regard to the first point, the appellants rely on the fact that D. had to pay duty on C.'s death as his successor; and they urge that, having so succeeded to the land and paid duty, there was in fact no fresh succession by D. on A.'s death, and that D. could not be liable for more than one succession duty; and the appellants rely on the decision of Sir G. Jessel, M.R., in the case of In re Cooper and Allen to Harlech. But that decision, and the grounds on which it was based, have since been considered, and, as it appears to me, disapproved of by the House of Lords in the case of Lord Wolverton v. Attorney-General, and in particular were shown to be unsound by the reasoning of Lord Herschell in his speech in that case. That reasoning appears to me convincing; but, inasmuch as the appellants challenge it, I desire to add a few remarks, even at the risk of repeating part of what Lord Herschell in the last-mentioned case, and the Master of the Rolls in the present case, have said.

In the first place, if I consider the position of C. immediately before he died, it appears to me clear that in strict accordance with the express provision of the second part of section 15 of the Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), the succession of B. had become vested in C. by alienation, and that the duty in respect of that succession thereupon became payable at the same time and rate as the same would have been payable if no alienation had been made; and it is further clear from the section that the alienation of A.'s life estate to C., and the merger consequent thereon, did not operate to prevent the duty being payable. See also section 20 of the Act, which provides that the duty imposed by the Act shall be paid at the time when the successor "or any person in his right" shall become entitled in possession to his succession. The words "in his right" would include purchasers and other derivative owners whose liability to the payment of duty is regulated by section 15. It also follows from the provisions of section 42 of the Act that, inasmuch as C. claimed "in right" of B., the duty became a first charge on the land. That being so, how has that charge been got rid of? As Lord Herschell pointed out, there is nothing whatever in the Act from which it can be inferred that, by any disposition on C.'s part of the land, he could free the land from the charge. He may, of course, dispose of the land so as to create further successions, in respect of which further duty may become payable, but that will not in any way interfere with the duty already charged on the land, subject only to the provision made by section 12 of the Act in favour of C., if he himself became a successor by virtue of his own disposition. The arguments by which the appellants seek to escape from this result in the present case are founded on a misconception of the true position of D. He has not been required to pay duty twice for one succession. There are two distinct successions and two distinct duties. One duty became payable by reason of C.'s death in A.'s lifetime, when D. succeeded C. by virtue of C.'s disposition, and in that case duty became payable by D., taking from C. as his predecessor. How the amount of that duty should have been estimated, and whether or not by reference to the suggestion that D. only then succeeded as it were during the rest of A.'s lifetime, we are not now concerned with, though I am by no means suggesting that the Crown was wrong in estimating that duty in the way it did. The next succession occurred by reason, not of C.'s death, but of A.'s, and then the duty already charged on the land in C.'s hands became payable under section 15 of the Act, and that duty is assessed without in any way being concerned with C. as a predecessor. In the same way two distinct successions would have occurred, and two distinct duties would have been payable if C. had died after A. On A.'s death in that case C. would have paid duty as successor; and then, if C. had died, D. would have had to pay duty as successor of C. The true position of affairs is somewhat obscured by reason of the merger of A.'s estate and B.'s estate, because they were both aliened to C. The true way to regard the case (especially having regard to the provisions as to merger in section 15) is to consider how matters would have stood if there had been no merger. C. obtained possession of the land, not because he had acquired B.'s estate, but because he had acquired A.'s estate. On C.'s death in A.'s lifetime, D., claiming through C. as owner of A.'s life estate, took possession, and had to pay duty. B.'s estate in remainder expectant on A.'s death had nothing to do with that possession or duty. But, inasmuch as the remainder had been aliened to C., and D. had become owner of that remainder by reason of C.'s devise to him, when he succeeded on A.'s death, he had to pay duty; for it is clear that, if the owner of a remainder charged with duty devises it, the devisee only acquires that remainder subject to the duty. The general question may be further illustrated by considering how matters would have stood if A.'s estate and B.'s estate had been acquired by D. at different times. For example, if C. had only acquired A.'s estate, and then had died in A.'s lifetime, having devised that estate to D., succession duty would have been payable by D. In that case B.'s estate in remainder would have clearly remained liable to its duty on A.'s death, and, if B. had, after C.'s death and before A.'s death, aliened the remainder to D., duty would have been payable by D. as alienee on A.'s death. But it is unnecessary to multiply cases bearing on the point now before me. All I need say is that I am satisfied with regard to the first point taken on behalf of the appellants that, if B.'s estate had been a remainder in fee, duty would have been payable on A.'s death.

The next point then arises, whether the duty ceased to be payable, because B.'s estate was one in tail, and was barred by the disentailing deed. The appellants contend that the effect of that deed was to destroy B.'s estate in tail, and to create an entirely new estate in C., which was not liable to the duty to which the estate tail was liable. This contention appears to me unsound, and is really disposed of by authority. Since the Fines and Recoveries Act, especially having regard to section 15 of that Act, which expressly provides that a tenant in tail shall have full power to dispose of the entailed land for an estate in fee simple absolute, it appears to me that it cannot properly be said that a tenant in tail alienating by disentailing deed under the Act thereby destroys for the purposes of succession duty the interest he possessed in the estate. What he did, by disentailing by exercise of the powers vested in him, was to render that estate perpetual, and the effect of such a deed may be quite different from that caused by a fine being levied or a common recovery suffered prior to the Act. It was on this ground that the case of Lord Lilford v. Attorney-General was decided in the House of Lords. In that case Lord Chelmsford said, after referring to section 15 of the Fines and Recoveries Act: "The disentailing deed did not operate to destroy the interest of which he was the successor, but enabled him, by the exercise of the power which that interest gave him, to render it perpetual"; and Lord Cranworth dealt with the point as follows: "The power of barring the entail, and so becoming competent to dispose of the property by will, was incident to the estate tail which Lord Lilford took . . . and therefore, when he executed the disentailing deed . . . he may be treated as having, in the language of the twenty-first clause, been competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest in the property. He may be treated, for the purpose of succession duty, as if he had been a devisee of the fee simple." Lord Colonsay also addressed the House to the same effect: see also the observations of Lord Campbell, L.C., and of Lord Kingsdown in Lord Braybrooke v. Attorney-General. The effect of the statement by Lord Campbell in that case that "the tenant in tail in remainder, when he bars the entail, may, if he pleases, alienate the estate, and no succession duty will be payable by him," has, I think, been misunderstood by the appellants' counsel. I think that all Lord Campbell meant was that, as between the tenant in tail and the alienee, the latter would have to pay the duty. A tenant in tail may of course by disentailing deed, in the same way as he could have done if he had been a tenant in fee, resettle land so as to cause a new succession to arise under that settlement, and so that the persons claiming under that settlement could not be said to be alienees under an alienation within the meaning of the word "alienation" as used in section 15 of the Succession Duty Act. But it appears to me clear that, if a tenant in tail by disentailing deed simply assures the fee absolutely to a person, that person takes under an alienation within the meaning of the section.

The only case which at first appeared to me to occasion difficulty was the Attorney-General v. Cecil, 18 W. R. 949, L. R. 5 Ex. 263; a case much relied on by the counsel for the appellants. But having examined that case carefully, I come to the conclusion that it does not really assist the appellants in the present case, nor occasion any difficulty, at any rate on the ground on which it appears to me to have been decided. I think that case was decided on the ground that there was a resettlement by Lord Cranbourne, the tenant in tail, under which Lord Eustace Cecil took an interest, and such an interest that he could not be said to be entitled to it as an alienee under an alienation by Lord Cranbourne within the meaning of section 15 of the Succession Duty Act. This appears to me clear, when the judgments of the barons who decided it are considered. Kelly, C.B., said: "A new succession was conferred on Lord Eustace Cecil. The case is exactly the same as if, on the purchase of a property . . . the purchaser had created a term out of the estate so created by him. Being thus excluded from the operation of the 15th section, the case is left to the operation of the second section; it is a succession in which Lord Cranbourne is the predecessor, and the Crown is entitled to duty on that footing"; and Martin, B., observed, referring to section 15: "But it appears to me that the clause relied on has no application to the present case; it refers not to the creation of an interest by way of settlement, but to an alienation in the ordinary sense, as if, for instance, the late Lord Cranbourne had sold the whole of his interest to some third person before it came into possession"; and, to make his view even more clear, he added: "Whether, inasmuch as Lord Cranbourne, if he had survived without making this appointment, must have paid duty on the whole property, a double duty is not payable, first on the whole interest out of which this term is carved, and then upon the charge itself, is a matter on which I give no opinion." Channell, B., said: "I think . . . the Attorney-General is right in saying that a new succession has been created, which prevents the case from falling within the second branch of the 15th section"; and lastly, Cleasby, B., ended his judgment as follows: "I think the Crown is entitled to judgment: first, I am not satisfied that this is a case where the succession of Lord Cranbourne has become vested in any other person; and, secondly, if it has, it is by a title which creates a new succession." I think this view of the case was also that taken by the House of Lords in Lord Wolverton v. Attorney-General. It appears to me, therefore, that the Crown is right in contending that duty was payable in the present case.

The only remaining point is as to the amount of duty; whether the amount is calculated upon the enjoyment of the property which the person actually taking is expected to have. I think it is. The precise point was decided in Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society, and that case was, in my opinion, rightly decided for the cogent reasons given by Cleasby, B., in delivering the judgment of the court, and those reasons I need not repeat. It follows that in my judgment the appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: I agree in the comments made by the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J., upon the authorities cited in the course of the argument. I propose to state briefly the grounds upon which I am satisfied that this appeal should be dismissed.

Under the deed of 1817 and the Act of 1853 succession duty became payable upon the death of the sixth Duke of Northumberland in respect of the estates, the subject of the deed. Under section 42 the duty was a first charge upon the property in respect of which it was assessed. Under the disentailing deed of 1868 the duty remained payable, and would have been due to the Crown upon the succession of the seventh Duke of Northumberland if no change had been made meanwhile in the disposition of the property. After the deed of 1868 the sixth and seventh Dukes of Northumberland, as respectively tenant for life and tenant in fee of the estates, in effect conveyed the lands in respect of which the duty has been assessed to Lord James Murray in fee. Under section 15 the duty then charged upon the lands became payable at the same time and at the same rate as if no such alienation had taken place—namely, upon the death of the sixth duke. Lord James Murray died in the lifetime of the sixth duke, and before the duty had become payable; and his estate passed to his daughter, who paid succession duty on the value of her interest. Upon the death of the sixth duke the succession duty charged upon the estate was claimed by the Crown, but payment was refused, and these proceedings were taken to make the defendants accountable.

The grounds upon which it was contended that the defendants were not liable were submitted in an elaborate and lengthy argument, in which the learned counsel for the defendants struggled in vain to escape from the clear language of section 15.

It was, as I understood, admitted that, if Lord James Murray had survived the sixth duke, the duty would have been payable. But it was said that his death in the lifetime of the tenant for life made all the difference. The result, it was contended, was that only one succession duty, namely, that paid by the daughter, was claimable. But the answer seemed clear that two duties were due, because there had been two successions: (1) the duty payable upon the succession of the seventh duke, and (2) that payable upon the succession of the daughter.

It was further contended for the appellants that the estates comprised in the disentailing deed were by that instrument relieved of the succession duty previously charged upon them. The deed, it was said, created a new estate, and swept the charge away. No authority was referred to in support of this argument. The previous decisions pointed to a different conclusion. The old fine and recovery were alleged to have created a new estate, and the disentailing deed, it was said, must be taken to have had a similar operation. But the former method of disentailing was only a clumsy mode of expanding the estate tail into an estate in fee. It had in reality no greater effect than the later method of accomplishing the same result. It might as well be argued that the deed would have relieved the estates of any mortgages upon them. It seems to me that nothing has occurred to discharge the duty now claimed, and therefore the Crown is entitled to our judgment.

I agree that the amount of the duty must be calculated in the manner pointed out by the Master of the Rolls.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for defendants, Bell, Steward, May, & How.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Farwell, J. } April 13.

In re REPINGTON.
WODEHOUSE v. SCOBELL. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Legacy duty—Incidence.

The assignment of a specified portion of a mortgage debt belonging to the residuary personal estate of a testator, and upon which estate legacy duty is payable, does not free such portion of its proportionate liability for legacy duty. In such a case the legacy duty is not an incumbrance covered by the assignor's covenant for further assurance.

Summons.

A person entitled in reversion to part of the residuary personal estate of a testator assigned his interest in a certain part of a mortgage debt that formed portion of the residuary estate, to the trustees of his marriage settlement, which contained the usual covenant for further assurance.

Thereafter the reversioner became absolutely entitled to his share of the residuary personal estate subject to the payment of legacy duty.

(a.) Reported by H. STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The summons was to determine the question whether the trustees of the marriage settlement were entitled to the full amount of the portion of the mortgage debt assigned to them, or whether that portion should bear a rateable proportion of the legacy duty payable on the whole residuary estate.

Bryan Farrer, for the trustees of will.

McSwinney, for the trustees of the settlement, contended that the effect of the covenant for further assurance was to cast the payment of the duty upon the remainder of the residuary estate; it was the intention of the settlor that the trustees thereunder should have a fund absolutely clear of all duties.

He referred to In re Jones, Farrington v. Forrester, [1893] 2 Ch. 461, 41 W. R. Dig. 90, 143, 62 L. J. 996, 69 L. T. 45.

M. Romer, for the assignor.—Legacy duty is not an incumbrance affected by a covenant for further assurance; the settled fund was chargeable with a rateable proportion of the duty.

He referred to Bliss v. Putnam, 7 Beav. 40; In re Shaw, Tucket v. Shaw, 42 W. R. 315, [1895] 1 Ch. 343, 64 L. J. Ch. 283, 71 L. T. 873.

FARWELL, J.—The legacy duty must be borne by the settled portion of the mortgage debt rateably with the remainder of the residuary estate. The settlor assigned a specified portion of a mortgage debt, not a specified sum of money; in other words, two-thirds of the sum to which the settlor was entitled in reversion had been assigned by him. Had the assignment been of the whole of the settlor's interest in the reversion, the duty must have been borne by the assignees; the covenant for further assurance does not help the trustees of the marriage settlement. The case is distinguishable from In re Jones, where a mortgage was an incumbrance. When a vendor assigns a reversionary interest, upon which legacy duty is payable, both vendor and vendee know that legacy duty must be paid by the assignee. The portion of the mortgage debt assigned must bear its duty with the remainder of the debt.

Solicitors, Ellis & Ellis; Nicholl, Manisty, & Co.

Chan. Div. } Joyce, J. } Feb. 3, 4, 5, 8.

COLWELL v. ST. PANCRAS BOROUGH COUNCIL. (a.)

Nuisance — Vibration — Electric generating station — Statutory powers of borough council — Provisional order under Electric Lighting Act — Injunction — "Temporary" nuisance.

The defendant council, under the powers of a provisional order, erected an electric generating station in proximity to houses of which the plaintiffs were lessees or occupiers. The order provided that nothing therein should exonerate the undertakers from an action for nuisance in the event of any being occasioned by them. In an action for an injunction it was admitted by the defendants that the vibration of their machinery created an actionable nuisance unless such nuisance was excusable as being of a merely temporary nature, but they alleged that after experiments and alterations of the machinery the nuisance would abate, and that as the machinery was not yet completed in its final form, but only in course of construction, an action would not lie against them.

Held, that the nuisance was not merely temporary within the principle of Harrison v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co., [1891] 2 Ch. 409, 39 W. R Dig. 140, and that the defendants were not entitled to carry out their works unless they could do so without creating a nuisance, and that an injunction must go.

One of the plaintiffs having sub-let for all his term less the last three days,

Held, entitled to an injunction in respect of damage to his reversion.

Witness action.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant council from causing nuisance to the plaintiffs and damaging the value of their houses hereinafter mentioned by vibration and noise from a generating station of electricity erected by the council, and from interfering with the plaintiffs' use and enjoyment of such houses.

The facts were shortly as follows: Five of the plaintiffs were the lessees and occupiers of houses in Great College-street, in the parish of St. Pancras. The sixth plaintiff, one Stone, was the lessee of a like house who had sub-let for all the residue of his term less three days. All the houses were three storeys high and many years old. The ground-floors were used as shops, the upper parts were residential. The defendant council had acquired the freehold of all the houses subject to the leases thereof.

Some 50 to 100 feet from the plaintiffs' houses the council, acting under a provisional order under the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, had, in 1894, built an electric generating station, and from that time onwards had supplied electricity to the neighbourhood. In 1902 the council proposed to erect new works and increase their plant and machinery. The plaintiffs objected to this on the ground that it would increase the nuisance and annoyance from the vibration of the machinery from which they already suffered, but of which they had not previously complained. Notwithstanding the objection, the council erected their new plant and machinery, which included two engines of 750 h.p. each, and which they began using in May, 1903. There was evidence that before 1902 the plaintiffs had suffered, and that since the new works their annoyance from vibration and noise had greatly increased and was now an intolerable nuisance, destructive of comfort and injurious to health. The council's evidence went to show that at present the new engines were not properly balanced and did not run smoothly in consequence, but that the defects could be remedied in a reasonable time, though possibly several months would elapse. Further, they contended that until the machinery was perfected the works were not completely constructed, and that until then no action would lie.

The provisional order in question provided that nothing therein should exonerate the council (in effect) from proceedings for nuisance, if nuisance were caused.

Hughes, K.C., and Beaumont, for the plaintiff.

Bousfield, K.C., Younger, K.C., and A. B. Marten, for the council.—All that has been done has been done in discharge of a statutory duty. The nuisance is merely temporary and will soon be remedied. The engines and plant are the best type known, and when they are in thorough working order the nuisance will abate. People who live in a town or an industrial centre must submit to some inconvenience in the interests of the public at large.

They cited Sutton v. Clarke, 6 Taunt. 29; St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 13 W. R. 1083, 11 H. L. C. 642; and in support of a suspension of any injunction. Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., 43 W. R. 238, [1895] 2 Ch. 388.

(a.) Reported by ALAN C. NESBITT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hughes, K.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 8.—JOYCE, J.—This action was begun on the 30th of November, 1903, and it was virtually admitted before me—it could hardly have been denied—that by reason of the vibration caused by the defendants' works at various times between the months of May and December the plaintiffs had a right to complain of the annoyance to which they had been subjected unless it was merely a temporary annoyance. That, as I say, was practically admitted, but at all events, if necessary I decide on the facts that it is so. In other words, it appears to me that by the vibration caused by the defendants' works and machinery so much annoyance has been occasioned to the plaintiffs as to justify the action, unless the defendants can show that they are excused by reason of its being, as they allege, a temporary nuisance or within the principles laid down in the case of Harrison v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co. I am of opinion that the amount of the annoyance caused has occasioned material interference with the comfort of the plaintiffs. As Jessel, M.R., said in Broder v. Saillard, 24 W. R. 1011, 2 Ch. D. 692, 701: "The law is this, that a man is entitled to the comfortable enjoyment of his dwelling-house; if his neighbour makes such a noise"—and of course if he causes such vibration—"as to interfere with the ordinary use and enjoyment of his dwelling-house, so as to cause serious annoyance or disturbance, the occupier of the dwelling-house is entitled to be protected from it." I am of opinion that there has been such annoyance in this case. But it was suggested—rather mildly, I think—that the defendants were entitled to be excused by reason of the passage I have referred to in the judgment in the case of Harrison v. Southwark, &c., Co. Were the annoyances occasioned within the principle of that statement of the law? In my opinion they were not. The principle is stated and worked out, and no doubt correctly, by Bramwell, B., in Bamford v. Turnley, 3 B. & S. 83, and the same judgment deals satisfactorily to my mind with the question whether a defendant is entitled to be excused on the mere ground that the annoyance which he occasions is temporary. In this particular case the annoyance caused has not been a mere temporary and occasional personal inconvenience, but in my opinion is such as is calculated (I do not say it has done that, but it is calculated) to work material injury to the property of the plaintiffs, and beyond all question, if that be a ground of action (which I do not think it is) most seriously to depreciate the value of the plaintiffs' property. Now, I am not aware that it has ever been suggested that nuisance by vibration, actual physical shaking of the plaintiffs' house or property, is within the principle referred to above and dealt with by Bramwell, B. In this particular case there is a clause in the order that authorizes the works which says "Nothing in this order shall exonerate the undertakers from any indictment, action, or other proceeding for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being occasioned by them." What it really comes to is this—that notwithstanding that order it is suggested that for months, it may be for years, after the first erection or construction of the works the defendants are entitled to make the neighbourhood uninhabitable or to cause serious annoyance to the neighbours, until the time shall have arrived when they have contrived or managed in some way or other to carry on their works without creating a nuisance. What is to happen in such a case or in this case, if they never succeed in doing that, no one has told me.

However, that proposition or suggestion was not laid down very positively, and it is to me entirely novel and strange, and one to which I am quite unable to accede. I would rather say that after the construction of their works, if not before, the owners of those works, particularly under an order such as this, are not entitled to carry them on at all unless or until they can do so without occasioning a nuisance to the neighbouring owners of property.

As to the old machinery, it appears it is still used occasionally during the night. At all events, it has not been running long enough for the defendants to acquire a right as against any of these plaintiffs to work that machinery so as to occasion a nuisance, although it is quite clear they would not have been able to get an injunction on an interlocutory application; but at the hearing delay is immaterial, unless it be long enough—twenty years, or something of that kind—to create a right in the defendants. Under these circumstances there must be an injunction, not distinguishing in any way between the old machinery and the new. The injunction will be to restrain the defendants from carrying on these works in such a way as to cause a nuisance or injury to the plaintiffs—that is, during the continuance of their leases.

As regards the plaintiff Stone, I hold that there is a nuisance calculated to injure the reversion. It is calculated to destroy the houses. I grant an injunction in Stone's case in respect of vibration as to his reversion.

Younger, K.C.—I ask for a suspension of the injunction.

JOYCE, J.—You may have six months.

Solicitors, Beaumont & Son; Cunliffes & Davenport.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) March 2.

REX v. HIS HONOUR JUDGE WHITEHORNE AND HUMPHREYS.
Ex parte ROGERS. (a.)

County court—Equitable jurisdiction—Agreement to purchase house property worth more than £500 subject to a mortgage—Price for equity of redemption agreed at £75—Specific performance—Jurisdiction—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 67, 126.

Held, that the county court had jurisdiction under section 67, sub-section 4, of the County Courts Act, 1888, to hear an action brought on a contract for the sale of an equity of redemption agreed at the value of £75 although the value of the property that was the subject of the sale would, but for the charge upon it, have exceeded £500.

In this case a rule in the nature of a mandamus had been granted calling upon his Honour Judge Whitehorne, the judge of the Birmingham County Court, to show cause why he should not hear and determine an action of Rogers v. Humphreys, in which the learned judge had decided in the circumstances he had no jurisdiction to entertain.

The action was brought under the equity jurisdiction of the county court for specific performance of a contract to purchase certain house property from a trustee of a creditors' deed. The consideration for the purchase was the payment of a sum of £75 to the creditors. The property was heavily mortgaged, and the purchaser was to buy it subject to the charge. Evidence was given that the property, if it had not been mortgaged, would have been worth from £1,500 to £1,700.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The County Courts Act, 1888, by section 67, gives the county court jurisdiction in such a case where the value of the property does not exceed £500.

In the county court the point was taken by the defendant that what was proposed to be bought was property of the estimated value of more than £500, subject to a charge, and therefore property of greater value than the limit imposed by the statute.

For the plaintiff the contrary was argued.

The county court judge was of opinion that the defendant's contention was the correct one, and, accordingly, that he had no jurisdiction, and he declined to hear the action.

The plaintiff thereupon obtained this rule, and the question was argued whether when property exceeding £500 in value is so charged that the value of the equity of redemption is under £500, a contract for the sale of the equity of redemption is within the jurisdiction of the county court.

H. Sutton, against the rule.—The purchase-money must be taken in a technical sense, and not at the amount fixed or agreed upon for the sale of the equity of redemption. Here the sale passed the ownership in property, subject, no doubt, to a charge of greater value than £500. And section 67 (4) of the Act of 1888 expressly limits the power of the county court to cases where the value of the property "shall not exceed the sum of £500." By section 126 of the same Act power is given to the High Court or any judge thereof to order the removal into the High Court, by certiorari or otherwise, of any action commenced in the county court, if the High Court or a judge should deem it desirable. Provision, therefore, is made to have such a case as this commenced in the county court tried in the High Court. Moreover, the ad valorem stamp on the conveyance would be payable, not on £75, but on the estimated capital value—that is, on a sum greater than £500. The county court judge was therefore right in refusing to hear and determine the action, and the rule should be discharged.

H. A. McCardie, in support of the rule.—The rule should be made absolute, for all that is agreed to be purchased here is the equity of redemption. The price to be paid for that is less than £500. The matter therefore comes within the jurisdiction given to county courts by section 67. If any difficulty arises the remedy is by certiorari under section 126.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think the learned county court judge in raising this point calls attention to what I will not call a defect, because it may very likely be right as to jurisdiction, but to a point which may require further consideration—namely, the question whether or not it was intended or is desirable that the county court should have jurisdiction in a case where the subject of the contract, the purchase-money of an equity of redemption in this case, is below £500, but the value of the property which is actually being transferred subject to the charge may be very much larger. In this question of difficulty the only safe rule, in my opinion, to follow is to give the best construction we can to the language of the section, and not to put an artificial construction upon the section unless we see the consequences are such that we are driven to the conclusion that the Legislature has used the words in a limited sense. As has been pointed out, the section is a general section relating to all classes of property, and, of course, would include chattels as well as real property; therefore it is not specially directed to the cases in which the purchase-money of land only would be the subject of the consideration. The language is "For specific performance of, or for the performing, delivering up, or cancelling of any agreement for the sale, purchase, or lease of any property where in the case of a sale or purchase the purchase-money, or in the case of a lease the value of the property, shall not exceed the sum of £500." It seems to me that as the section contemplates all kinds of things being sold, we must assume primâ facie that the words "purchase-money" mean the purchase-money for what was the subject of the purchase and sale, and to a certain extent that view is justified by the following words, "or in the case of a lease, the value of the property"—being a special exception where they could not get, so to speak, the standard of purchase-money. Under these circumstances it seems, though it may be but indirectly, the court has been given primâ facie and subject to the power of removal, a jurisdiction in cases in which the questions will really affect property to a much larger sum than £500. I do not think that it would be safe to put an artificial construction on the words "purchase-money" but we ought to look at what was the purchase-money, the subject of the contract sought to be performed or cancelled. In these circumstances I think the facts of this case show that what was being sold here was the equity of redemption for £75, and therefore I think we must hold that the learned judge had primâ facie jurisdiction; I think, moreover, it is not material, as has been pointed out during the argument, that there are powers of removal if it should turn out that the interest in much more valuable property is at stake. I quite follow the line of argument which impressed the county court judge, which Mr. Sutton very clearly brought before us; that for a long period of years, when property is sold subject to a charge, for the purposes of stamp duty the consideration and purchase-money is to be taken to be the total amount including the charge. I do not think the Stamp Acts can be said to be in pari materia; but whether they be so or not, if it was intended to draw such a distinction here, I think it must be done in clearer language than is used in this section, and I feel constrained to give the natural meaning to the words "in the case of a sale or purchase the purchase-money, or in the case of a lease, the value of the property, shall not exceed the sum of £500," and to say that the county court judge had jurisdiction. I quite understand his feeling of doubt upon the matter, and I think we ought to give him assistance by saying that in such a case we think the jurisdiction exists, and ought to be exercised unless the case has been removed. If it is thought the result of our judgment is to give the county courts jurisdiction which they ought not to have, it must be altered by amending the Act so as to make this matter clearer than the language of this present section makes it.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is nothing to guide us as to what the meaning of the Legislature is except the words they have used in the specific sub-section, because to my mind the Stamp Acts do not throw any light upon it. The Stamp Acts are Revenue Acts, and they are always, or at any rate generally, framed with the view of getting as much out of the subject as can possibly be got, and, therefore, it is very natural that they should use language which will cover the amount upon which duty is to be charged—namely, the whole value of property, including the sum by which its real value is diminished, which is the charge upon it. Therefore I do not feel that the Stamp Acts give me any assistance whatever. Then we are driven back to give the words their natural meaning. "Property" is a very large word. Certainly it would include the equity of redemption, and I think if anybody were asked with respect to this transaction what property was being sold, his answer would be "the equity of redemption"—that is made even more clear, I think, by the use of the words "the purchase-money." That means the purchase-money for the property, and the reference to the purchase-money, I think, makes the sum which has been agreed to be given between the parties the standard of what the property is worth—the property which is the subject of sale; and in that way throws a reflected light upon the interpretation which ought to be given to "property." I think, therefore, this really was a contract for the sale of the equity of redemption for £75, and therefore that it is within the jurisdiction of the county court judge.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. It seems to me very much as my brother Wills has put it, that the natural and proper rule in this case is, as far as you can, to follow the natural and fair meaning of the words in their position as used in the sentence, and if anybody had said in this case "What money did you purchase the equity of redemption for?" he would have said "£75"; and it is enacted that if the purchase-money does not exceed a certain limit that the county court judge has jurisdiction. In this case the limit apparently was not reached.

Rule made absolute against the defendants with costs.

Solicitors, Solicitor to the Treasury; Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Sherwin & Rodgers, Birmingham.

K. B. Div. (Channell, J.) Feb. 25.

ROBINSON v. BURNELL'S VIENNA BAKERY CO. AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Company—Debentures—Floating security—Execution—Agreement by company with sheriff to pay off judgment debt by instalments to avoid sale—Right to money.

Under a writ of fi. fa. the goods of a limited company were seized in execution of a judgment debt. In order to avoid a sale the company agreed with the sheriff, with the assent of the judgment creditor, that in consideration of his not selling the goods they would pay the sheriff out of the daily takings £3 5s. a day—£3 to go towards the paying off of the debt and 5s. for sheriff's charges. A receiver was subsequently appointed in a debenture-holders' action, and he claimed the sum of £75, the net amount in the hands of the sheriff.

Held, that the judgment creditor was entitled to retain the moneys.

Robson v. Smith, 43 W. R. 632, [1895] 2 Ch. 118, discussed.

In this case an order was made by Lawrance, J., at chambers upon interpleader proceedings directing the question of law to be set down for hearing, and the point argued was whether under the circumstances the claim laid by debenture-holders to certain payments made to an execution creditor by the company was one that could be enforced.

The company was registered as a limited company on the 23rd of February, 1903, the capital being 3,500 shares of £1 each.

On the 27th of February, four days later, five debentures were issued for £100 each. The company got into difficulties, and Mr. Robinson obtained a judgment against the company. The money was not paid, and on the 24th of October the sheriff went into possession under a writ of fi. fa.

The company, in order to avoid a sale of the stock, agreed with the sheriff, with the assent of the creditor, that in consideration of his not selling the goods, the company would pay him £3 5s. a day from the daily takings, of which 5s. was for the sheriff's charges.

On the 21st of November an order was made by Farwell, J., appointing a Mr. Hillman, the claimant in these interpleader proceedings, receiver and manager on behalf of the debenture-holders of the undertaking and property of the company in a debenture-holders' action.

On the 24th of November the receiver claimed the sum of £75, the net amount in the hands of the sheriff under the agreement with the company. An interpleader summons was taken out, and upon the hearing of the summons the master decided against the receiver's claim. Upon appeal to Lawrance, J., at chambers the learned judge directed the question of law to be set down for hearing.

Colam, for the claimant.—The receiver and manager for the debenture-holders is entitled to the money that has been paid to the sheriff and can recover it because it was not paid to him as a legal officer under an order of the court, but merely as agent for the execution creditor. Until the money was paid over to the execution creditor it was in gremio legis and was still in the debtor's possession: Davey & Co. v. Williamson & Sons (Limited), 46 W. R. 571, [1898] 2 Q. B. 195; In re Opera (Limited), 39 W. R. 398, [1891] 3 Ch. 260; and Taunton v. Sheriff of Warwickshire, 43 W. R. 35, [1895] 2 Ch. 319.

Muir Mackenzie, for the execution creditor.—Money paid to avoid a sale is in the same position as money paid under a garnishee order, and becomes, when paid, the absolute property of the execution creditor. This is not a case of goods in charge of the sheriff, which would be no doubt subject to the rights of the debenture-holders. Debentures give the holders thereof a floating charge on all the assets of the company, subject to a licence to use the said assets in the ordinary course of business. In Robson v. Smith, 43 W. R. 632, [1895] 2 Ch. 118, it was held that money, even though paid under compulsion in the ordinary course of business, cannot be recovered, and here there was an express agreement on good consideration under which the money now sought to be recovered was paid.

Stock v. Holland, 22 W. R. 661, L. R. 9 Ex. 147, and Simultaneous Colour Printing Syndicate v. Fouweaker, [1901] 1 K. B. 771, 49 W. R. Dig. 25, were also referred to.

Colam replied.

CHANNELL, J.—No doubt this case presents some difficulty, and as none of the authorities precisely cover it, I have to form my own opinion, and the conclusion I have come to is that the claim of the execution creditor must prevail. My reasons for coming to that conclusion are because I think it must be taken that these daily payments of £3 out of the takings of the business are payments to the judgment creditor on account of his debt made to him in consideration of his not pressing on his execution. Mr. Colam said that a compulsory payment such as this was not a payment in the ordinary course of business. The company were, however, in no way bound to make this agreement, nor was the judgment creditor compelled to forego his right to take the goods in the sense that the money was either paid or received under compulsion at all. It was apparently paid day by day as part payment of the company's debt, and I must take it that the sheriff entered into that arrangement with the assent of the execution creditor. The object of that arrangement, as it seems to me, was to benefit all parties concerned by providing a way by which the business could be carried on, and it seems to me that under that agreement the money paid was paid as part payment of a debt of the company. Robson v. Smith is an authority for saying that money so paid cannot be recovered. It is quite true that the debenture-holders have got a floating security over the whole of the goods of the company, but this being an agreement made by the debtor company whilst the debtor company was in fact carrying on business, and the purpose of the agreement being, as I have said, to enable it to carry on its business, the licence given by the debenture-holders to the company to carry on their business in the ordinary way was not determined. That being so, my judgment must be for the execution creditor with costs.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitor for the claimant, A. H. Crickmay.

Solicitors for the execution creditor, Hatchett-Jones & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) Dec. 9, 10.

GARBUTT (Appellant) v. STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE, &c., OF DURHAM (Respondents). (a.)

Police — Pension — Superannuation of constables — "Approved service"—Police Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 45), s. 1.

By section 1 of the Police Act, 1890, it is enacted that "every constable in a police force, if he has completed not less than twenty-five years' approved service . . . shall . . . be entitled without a medical certificate to retire and receive a pension for life."

Held, that such "approved service" must be a continuous service, and that, in computing the twenty-five years, separate and broken periods of service cannot be added together.

Case stated by the justices for the county of Durham.

This was an application made to the said justices, at quarter sessions, on behalf of the appellant, a retired police constable, by way of appeal against the refusal of the Standing Joint Committee to admit his claim to a pension under the provisions of the Police Act, 1890.

On the hearing of the application the appellant relied on a certificate of approved service for upwards of twenty-five years, which was produced in evidence, and a copy of which formed part of the case.

The certificate was dated the 1st of July, 1903, and was headed as the return of service of the appellant "recommended for an ordinary pension." The details of the certificate showed that the appellant joined the force on the 7th of September, 1876, and resigned on the 30th of April, 1881, making four years 236 days; that he was reinstated police constable on the 27th of August, 1881, and was called on to resign on the 9th of February, 1889, making a further period of seven years and 167 days; and that on the 1st of April, 1889, he was reinstated as a constable, and he retired as "long and faithful service class, the 1st of March, 1897," this making a further period of thirteen years and sixty-one days. "Total approved service, twenty-five years ninety-nine days." Below this was the following: "I certify that the term of approved service entered above has been diligent and faithful service within the meaning of section 4 of the Police Act, 1890. (Signed) H. WEBSTER, Acting Chief Constable."

(Footnote).—"If the constable has been advanced in class, promoted or reduced, state the date when. If he had quitted the service and rejoined, state the dates."

Details so required were all filled in in the above certificate.

The respondents tendered evidence to the effect that the service of the appellant during the said period had not in fact been diligent and faithful service, and contended that the certificate related to the period of service and was not conclusive evidence, and that the acting chief constable could not certify as to character which appeared from the police records, and that the joint committee were entitled to exercise their discretion as to granting or withholding a pension on the ground of misconduct. The appellant contended that it was not open to the respondents to contradict the certificate, and that such evidence was therefore inadmissible.

On this point the justices agreed with the contention of the appellant and refused to receive evidence as to the character of the appellant.

The respondents further contended that upon the true construction of the Act it was necessary that the whole period of service of twenty-five years should be continuous in order to entitle the appellant to a pension in respect thereof.

The appellant contended that the period need not be continuous, and further contended that, even so, the certificate of approved service once given precluded the respondents from raising this point.

The justices considered that the Act required that the whole period should be continuous, and, inasmuch as the certificate showed on its face that there had been two breaks in the period of service, they considered that it was open to the respondents to raise this point, and they accordingly dismissed the application of the appellant.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the justices were right in dismissing the application on the ground stated, and if they were not right, whether they were right in rejecting the evidence tendered on behalf of the respondents.

Pickersgill (Simey with him), for the appellant.—The service need not be a continuous service. The certificate given to the appellant is conclusive in the appellant's favour, and therefore he is entitled to a pension. Section 1 (a) provides that a constable who has completed twenty-five years' approved service shall be entitled to a pension for life. Section 4 (1) defines "approved service" as such service as may, after deductions in respect of sickness, misconduct, or neglect of duty, be certified under the order of the police authority. The certificate given to the appellant certifies that his "term of approved service" had been "diligent and faithful service within the meaning of section 4," and the respondents, therefore, have bound themselves to treat the appellant's service as "approved service." Section 5, sub-section 5, clearly shows that the service need not be continuous, as it refers to the time elapsing between retirement and commencement of service again as not to be reckoned as approved service in respect of the provisions as to pension. All separate periods of service may be added together in computing the twenty-five years.

He referred also to section 30, sub-section 8, and Walker v. Simpson, [1903] A. C. 208, 51 W. R. Dig. 115.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Montague-Shearman, K.C. (Meynell with him), for the respondents.—There is nothing in the Act which says whether the service must be continuous or not, but various sections indicate that the Legislature must have intended that in order to be entitled to a pension for life the constable's service should be a continuous service. Section 5 shows that unless the suspension is recognized by the Act it shall not count as continuous service. Section 4, sub-section 5, and section 21 clearly show that the service must be continuous.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case is not free from difficulty, and I certainly think it is very desirable that the matter should be put beyond all question by some amending statute or by some regulation, if such can be made, which will produce that result. I am, however, of opinion that, upon the construction of the Act, the service referred to must be continuous service. In this case there is, as far as I can gather, no certificate of the "police authority," and no order of the "police authority" under section 4, sub-section 1, has been produced before us. The document before us is the certificate signed by the acting chief constable of the police under sub-section 2 of section 4, and it shows a service of twenty-five years and ninety-nine days made up of three periods, there being a break of four months in 1881, when the constable resigned on the 30th of April and was reinstated on the 27th of August. Then he was called upon to resign in February, 1899, and was reinstated in April of the same year. We must take it that either he was called upon to resign or that he did resign, therefore what we have to consider is whether "approved service" in this Act means continuous service or service that may be made up by several separate periods, and although I do not come to this conclusion without doubt, I think, looking at the Act, that there are certain clauses which show that it must have been meant to have been continuous service. Section 1 speaks of a constable completing not less than twenty-five years' "approved service." That of itself does not decide the case, but it rather points to the period being completed as a continuous period. Therefore we have got to see what light is thrown upon it by the other provisions. Section 4, sub-section 1, says that: "The service of a constable for the purposes of this Act shall be subject to such deductions in respect of sickness, misconduct, or neglect of duty as may be made therefrom in pursuance of the regulations of the force to which the constable belongs; and the expression 'approved service' shall for the purposes of this Act mean such services as may after such deductions as aforesaid (if any) be certified under the order of the police authority to have been diligent and faithful service." This rather supports Mr. Shearman's view, because it speaks of deductions in respect of sickness, misconduct, or neglect of duty which would refer to the period when the man was serving, but it is not conclusive, because it is quite possible to apply these words to the several periods of service, and to make a deduction for each period so that the total of the various periods will total twenty five years. We have thus an enactment which is not a conclusive one, but which I think favours the view of the service being continuous. If the learned counsel's argument on behalf of the appellant is correct, that all periods are to be added together, then why should sub-section 5 be added, which enacts, shortly, that where a constable with the knowledge of the police authority belongs to the army reserve, and is called out for training or for permanent service, he shall be entitled, on returning to the police force, to reckon any approved service which he was entitled to reckon at the commencement thereof. Yet one sees that in such a case it has to be provided for by express enactment that the man should be entitled to add together his separate periods of service. That seems to show that absence without leave shall not be considered as part of the approved service in the force. Then, in section 5, which is the section which deals with disablement and incapacity during service, we find a corresponding provision, which, again, I think, is absolutely unnecessary if Mr. Pickersgill's argument that all the separate periods of service may be added together. In the face of these two provisions I think it is a strong thing to say that if a man chooses to absent himself from the force, for however long a period or for whatever purposes he likes, he can claim that the twenty-five years service can be made up of separate and broken periods. Then section 21 refers to a man being retired without a pension and it says that: "If a constable, not having been dismissed, leaves a police force without a pension or gratuity, the police authority may, if it seems to them just, pay him the whole or part of the rateable deductions which have been made from his pay. Again, I think that section is not conclusive because it may be said that if a man does not claim any repayment of the deductions, he ought to be allowed when he goes on service at the latter period, to add the two, three, or four periods together. I agree that that section is not conclusive, but it does seem to me to support the view that the Legislature was dealing with continuous service, and was therefore providing for a man going out of the service before the time when he is in a position to claim a pension. For these reasons I think the decision of the justices was right and that this appeal should be dismissed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is impossible to say, reading these sections, that they are consistent with the argument that any number of separate periods of service may be added together for the purpose of procuring the pension. It is an instance among very numerous instances in Acts of Parliament where by the insertion of one word the framers of the Act might have made their meaning perfectly clear, whereas, in this instance, in order to see what the meaning of the Act is, it is necessary to look through a number of sections to see whether the service was intended to be a continuous service or not. If the framers of the Act have used the words "continuous service" there would have been no difficulty whatever.

KENNEDY, J.—I think it is strange, and also very unfortunate, that the Legislature in passing this Act has left to those who have to adjudicate upon it to infer that which is obviously a most important part of the scheme—namely, whether the right to pensions is dependent upon a continuous and uninterrupted service, or whether the service may be made up of various terms of service with breaks between them. It would have been very easy to have inserted in the Act, as my brother Lawrance has pointed out, the words "continuous service." I am not prepared to dissent from the judgment which has been pronounced by my Lord and by my brother Lawrance, but it is not absent from my mind that that decision certainly cannot tend to enhance the popularity of the police service which is of the highest importance to the community.

Appeal dismissed with leave to appeal.

Solicitors for appellant, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for A. Geipel, West Hartlepool.

Solicitors for respondents, Maude & Tunnicliffe, for Simey, Son, & Iliff, Sunderland.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.) April 19.

WILSON v. TWAMLEY. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Public-house—Covenant by lessee—Not to do or suffer to be done any act whereby licence may be lost—Offence against Licensing Acts by sub-lessee of assignee—Action against assignee.

A lease of a licensed public-house contained a covenant by the lessee on behalf of himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, that he or they would not do or suffer to be done on the premises any act whereby the licence might be forfeited or the renewal withheld. The lessee assigned the lease, and the assignee sub-let the premises. The sub-lessee was convicted of an offence against the Licensing Acts, and in consequence thereof the licence was not renewed. In an action by the lessor against the assignee for breach of the covenant,

Held, that the assignee could not be said to have "suffered" an act done by his sub-lessee.

Appeal from the judgment of Kennedy, J., on further consideration after the trial of an action with a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of a covenant contained in a lease of a licensed public-house, in consequence of which the licence was lost.

On the 29th of August, 1892, the plaintiff's late husband granted a lease of a public-house known as the "Green Man and Still," in Cowcross-street, Smithfield, for the term of thirty-five years from the 29th of September, 1892, at a yearly rent of £80. By the terms of the lease the lessee covenanted on behalf of himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, that he would use the premises as a public-house or beerhouse only, and that he would carry on or suffer on the premises or any part thereof no other trade, business, or manufacture without the previous consent in writing of the lessor, and would not do or permit to be done on the premises or any part thereof any act or thing which might be a nuisance to the lessor or adjoining occupiers, and particularly would not do or suffer to be done on the said premises or any part thereof any act whereby the licences necessary for using the premises as an inn, beerhouse, or public-house, with billiards, as then used, might be forfeited, endorsed, or the renewal withheld, and would at all times take proper legal steps and proceedings and endeavour to procure a renewal of the necessary licences for so using the same.

By a deed dated the 5th of December, 1892, the lessee, with the consent of the lessor, assigned his interest in the lease to the defendant.

On the death of the lessor in 1894 the freehold of the premises became vested in the plaintiff.

At some time prior to 1901 the defendant granted a sub-lease of the premises to one Kingston. The sub-lease contained a similar covenant with regard to the licence to that contained in the original lease.

On the 7th of December, 1901, Kingston was convicted of an offence under section 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872, with the result that the licence of the house was indorsed, and a renewal of it was subsequently refused by the licensing justices.

The plaintiff alleged that the loss of the licence constituted a serious injury to the reversion of the property, and that the act bringing about this result being done by the sub-tenant of the defendant, constituted a breach by the defendant of the covenant not to suffer any act to be done on the premises, whereby the licence might be forfeited or indorsed, or the renewal withheld.

At the trial the jury provisionally assessed the damages at £150.

On further consideration Kennedy, J., came to the conclusion that the defendant had not "suffered" the act to be done on the premises, and was therefore not liable. He accordingly directed judgment to be entered for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

English Harrison, K.C., and C. Herbert Smith, for the plaintiff.—The learned judge treated the case as governed by Bryant v. Hancock & Co., 46 W. R. 386, [1898] 1 Q. B. 716, [1899] A. C. 442, 48 W. R. Dig. 88. The decision of the Court of Appeal in that case turned on the word "wilfully," which occurred in the covenant there, but which does not occur in the covenant in this case. The stress laid on that word shows that, if it had been absent, the decision would have been otherwise.

Bray, K.C., and Frank Russell, for the defendant.—A lessee is not the servant or agent of his lessor; and the lessor cannot be said to have "suffered" an act done by the lessee: Toleman v. Portbury, 18 W. R. 579, L. R. 5 Q. B. 288.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action by the lessor of a public-house against an assignee of the lessee for breach of the following covenant on the part of the lessee: "And will use the said premises as a public-house or beerhouse only, and will carry on or suffer on the said premises or any part thereof no other trade, business, or manufacture during the said term without the previous consent in writing of the lessor, and will not do or permit to be done on the said premises or any part thereof any act or thing which may be a nuisance or annoyance to the lessor or adjoining occupiers . . . and particularly will not do or suffer to be done on the said premises or any part thereof any act whereby the licences necessary for using the said messuage and premises as an inn, beerhouse, or public-house, with billiards, as now used, may be forfeited or indorsed or the renewal withheld, and will at all times take proper legal steps and proceedings, and endeavour to procure a renewal of the necessary licences for so using the same." The defendant sub-let the premises, and during the sub-lessee's tenure of the premises an offence was committed against the licensing laws, in consequence of which a renewal of the licence was subsequently refused. Kennedy, J., held that the plaintiff failed to prove any breach of covenant, because, the defendant having sub-let the premises, there was no connection of agency between him and the sub-lessee by virtue of which the act of the sub-lessee could be said to be an act suffered by the defendant. The learned judge thought the case was concluded by the decision in Bryant v. Hancock & Co. The same case is also relied on by the plaintiff, who contends that it is really in his favour. But when I look at the terms of the covenant in Bryant v. Hancock & Co. I do not think that the decision in that case is applicable as suggested by the plaintiff. The covenant there was a peculiar one and consisted of two parts, the first part being absolute in its terms and the second being qualified by the introduction of the word "wilfully." Stress was laid on that word as showing that what would primâ facie come within the terms of the first part of the covenant could not be intended to do so, and that the subject-matter of the first part must be limited in order that effect might be given to the second part, which was qualified by the word "knowingly." That word does not occur in the covenant in this case, and in my opinion its presence or absence is immaterial, as the reason why so much stress was laid on it in Bryant v. Hancock & Co. is irrelevant to this case. The defendant cannot be said to have done or suffered to be done the act on which the plaintiff relies as a breach of covenant, because the relationship of sub-lessor and sub-lessee does not at all involve the relationship of principal and agent. If the defendant had put in a manager of the public-house, and the manager had done or suffered the act in question, the case would have come within the covenant. The manager would have been the defendant's alter ego on the premises, and the defendant must have taken the risk of what happened through his acts. But, the defendant having sub-let the premises, the case is different. I am of opinion that the words "do or suffer to be done" primâ facie involve the doing of some act or some abstention from action by the covenantor himself or by some person standing in the relation of agent to him, and that a lessee does not stand in the relation of agent to his lessor. The case of Toleman v. Portbury is an authority to this effect. I therefore think that the appeal fails.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Pearse & Rowse.

Solicitors for the defendant, Beaumont, Son, & Bigden.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Jan. 13; March 7.

KEITH v. GANCIA. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Estoppel in pais—Mortgage by sub-demise before Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41)—Lease by mortgagor—Foreclosure—Underlease—License—Representation.

A lessee granted a mortgage by way of sub-demise for the residue of the term comprised in his lease except the last three days thereof before the Conveyancing Act, 1881. He subsequently granted a sub-lease of the mortgaged premises to G., without the consent of the mortgagee; and this sub-lease contained a provision for re-entry in case the sub-lessee became bankrupt. The mortgagee foreclosed, and after the foreclosure received the rent from G. G. granted another underlease with the license of the mortgagee. In the license it was stated that the reversion expectant on the determination of G.'s term was vested in the mortgagee. The mortgagee subsequently assigned his interest to the plaintiff. G. having become bankrupt, the plaintiff claimed a right to determine the sub-lease granted to G.

Held, that G. and his underlessee having altered their positions on the faith of representations made by the mortgagee that G.'s lease was subsisting, the plaintiff, who stood in the shoes of the mortgagee, was estopped from disputing its validity.

Decision of Joyce, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J.

By a lease, dated the 11th of December, 1880, vaults and offices under the Princess Theatre were, with other hereditaments, demised to Walter Gooch, as to part thereof for a term of 60¼ years from the 6th of April, 1880; as to another part thereof for the term of 60 years from the 9th of July, 1880; and as to the residue thereof for the term of 59¼ years from the 6th of April, 1881, at the rent therein mentioned.

By a deed dated the 9th of March, 1881, Walter Gooch demised the premises comprised in the lease of the 11th of December, 1880, to W. T. Neve for the residue of the several terms of years granted thereby, except the last three days of each term, by way of mortgage for securing payment of £20,000, with interest thereon. The deed gave the mortgagee a power of sale, and it was provided that in the event of a sale the mortgagee would stand possessed of the last three days of the terms respectively in trust for the purchaser.

The premises comprised in the lease became before the 24th of March, 1892, vested in Harriet Gooch for the residue of the several terms of years, but subject to the mortgage to Neve. By a lease dated the 24th of March, 1892, Harriet Gooch purported to demise the vaults and offices, which were part of the premises comprised in the lease of December, 1880, to the defendants R. Gancia & Co. (Limited) from the 25th of March, 1892, for twenty-one years at the yearly rent of £140. This deed provided that if the defendant company should be wound up under the provisions of the Companies Acts the lessor might re-enter upon the demised premises, and thereupon the term thereby granted should absolutely determine. Gancia & Co. entered into possession of the premises thus demised to them.

A foreclosure action was brought by Neve against Harriet Gooch, and on the 21st of March, 1895, an order was made that she should henceforth stand absolutely foreclosed from all right and equity of redemption of and in the premises comprised in the mortgage of the 9th of March, 1881. From the date of this order until the death of Neve, Gancia & Co. paid to him the rent of £140 reserved by the lease of the 24th of March, 1892.

Neve died on the 8th of March, 1899. On the 9th of August, 1900, Neve's executors assigned to the plaintiff B. F. Keith the premises comprised in the lease of December, 1880, for the residue then unexpired of the several terms of years thereby granted, except the last three days of each of the terms, and for all such estates and interests in the nominal reversions expectant on the determination of the same terms respectively as the executors had power to assign, and the assignment was expressed to be made subject, as to such parts of the premises as were subject thereto, to, but with the benefit of, the lease of the 24th of March, 1892. Subsequently to the 9th of August, 1900, Gancia & Co. paid the rent of £140 to the plaintiff.

On the 27th of October, 1899, Gancia & Co. had executed an underlease of part of the premises comprised in the lease of the 24th of March, 1892, to the defendant Sinclair from the 25th of December, 1899, for a term of thirteen years and three months less ten days then next ensuing at a rent of £240.

This underlease was made in persuance of a licence dated the 13th of October, 1899, by which the executors of Neve, describing themselves as "the persons in whom the reversion expectant on the determination of the term granted by the lease of the 24th of March, 1892, is now vested" granted a license to Gancia & Co. to demise to Sinclair the vaults, &c., for the residue of the term of twenty-one years granted by the lease of the 24th of March, 1892, less the last ten days thereof.

Sinclair was in possession of the premises comprised in this underlease.

The London and Westminster Bank, as equitable mortgagees of Gancia & Co., were in possession of the remainder of the premises comprised in the lease of the 24th of March, 1892.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 8th of October, 1902, an order was made by the High Court for the winding up of Gancia & Co. under the Companies Acts.

The plaintiff then brought the present action against Gancia & Co., their equitable mortgagees, and the defendant Sinclair, claiming possession of the vault and premises comprised in the lease of the 24th of March, 1892, on the ground that by reason of the winding-up order a right had accrued to him to re-enter on the vaults and premises and determine the tenancy of Gancia & Co., and that he had served a notice upon them demanding possession accordingly.

The defendant Sinclair counterclaimed, asking for relief against the forfeiture under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and for an order that the vaults, &c., comprised in the deed of the 27th of November, 1899, should vest in him for the residue of the term thereby granted and upon the conditions thereof.

The other defendants also took out a summons asking for relief against the forfeiture, and this summons came on for hearing with the trial of the action and counterclaim.

Joyce, J., dismissed the action. The order as drawn up declared that the underlease of the 24th of March, 1892, was binding on the plaintiff, and ordered that the defendants be relieved against the forfeiture of that underlease occasioned by the winding up of Gancia & Co.

The plaintiff appealed.

Levett, K.C., and Simpson, for the appellant.—The mortgage of the 9th of March, 1881, having been made before section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, came into operation, the lease of the 24th of March, 1892, does not bind the mortgagee, as it was granted without his consent. The only effect of the payment of rent to the mortgagee and its acceptance by him is to create a yearly tenancy upon the terms of the lease so far as they are consistent with a yearly tenancy. The license to sub-let cannot operate as a new lease or an agreement for a new lease, and the grant of the license creates no estoppel against the plaintiff.

Hughes, K.C., and F. L. Wright, for Gancia & Co. and their mortgagees.—The plaintiff claims through Neve's executors and he can be in no better position than they would have been in this action. By their license to the sub-lease, Neve's executors in fact represented to both Gancia & Co. and to Sinclair that the lease to Gancia & Co. was valid, and Gancia & Co. and Sinclair altered their positions on the faith of this representation. This creates an estoppel in pais which precludes the plaintiff from now disputing the validity of the lease to Gancia & Co. We also submit that under the foreclosure absolute Neve placed himself in exactly the same position as Mrs. Gooch, and cannot dispute a lease which she granted.

Younger, K.C., and E. Ford, for the defendant Sinclair.

Levett, K.C., replied.

The following authorities were cited in course of the arguments: Brown v. Storey, 1 Man. & Gr. 117; In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., 33 Ch. D. 16, 35 W. R. Dig. 38; Picard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & E. 469, at p. 474; Willmott v. Barber, 28 W. R. 911, 15 Ch. D. 96; Heath v. Pugh, 29 W. R. 904, 6 Q. B. D. 345; Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Ex. Rep. 654; Cairncross v. Lorrimer, 3 Macqueen 827, 9 W. R. Dig. 1; Corbett v. Plowden, 32 W. R. 667, 25 Ch. D. 678; Tarn v. Turner, 39 Ch. D. 456, 36 W. R. Dig. 138; Cuthbertson v. Irving, 6 H. & N. 135; Carson's Real Property Statutes, p. 516; Burton on Real Property, par. 850; Smith's Leading Cases, vol. 2, Notes to Duchess of Kingston's case; Woodfall's Law of Landlord and Tenant (17 ed.), p. 236; Foa's Law of Landlord and Tenant (3rd ed.), p. 429; and Ashburner on Mortgages, p. 241.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 7.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., after stating the facts, said: Now, Joyce, J., in dealing with the action, puts it in this way. He says, suppose in November, 1899 (that is to say, before the assignment to the plaintiff), the executors of Neve and Gancia & Co. and the Sinclairs had entered into a tripartite agreement which recited that the executors of Neve were the reversioners of Gancia's underlease, and that they had been asked to consent under the terms of that underlease to the granting of the sub-lease by Gancia & Co., and that Gancia & Co. had thereby agreed expressly to grant the sub-lease to the Sinclairs; if such a document as that had been made and executed by the three parties, it is absolutely clear that the executors of Neve could not after that have turned round and asserted their paramount title as mortgagees, or as representing mortgagees, and have asserted or objected that Gancia had no underlease at all. Nor could they have asserted that either as against Gancia or against Sinclair. The learned judge, having said this, goes on to say that in his opinion what happened is really equivalent to such an agreement in fact, and he held that the executors of Neve, whose testator had foreclosed, were, as reversioners of that underlease, in truth and in substance parties to the sub-lease to Sinclair and fully concurred in it. I am not quite sure what this means. In the first place, I assume that in the supposed tripartite agreement the learned judge means that Gancia & Co. had agreed to grant a sub-lease, and that the executors had agreed that Gancia & Co. should do so, and that he does not mean by the supposed agreement that the executors agreed themselves to grant a lease to the Sinclairs. If I am right, the supposed agreement would have been carried out, so far as the grant of the lease by Gancia to the Sinclairs is concerned; and the only agreement which it could have been said that the executors had broken would have been an implied agreement that they would not, in contravention of the recitals, deny that they were reversioners of Gancia's underlease, and invalidate the consent which they purported to give, as reversioners of Gancia's lease, to his sub-lease by the assertion of a paramount title inconsistent with the subsistence of Gancia's sub-lease. But this view of the tripartite agreement, even if it can be supported, is hardly consistent with the result indicated by Joyce, J., as following on the assumption that what happened was equivalent to such an agreement in fact, because he says: "I hold that the executors of Neve, whose testator had foreclosed, were, as reversioners of Gancia's underlease, in truth and in substance parties to the sub-lease to Sinclair and fully concurred in it." Such a result would not follow as the consequence of a breach of an implied covenant not to invalidate the sub-lease to be granted by Gancia to Sinclair. Such an implied covenant would not make the executors parties to the sub-lease, or make them concur in it, in the ordinary sense of that word. I am not quite sure that the learned judge, in the passages which I have quoted, has not somewhat confused the agreement which he suggests with the estoppels arising on it, which I will consider presently; but it is sufficient to say at present that no estoppel preventing the executors from denying that they were the reversioners of Gancia's lease could operate as a grant by them of a lease to Sinclair on the terms of the sub-lease granted by Gancia to Sinclair. There is the difficulty also that the sub-lease, whoever granted it, was required by the Real Property Act, 1845, to be under seal, and that any agreement relating to land has, by the Statute of Frauds, to be in writing; and it is not easy to extract from the documents any implied agreement which would support the learned judge's view. Moreover, I am not satisfied that any agreement can be suggested, as having been entered into without writing, which could be supported by part performance, and which would afford a defence in this action.

I propose now to deal with the question whether estoppel will enable the defendants to successfully defend this action. If the conduct of the plaintiff enables the defendants to do so, I do not trouble myself about the exact form of the pleadings. It is plain that all parties came into court prepared to try the question of what is the effect of the plaintiff's assuming the character of reversioner and inducing the defendants to alter their position. That being so, all necessary amendments must be treated as made. That there is an estoppel preventing Neve's executors, the plaintiff Keith's predecessors in title, and therefore Keith, from averring as against Gancia & Co. or Sinclair that he really was not such reversioner I do not doubt, for it seems to me plain that the executors by their words and conduct wilfully caused both Gancia and Sinclair to believe in the existence of that state of things, and induced them to act on that belief, so as to alter their own previous position; and it seems to me that Keith, who claims through the executors, is concluded from averring against either Gancia or Sinclair a different state of things as existing at the same time. Now it is true that, where there is an estoppel in pais of this sort, the estoppel cannot go further than to prevent the party estopped from putting the party who has acted on his representation in a worse position than he would have been if that representation had been true. Then what would have been the position of Sinclair if Neve's executors had really had vested in them the reversion expectant upon the determination of Mrs. Gooch's lease to Gancia? And observe this is quite a possible state of things, because there is no reason why they, being the assignees by way of sub-demise of Mrs. Gooch's lease of the 11th of December, 1880, from Bailey, should not have taken an assignment from her of the reversion expectant upon the determination of the underlease granted by her to Gancia. I take it that Neve's executors, as the assignees of Mrs. Gooch, would no more have been entitled, as between Gancia (Limited) and themselves, to deny Mrs. Gooch's title than Mrs. Gooch herself would have been. The result of this is that the plaintiff's action fails. He is not entitled to recover possession of the premises, because he is estopped from denying that he is reversioner in respect of the lease granted by Mrs. Gooch to Gancia, and not the less so because at the time he represented himself as such he was as mortgagee entitled to say that the lease by Mrs. Gooch to Gancia did not bind him. I think that this estoppel against the plaintiff arises equally as between himself and Sinclair and also as between himself and Gancia. Both Sinclair and Gancia (Limited) altered their positions by reason of the assertion by Neve's executors that the reversion attendant upon the determination of Gancia's lease was vested in them. By reason of this assertion Gancia granted and Sinclair accepted the sub-lease. This did not make either Gancia or Sinclair the tenant of Neve's executors. The estoppel simply prevents Neve's executors, or their successor, the plaintiff, from denying that Mrs. Gooch's reversion was vested in them as alleged by them, or from setting up an overriding title inconsistent with the license by them as reversioners authorizing the sub-lease to Sinclair. Moreover, the conduct both of Neve's executors and of the plaintiff since the granting of the sub-lease of 1899 is only consistent with a continued assertion by them respectively of their position as reversioners and the validity of the sub-lease. I refer to the assignment to the plaintiff being expressly subject to the sub-lease of 1899, and to the plaintiff's notice to Gancia (Limited) to repair. I do not think that it makes the slightest difference that, on the admitted facts, and in particular the payment of the rent reserved under the underlease of 1892 to Neve's executors and to Keith, a tenancy from year to year under Neve's executors or Keith would ordinarily be inferred. This would be only part of the truth which the plaintiff would be estopped from denying. There is no evidence whatever that Gancia was aware of the true position of affairs.

For the reasons which I have given I think that the judgment of Joyce, J., ought to be supported and this appeal dismissed with costs. I should wish to add that I entirely agree with the judgment so far as it relates to the relief against forfeiture. And with regard to the counterclaim by Sinclair for a vesting order, which Joyce, J., had ordered to stand over, I see at present no reason why such order should not be made under section 4 of the Conveyancing Act of 1892.

ROMER and STIRLING, L.JJ., concurred.

Solicitors, Batten, Proffitt, & Scott; C. M. Barker; Routh, Stacey, & Castle.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 29; March 1.

TOWERS v. AFRICAN TUG CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Directors—Payment of interim *dividend out of capital—Ultrà vires—Mistake—Acquiescence by shareholders—Shareholder's action—Form—Proceeds of* ultrà vires act in plaintiff's possession—Right to maintain action.

A shareholder in a limited company, who has received an unearned interim dividend paid by the directors out of capital under a bonâ fide mistake, knowing full well that it was an ultrà vires payment, and that the directors would eventually repay the amount, cannot afterwards, suing either individually or on behalf of all the other shareholders, maintain an action against the directors for the repayment of this dividend into the coffers of the company, if at the time of bringing the action he had the proceeds of the ultrà vires act in his pocket.

Decision of Byrne, J. (reported 20 Times L. R. 28), reversed.

Dictum of Brett, L.J., in Flitcroft's case, 31 W. R. 174, on p. 176, 21 Ch. D. 519, on pp. 534, 535, approved.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. (reported 20 Times L. R. 28).

The plaintiffs were W. H. Towers and P. Wedlake. Towers was at one time the secretary of the defendant company, and Wedlake was a director of the same company, and they sued on behalf of themselves and the other shareholders of the company, except those that were defendants—viz., the company itself and the other two directors, named Alexander and Wood, claiming payment by the two defendant directors, as due to the company, first, of a sum of £375, which they alleged ought to have been recovered against an ex-director instead of compromising with him, and secondly, of £127 10s., which they affirmed had been wrongfully paid as a dividend out of capital. Afterwards all the other shareholders were joined as defendants by order, as they stated they acquiesced in both the compromise and the dividend.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants counterclaimed recovery of the shares of the dividend received by the plaintiffs, if they should succeed on the dividend point, which liability was not disputed.

The company was incorporated in 1896, and there were three directors, the plaintiff Wedlake and the two defendants Alexander and Wood, Towers being, as above stated, the secretary. On the balance-sheet for 1899, made up to the end of July (the end of the company's financial year), there was a debit balance of £756 10s. 11d.

In March, 1900, the plaintiff Towers stated that between the 1st of August and the 31st of December, 1899, the company had made a profit of £300, but that until the debit balance was paid off the interim dividend which it was proposed to pay would be payable out of capital, and would be therefore an illegal payment. However, a resolution having been signed by the defendants Alexander and Wood in favour of paying this dividend, it was paid. The plaintiff Wedlake was not a party to this transaction. On the assets side of the balance-sheet up to the 31st of July, 1900, there was an entry of "Dividends not earned, £127 10s.," and to make this correspond with the liabilities there was an entry on the other side of the ledger "Profit and loss account, as at the 31st of July, 1899, £756 10s. 11d., less profit for year, £245 18s. 4d., equals £510 12s. 7d." Both the directors and shareholders approved these entries at a meeting in September, 1900, although they had before them the auditor's report, which explained these items, that the interim dividend was unearned and therefore illegal, and that the directors would be liable as it was payment out of capital. The plaintiffs claimed payment of this interim dividend, viz., the sum of £127 10s., by the defendants Alexander and Wood to the company, as its directors and trustees.

Byrne, J., held at any early stage that the first claim of the plaintiffs could not be sustained; but with regard to the second claim he held that the directors must replace the sum of £127 10s., with interest at 4 per cent., but as the company had recently received a windfall, he decreed that the order should not be acted on until after the next general meeting, as in the meantime it was possible to put the accounts in a form which would render it unnecessary to have the amount actually paid. His lordship further found that there was no question as to the dividend having been paid bonâ fide. The defendants were granted judgment on their counterclaim, but their order would be stayed also.

The defendant directors appealed.

Eve, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the appellants.

They cited In re Exchange Banking Co. (Flitcroft's case), 31 W. R. 174, 21 Ch. D. 519; In re Alexandra Palace Co., 31 W. R. 808, 21 Ch. D. 149; Russell v. Wakefield Waterworks Co., 23 W. R. 887, 20 Eq. 474; Ramskill v. Edwards, 34 W. R. 96, 31 Ch. D. 100; Moxham v. Grant, 48 W. R. 130, [1899] 1 Q. B. 480, [1900] 1 Q. B. 88.

Norton, K.C., and F. Evans, for the respondent company.

They cited In re Alexander and Automatic Telephone Co., 48 W R 546, 2 Ch. D. 56; Ashbury Carriage Co. v. Riche, 24 W. R. 794, 9 L. R. Exch. 264, L. R. 7 H. L. 653.

Eve, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—On the whole, I do not think the plaintiffs are entitled to any relief here. It would not be very satisfactory if we had to determine this case ultimately upon the pleadings. I quite feel the force of what counsel for the respondents said as to there being the allegation in paragraph 14 of the statement of claim in the action that "the plaintiff Wedlake was never consulted as to or took part in the declaration of payment of the said 5 per cent. dividend." I quite agree that when you come to look at the defence there is no denial of the allegation in the 14th paragraph of the statement of claim. But it does not seem to me that that disposes of the whole case—I mean, it does not dispose of the whole of the case, even if you take the allegation in paragraph 14 as having been admitted by the defendants, because the truth of the matter is that that allegation in paragraph 14 is quite consistent with Wedlake having received this dividend with full knowledge of all the facts. If that is so, the matters in paragraph 14 do not in any way negative the incapacity of the plaintiff (Wedlake) to sue in this action. But that is, in all probability, the true state of things. I mean that it is in all probability true that although Wedlake may not have been consulted as to the declaration and payment, he was perfectly well aware of all that was being done, and that is strongly confirmed by the fact that the counterclaim alleges in so many words that the dividend paid to the plaintiffs on their holdings amounted to so and so, giving the figures, which the plaintiffs took and have ever since retained with full notice of all the facts relating thereto. I believe that that is true, not only because the plaintiffs, when they come to plead to the counterclaim, seem to me, on the face of the pleadings, to admit the truth of that, but also when one turns to the minute book and sees the minutes which are there, and in particular the minute of the meeting of the 14th of September, 1900, at which Wedlake was present. I cannot doubt that he must have been perfectly well aware of all the facts connected with the declaration and payment of this dividend and the state of the accounts at the time. In that state of things, what ought to be done in this action? There is no doubt that the payment of this interim dividend was an ultrà vires payment. I start with the assumption that one is bound to make, that if you have got an act done by a company which is ultrà vires, no confirmation by a shareholder—not even by every member of the company—can convert that which was ultrà vires, into something intra vires. It always must be ultrà vires. As is pointed out in one or two of the cases, the result of that is, if the company are plaintiffs, no amount of acquiescence or resolution by the shareholders can form an answer to the action by the company for the reinstatement of things in the state in which they would have been but for the ultrà vires act complained of. But, to my mind, it is a different thing where the action is brought by a shareholder on behalf of himself and other shareholders. I am assuming in this case that this was one of those cases in which the facts were such that the men ought to be able to sue in a representative action for the purpose of preventing things being done in reference to the company in which they are interested, and which might damnify the company by reason of their being ultrà vires. I assume that an action not only to prevent, but to remedy, matters that have been done ultrà vires is an action which can be brought in the form in which this action is brought. But although that is so, my own judgment is that this is an action which has to be brought by the plaintiffs personally. It is an action which they cannot bring without having an interest; it is an action which a stranger could not bring. Under these circumstances, what is it we have to ask ourselves here? If it be the fact, as I think it is, that these plaintiffs knew of all these things which have been done, received the dividends with full knowledge of all the facts, and then brought this action with the money in their pockets, ought they to be allowed to bring this action in consequence of their personal interest in the matter? I think not. I think that an action could not be brought by an individual shareholder, complaining of this matter which is ultrà vires, if he himself had in his pocket, at the time he brought the action, the proceeds of that very ultrà vires act. I think, in the same way, it does not alter matters that he says he is suing on behalf of himself and others. I think that that which ought to make us say he ought not to bring the action, ought equally to make us say that he ought not to be the peg upon which the action is to be hung for the benefit of others. Assuming that to be so, what answer is sought to be made here? I think counsel for the respondents was disposed to put the only logical answer that could be put, and to say that that the very wrongdoer himself, who had got the proceeds of his wrongdoing in his pocket, might, if the matter was a matter which was ultrà vires, sue as a plaintiff to have it put right, and bring this action against the other shareholders who had benefited by it, and compel them to restore the capital which had been wrongfully paid out of them. But I do not think that is right, and if that is not right, I think that the return of the capital in the course of the trial after the action has been brought does not make things any better. Admittedly these dividends were still in the pockets of these people when they brought the action and were still in their pockets when the action came to be tried. It is quite true that in the course of the trial they said they were prepared to pay this money back. I think the form of admission was that they were content that judgment should go against them personally in respect of it; but I do not think that would make an action good which was not otherwise a good action in its inceptive. I must say in this particular case there is a strong inclination in my mind, not to give the plaintiffs the relief which they ask, because, starting with the fact that capital had been distributed in the payment of this interim dividend, that fact has been recognized by the company and by the shareholders, it appears on the face of the balance-sheet, and they were minded to replace this capital, and had every prospect of doing so, even out of the very current year's profits. Under these circumstances this action was wholly unnecessary and wholly uncalled for. It seems to me the court is not bound, when it sees that this ultrà vires act is in course of being put right, and will very shortly be put right, to give relief to a plaintiff of this sort, who has acquiesced in the wrong and who has got part of the proceeds of the wrong in his pocket. Under these circumstances I think the appeal ought to succeed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I also think this appeal ought to succeed. I desire to rest my decision on the particular facts in this case, and to abstain from laying down, so far as possible, any general rule on the question whether a shareholder, who has been party to the payment of a dividend out of capital, or who has taken the dividend with knowledge of all the facts, can, or cannot, come to the court afterwards and complain that the dividend has been paid out of capital, and seek to make either the directors or his fellow shareholders restore what they have paid or received with notice that the dividend has been improperly paid. Now, the facts are these: According to the balance-sheets of the company down to the 31st of July, 1899, there was a debit to the company—a loss—of £750 odd. In March of the following year, that is 1900, the company had made a certain amount of profit, but not enough to wipe out the debit balance of the 31st of July, 1899. In these circumstance the directors thought fit to pay an interim dividend, the amount of which was £127—a small sum. On the 31st of July, 1900, it appeared that the profit for the year amounted to £245 18s. 4d. That, of course, was not nearly enough to wipe out the debit balance of the previous year of over £750. The auditor made his report on the 20th of August, and pointed out by his report that they had no right to pay this dividend, and he, in drawing up the balance-sheet, put on the face of the balance-sheet an entry which shewed this—"overpaid dividend £36 odd." "Dividend not earned"—which is the question—"£127 10s." That balance-sheet is submitted to the shareholders and is approved by them; therefore it stands recorded on the face of the transactions of the company that a dividend has been improperly paid, and in any future dealing, supposing it was honest, the credit against the company has to be wiped out before any dividend can be properly paid.

That being so, in July, 1901, a further profit is made, which amounts to £510 odd, and on the 31st of July, 1902, the debit balance was completely wiped out, but not enough was made to pay a dividend. Then this took place in March, 1903, Towers, who was one of the plaintiffs, and who had been secretary and manager of the company, is dismissed from his office. Thereupon, on the 20th of March following, he and one of the directors, Wedlake, bring this action, and they charge that an ultra vires act had been committed, and that the £127 which had been lost by the company ought to be brought back into the coffers of the company, and that is the object of the action. Now, it is proved beyond all contradiction by documents under the hand of Towers that he was perfectly well aware of the circumstances in which the dividend was paid. It is not true that he is was in the same condition as Wedlake, but I think, having regard to the admissions which Wedlake made by not denying the allegation in the counterclaim, that he received his dividends with full notice of all the facts relating thereto, and submitted to judgment against himself on that footing; and also the high probabilities of the case, that inasmuch as he did not choose to go into the box and deny it, we ought to assume that, like his co-plaintiff, Towers, he knew the facts under which the dividends were declared. Now the form of action is one by the plaintiffs against the company and other shareholders, originally all the shareholders were not made parties, but at the request of the other shareholders they ultimately were made defendants to the action. So that we have here all the shareholders of the company. I think this is a form of action which, no doubt, in certain circumstances may be maintained. That a shareholder who had received a dividend without knowing anything of the illegality of it might maintain such an action I do not doubt; whether he ought not to return what he had received in respect of dividend is another question, and that may depend upon whether he had notice at the time when he took it of the acts complained of. Why is it that this form of action is allowed? The proper plaintiffs primâ facie, where it is sought to bring back the property of the company into its own coffers, is the company itself.

But there are exceptions to that rule, and what is the reason or meaning of the exceptions? Sir George Jessel, in the case which has been referred to of Russell v. Wakefield Waterworks Co., 23 W. R. 887, L. R. 20, Eq. 674, says this: "The exceptions turn very much on the necessity of the case—that is, the necessity of the court doing justice." Now this is a case, to begin with, in which no one suggests any fraud or dishonesty on the part of the directors or any one else. The directors who paid this dividend made a mistake, but no one charges anything more than a mistake. Everything was perfectly open. The fact was disclosed by the balance-sheet of 1900, the first balance-sheet which was submitted to the shareholders after the payment of the dividend. Further, the subsequent dealings seemed to show that the company did not intend to overlook the fact that the dividend had been improperly paid, or that there was an intention on the part of any one to do anything other than that which was right, and to make good the deficiency in the capital of the company which had been created by the payment of that dividend. That seems to me to have been the result of the subsequent balance-sheets. Moreover, what do we find the plaintiffs themselves doing? They acquiesce in this course being taken by the company from the 14th of September, when they certainly knew it, down to March, 1903, when this action was brought. It does not seem to have ever been suggested by any one party that an action should be brought by the company to recover this deficiency of the capital, and I think we ought to infer that what commended itself to the plaintiffs, as well as to the other shareholders, was to go on; the company was prosperous, it was wiping out year by year a great part of the deficiency, and ultimately, when the whole deficiency, including this deficiency in capital, had been replaced, to pay a proper dividend, and not until then. I do not think there was any necessity shown, looking at all the circumstances of the case, for the intervention of the court to compel the payment of this small sum—for such it really was—in the way in which the plaintiffs seek to throw the duty upon the court of acting. In truth, Byrne, J., although he gave a judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, was so far from desiring to press it that he directed it not to be enforced, in order to see what might be the result of the further trading, and whether the deficiency in capital would not be wiped out in the ordinary course. I think, on the whole, that justice would have been done if this action had been dismissed on the ground of the personal conduct of the plaintiffs.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In my view there is no question really here which admits of argument on one part of it—namely, that this was an illegal payment because it was a payment out of capital. Nor do I think that it can be contested, and it certainly was not contested by counsel for the appellants, that a transaction of that kind cannot be ratified by the shareholders. But in order to consider what is relevant in this case one must go further. An action in respect of, or arising out of an ultrâ vires transaction ought properly to be brought by the company, but it has been long well established that there are cases in which such an action may be maintained by a shareholder suing on behalf of himself and all other shareholders against the company as defendants. I will not pause to consider under what particular circumstances such an action may be maintained, but I assume that this is one of those cases in which such an action may be maintained, I mean in point of form. But I think it is equally clear that the action cannot be maintained by a common informer. A plaintiff in an action of this form must be a person who is really interested. Where you get that fact clearly established it seems to me impossible to avoid taking the next step, that all personal exceptions against the individual plaintiff must be gone into and considered before relief can be granted. Here I have no intention of going through all the facts again. I think it is clearly proved, as it is certainly admitted on the counterclaim, that both the plaintiffs took the dividend with full notice of all the facts relating thereto. It is also clear that they had the dividends, which they took with full notice that it was payment out of capital, in their pockets at the date when this action was commenced. Now, can a shareholder who has, with full notice of all the material facts, received part of the capital by way of dividend, and who still retains that money in his pocket, maintain an action against the directors who have paid the dividend? I think the true answer to that question is, he cannot. It may be that there is no direct authority on the point, but the dictum of Brett, L.J., in Flitcroft's case, 31 W. R. 174, 21 Ch. D. 519, is really, I think, very nearly in point. [His lordship referred to the case and a portion of Brett, L.J.'s, judgment on p. 535.] The view of Brett, L.J., was that shareholders who assumed to ratify could not have individually complained, and it seems to me to follow that a shareholder, having the money in his pocket which he knows is wrongfully there, ought not to be allowed to complain, and he cannot get any greater right of complaint because in form his action is an action by himself and all other the shareholders in the company. In fact he must succeed by his own merits, and not by the merits of the shareholders. Whether this action could have been maintained by these plaintiffs if before action brought they had repaid the amount of the dividend which they had received it is not necessary for us to decide. Speaking for myself I doubt whether that payment could have sufficed to put the plaintiffs in the right. Here, however, nothing of the kind happened. There is actually a judgment against the plaintiffs upon the counterclaim for payment of these sums. In my view, the judgment of the learned judge in the action ought to be set aside, the judgment on the counterclaim, with costs, being the only part of the order which can stand.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Gibson & Weldon, for Hannay & Hannay, South Shields; Smith, Rendall, & Dods, for H. Wilson Paton, Swansea.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — March 12.

In re FARNHAM'S TRUSTS.
LAW UNION AND CROWN INSURANCE CO. v. HARTOPP AND JAFFRAY. (a.)

Settlement—Capital and income—Cost of repairs—How borne as between them.

Where repairs are done in accordance with the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, to property subject to a marriage settlement, by persons other than the trustees of the settlement—who are not in a position to execute them—the costs cannot be claimed by the trustees as representing the corpus.

(a.) Reported by ALFRED C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Adjourned summons.

By an indenture of settlement made in 1882, on the occasion of his marriage, Mr. W. B. Farnham became entitled to a life interest in the income arising from moneys the subject of the settlement or from stocks and securities representing the same, and by the said indenture power was given to the trustees to invest moneys subject to the trusts in the purchase of lands or hereditaments of freehold or leasehold tenure.

In pursuance of such powers freehold and leasehold property, being 39, 40, and 41, Foster-lane, in the City of London, were purchased.

The plaintiffs were mortgagees of the life interest of the said W. B. Farnham, and by an order made in 1897 the said W. B. Farnham and his wife were absolutely debarred and foreclosed of all equity of redemption of, in, and to the mortgaged hereditaments therein mentioned, which included the said premises, 39, 40, and 41, Foster-lane.

In November, 1902, a notice was served under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and came to the hands of the defendants, the present trustees of the settlement, requiring certain sanitary works to be carried out on the said premises, 39, 40, and 41, Foster-lane, and as a result of correspondence that passed between the plaintiff company and the solicitors for the trustees, the plaintiff company took upon themselves the duty of completing the said sanitary works without prejudice to the question as to the liability of the said trustees.

The question for the court to determine was whether the trustees as representing the corpus of the settled estate, or the plaintiff company as representing the life interest of W. B. Farnham, was liable for the cost of executing the sanitary works carried out on the said premises, 39, 40, and 41, Foster-lane.

Warrington, K.C., and E. Ford, for the mortgagees.—The cost of the work done in accordance with the order of the City of London should be paid by the trustees, who could afterwards indemnify themselves out of the corpus: In re Tucker's Settled Estates, [1895] 2 Ch. 468; In re Lever, [1897] 1 Ch. 32; In re Copland's Settlement, [1900] 1 Ch. 326; In re Barney, [1894] 3 Ch. 562.

Lawrence, K.C., and Church, for the infants.—Work done ought to be payable out of income. The infants were not bound by any arrangement made by trustees with tenant for life. Here the trustees have incurred no liability, and so are not asking to be indemnified: Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 121. Here expenses were incurred by somebody not the trustees, so that the cases cited are not in point. If the Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 25, clauses 1-18, be relied on, then it is objected that the trustees have no money in hand: In re Millard's Settled Estates, [1893] 3 Ch. 116; In re Thomas, [1900] 1 Ch. 319.

Stamp, for the trustees.

KEKEWICH, J.—There is no money in the hands of the trustees, so section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, cannot be relied on. The sanitary authority continually insists on repairs being done, and on drainage being put right, and the court deals with the costs of such works on this principle—when the tenant for life does them, he comes to the court, which, by its officer, goes through the improvements done, and sees whether they are such as come within the terms of the Settled Land Act. Drainage is not a permanent improvement within its terms. As regards the present case, there is a difficulty in the applicant's way. The case is not like In re Lever. There the trustee did the work, and applied to be indemnified out of the whole estate. It is on the point of indemnity that Stirling, J., came to a decision in granting the application. Here the trustees have not done the work. They were too prudent to spend their money.

The trustees do not come within Lever's case, so the application of the plaintiffs as representing the tenant for life must fail.

Order made without prejudice to claims that might be made under the Settled Land Act when the trustees have moneys in hand.

Solicitors, Robins, Hay, Waters, & Hay; Church, Adams, & Pryor.

Chan. Div.
Warrington, J. } April 28.

In re LORD STAFFORD'S SETTLEMENT AND WILL. GERARD v. STAFFORD. (a.)

Settled land—Compound settlement—Heirlooms—Sale—Application of proceeds—Discharge of incumbrance—Heirlooms vested in tenant in tail—Settled Land Act. 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 37, sub-sections 1, 2; s. 2, sub-section 9; s. 21, sub-section (ii.); s. 53.

By his will S. bequeathed pictures and heirlooms to trustees upon trust to permit the same to be used and enjoyed by the person who, under S.'s marriage settlement, should for the time being be entitled to certain landed estates, but so that they should not vest absolutely in any tenant in tail male by purchase of the said landed estates who should not attain twenty-one or die under that age leaving male issue at death. Under the said marriage settlement the said landed estates stood settled to X. for life, remainder to Y. for life, remainder to Z in tail. One of the pictures had been sold and the proceeds paid to the trustees of the will and invested by them. It had been held that the settlement and will constituted a compound settlement. X. directed the trustees of the compound settlement to apply part of the said proceeds in discharge of a mortgage on the said landed estates.

Held, that the said proceeds were, under the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 37, sub-section 2 (2), capital money arising under the Act; that they were applicable under section 21, sub-section (ii.); that the trustees of the compound settlement had not yet invested the said proceeds; and that X. was entitled, in virtue of the discretion conferred upon him by section 53, to direct the trustees of the compound settlement to apply part of the said proceeds in discharge of the said mortgage.

By his will, dated the 23rd of August, 1884, Lord Stafford bequeathed certain pictures and other heirlooms to trustees upon trust to permit the same to be used and enjoyed by the person who by virtue of his marriage settlement should for the time being be entitled to the hall and estate at Costessey to the end that the same might be held as heirlooms with Costessey Hall by the successive owners of the said hall, but so that they should not vest absolutely in any tenant in tail male by purchase of the said hall under the said settlement who should not attain the age of twenty-one or die under that age leaving male issue at the time of his death.

Lord Stafford died on the 30th of November, 1884. Under the marriage settlement referred to, the said hall and estate now stood settled to the present Lord Stafford, the tenant for life for the time being, with remainder to one of the respondents for life, with remainder to Wilhelmina Plowden in tail. One of the pictures bequeathed under the will had been sold recently and the money paid to the trustees of the will under an order of court and had been invested by them.

(a.) Reported by PERCY H. WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon a summons taken out by the tenant for life Byrne, J., held that the settlement and will constituted a compound settlement and appointed the trustees of the will trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of the settlement of the heirlooms. The tenant for life directed the trustees of the compound settlement to apply £15,000, part of the proceeds of the sale of the picture, in discharge of a mortgage on the land settled by the marriage settlement. The summons now came again before the court on the question whether money arising under the will ought to be applied for the benefit of land held under the settlement. The heirlooms were vested in Wilhelmina Plowden, the tenant in tail in remainder, who was a female infant, and therefore not within the proviso of the will.

Levett, K.C., and Ingpen, for the tenant for life.

Norton, K.C., and Stokes, for the trustees of the compound settlement and of the will Rowden, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the tenant in tail in remainder.

Duka, for the next tenant for life.

WARRINGTON, J., stated the facts, and proceeded to give judgment to the following effect: Section 37, sub-section 1, of the Settled Land Act, 1882, empowers the tenant for life of the land to sell the chattels therein referred to. It has nothing to do with the disposition of the proceeds of sale. "The land" in that sub-section must be the land with which the chattels are to devolve or in which some person (in whom the chattels also vest) becomes "entitled to an estate of freehold of inheritance." Applying that to the present case, the land here referred to must be the land settled by the settlement mentioned in Lord Stafford's will. By section 37, sub-section 2, the money arising by the sale of the chattels is to be capital money arising under the Act. And section 2, sub-section 9, defines capital money as "capital money arising under this Act, and receivable for the trusts and purposes of the settlement." Now, the money arising by the sale of the chattels is "capital money arising under this Act." The proceeds of sale of this picture are "capital money arising under this Act," and accordingly their application is regulated by section 21 of the Act. Sub-section 2 of that section provides that capital money shall be applied "in discharge, purchase, or redemption of incumbrances affecting the inheritance of the settled land, or other the whole estate the subject of the settlement." Therefore, as this money is applicable in discharge of the incumbrance on the inheritance of the settled land, one has to find what is meant by "the settled land." If the land and the chattels were comprised in the same settlement—in the same document, that is—it is laid down in In re Duke of Marlborough's Settlement, 33 W. R 871, 30 Ch. D. 127, 34 W. R. 377, 32 Ch. D. 1, that the proceeds of sale of the chattels might have been applied in discharge of incumbrances on the land. The only possible distinction between that case and the present would then have been that in this case the chattels vest in an infant female tenant in tail at birth. It is said that the Duke of Marlborough's case is distinguishable also by the fact that the land and the chattels are not in this case settled by the same instrument. But when you consider the wording of section 21, sub-section (ii.) —"the inheritance of the settled land"—and compare that with section 37, sub-section 9, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the land referred to in section 21, sub-section (ii.), as "the settled land" is the same as that which in section 37 is referred to as the land with which the chattels devolve or to an estate of freehold of inheritance in which the person in that section referred to is entitled. In my opinion, therefore, independently of the cases which have been decided on the question of a compound settlement, I should have come to the conclusion, on the construction of section 37 and section 21, sub-section (ii.) taken together, that the applicant was entitled, subject to certain minor points, which I will refer to presently, to have the proceeds of the chattels applied in discharge of the incumbrances affecting the inheritance of the land. But I think the case is made clear by the authorities. The strongest case is In re Byng's Settled Estates, 40 W. R. 457, [1892] 2 Ch. 219. That case was a remarkable one, because the two documents there in question were what I may call independent documents. There was no connection between them except that the limitations in them were the same except as to certain terms of years. It was held that the will and the deed in that case constituted a compound settlement, so that the capital money arising under the deed could be applied in paying the cost of improvements executed upon the land devised by the will. Section 21, sub-section (iii.) was operative there. That is not the same sub-section as the one applicable here, but I think for substantial purposes it is the same. Now, if that is so, we get it back to this—that the matter is to be treated exactly as if the land and the chattels had been settled by one document. The case would then have been covered by the Duke of Marlborough's case, which, in my opinion, is not excluded by the distinction arising here as to the estate taken by the infant tenant in tail.

It has been further contended that even assuming that the money in question is applicable for this purpose, the tenant for life, who, under section 53, was to act as a trustee for all the persons interested under the settlement, is not fairly exercising the discretion given to him by directing the application of the money in the mode now in question. It is said, this is money to which, if the two tenants for life died at the present moment, this tenant in tail would be absolutely entitled, and that the present tenant for life is in fact taking the money of this female infant tenant in tail to pay off incumbrances on land to which she may not become entitled. The answer to that was given by Chitty, J., in the Duke of Marlborough's case. He says: "But it appears to me that the right view is that the tenant for life is to have regard to the interest of all parties. A good illustration of what was meant could be taken from a similar case to the present which came before me in chambers"—then he gave an instance of a large landed estate which was in bad condition, but there were some valuable pictures which the tenant for life desired to sell for improving the estate. Then he says: "It seems to me that if he did that—that is, sold the pictures and applied the money under section 35 to improving the estate—so far from it being fairly said that he disregarded, he would be really regarding the true interests of the persons entitled under the settlement." Now, allowing for the difference between the interest of the infant here and that of the person entitled in the Duke of Marlborough's case—and I may say that I was very considerably impressed with that difference—I do not think I can say that this would be an improper application of the money in the sense that the tenant for life would not be acting in a due exercise of the very wide discretion given him by the Settled Land Acts.

There is only one further point. It is said that the money in this case has been already applied under section 21, sub-section (ii.), and that there is no provision in the Act, when once that application has been made, for any further application of the money by direction of the tenant for life except where the trustees concur in allowing such application. I think that is answered (if it were necessary to go so far for an answer, as to which I do not propose to express any opinion) by the last argument of Mr. Levett. The money here was not invested by "the trustees" in the technical sense, but by the trustees of the will before they had been appointed trustees of the settlement in the ordinary sense. The fund now representing the proceeds of the sale of the chattels is for the first time to be applied under section 21.

The conclusion I come to is that section 21, sub-section (ii.), applies to the present case, but the "land" referred to in that sub-section is in this case the land by reference to the limitations of which the heirlooms were settled; and that accordingly the applicant is entitled to have the £25,000 odd applied in the manner proposed.

Solicitors, Fooks, Chadwick, Arnold, & Chadwick; Few & Co.; Slaughter & Colegrave.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) — Feb. 4.

STRICKLAND v. WHITTAKER. (a.)

Licensing Law—Sale of liquors—Sale on unlicensed premises—Order taken by traveller—Duty of traveller to forward order to principal—Goods appropriated at and sent from licensed premises—Offence—Executory contract of sale—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 3.

An order was taken by a brewer's traveller at a customer's house for beer to be supplied from the appellant's brewery, to be paid for by the customer on or after delivery. It was a rule in the brewery that no order taken at a customer's house would be executed until the traveller had sent into the office the name and address of the customer and the order had been entered and passed through the books and directions given to the carman in the ordinary way.

Held, that an order taken by the appellant's traveller, and so executed, did not constitute evidence of a sale at the premises of the customer, and therefore the appellant was wrongly convicted of an offence under section 3 of the Act of 1872. Whether, on other facts, an executory contract of sale would come within section 3 was discussed, but not decided.

Walker v. Walker, 67 J. P. 452; and Stephenson v. Rogers (Limited), 63 J. P. 230, 47 W. R. Dig. 101, considered.

Case stated by the Court of Quarter Sessions of Lancaster, raising the question whether an offence was committed under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, by a brewers' traveller taking orders at customers' houses and transmitting them to the licensee, by whom the beer was set aside and delivered to the customer.

The facts, so far as material, stated in the case were that the appellant had been convicted by the justices sitting at Preston and fined £50. On appeal to quarter sessions the fine was reduced to £20, but the conviction was confirmed, and a case stated for the opinion of the High Court.

(1) The appellant was a brewer licensed to sell by retail at his premises at Nelson, Lancashire, but not for sale at Rishton. He had in his employment a traveller named Cooper, whose business it was to obtain orders for beer, or other liquors, from persons residing at Rishton and elsewhere. In obtaining such orders Cooper was required to observe certain rules, which were to the effect that no carter or other person in the employ of the appellant should deliver liquor in any quantity to any person unless the same had been previously ordered, and the correct name and full postal address of the customer handed in at the office, except where the liquor was ordered at the office itself. (2) No money to be received by any carter or other person receiving orders until the goods ordered were delivered. (3) The full name and address of all persons ordering must be entered in the books and sent into the office the day before the orders were executed. The existence of these rules was not known to Plant, or any other customer, nor was any limitation on Cooper's authority to make sales or take orders on behalf of the appellant communicated to or known to Plant, the general course of business dealing being that when Cooper accepted orders the customers expected them to be, and they were in fact, executed. The appellant supplied Cooper with post-cards containing price lists for customers to fill up and send to the office, and Cooper occasionally, but not invariably, took out such post-cards and gave them to persons on whom he called for orders. Before the 5th of November, 1902, Mr. Plant, of Walmisley-street, Rishton, had from time to time ordered, by letter, stout from the appellant. On that date Cooper called on Plant and obtained from him an order for two gallons of stout, price 2s. 4d., and Cooper thereupon entered the order in his book, and on the following day posted to the appellant the order book, with a summary of all the orders obtained by him at Rishton and the neighbourhood, including Plant's; and also posted to the appellant a number of gummed labels bearing the names of persons who had given orders, to be affixed to the vessels. On the receipt by the appellant of the order book summary and labels, on the 7th of November, the appellant's servants selected and appropriated a jar of stout to fulfil Plant's order, and affixed thereon the label bearing Plant's name. On the same day the jar was delivered in one of the appellant's carts by one of his servants.

It was contended for the appellant that there was no evidence of any holding out that Cooper had authority to accept orders; that he had no authority in fact; that an executory contract was not sufficient in law to bring the case within the provisions of the Act, for an executory contract was not complete until accepted at the licensed premises. It was further contended that, though the jar was delivered in pursuance of an order given by Plant to Cooper, there was no contract until Cooper's order-book was received by post at Nelson and accepted by the appellant; that the jar of stout had been appropriated and set apart by the appellant at Nelson, and that the sale took place at the licensed premises. Also, that although the order for the stout was given to Cooper on the 5th of November, there was no contract until Cooper's order-book, &c., was received by post and accepted by the appellant and the stout appropriated to the customer, and that the sale took place, therefore, at Nelson and not at Rishton. It was contended for the respondent that the sale, or the contract for the sale, was completed at Plant's house at Rishton, and that, on the facts proved, Cooper was the agent of the appellant to sell to Plant and to make a contract with him for the sale of the stout, and that he had been held out as such agent to Plant by the appellant.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The court of quarter sessions was of opinion that, on the facts proved, an executory contract for the sale of the stout was made at Plant's house at Rishton, and that the court was bound, by the authority of Stephenson v. Rogers (Limited), 15 The Times L. R. 148, 47 W. R. Dig. 101, to hold that an offence had been committed within the meaning of section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

Roskill, K.C. (W. Mackenzie with him), for the appellants.—The present case is almost exactly on all fours with Walker v. Walker, 67 J. P. 452, decided in this court since this case was before the quarter sessions, and on that authority this conviction should be quashed. There is a distinction between an actual sale and an agreement for sale, i.e. an executory contract, followed by delivery, after the goods to satisfy the order have been appropriated on the licensed premises—which is clearly drawn in the cases of Pletts v. Campbell, [1895] 2 Q. B. 229, 44 W. R. Dig. 90; Pletts v. Beattie, [1896] 1 Q. B. 419, 44 W. R. Dig. 90; Hewett v. Jarvis, Law Journal Newspaper, the 18th of July, 1903; and the principles laid down in those cases show that as Cooper had no authority in fact to enter into a contract on behalf of his employer, the sale took place at Nelson and not at Rishton. The argument on the other side was founded mainly on the judgment of Channell, J., in Stephenson v. Rogers (Limited), 63 J. P. 230, 47 W. R. Dig. 101, that an executory contract of sale made at a customer's house was an offence under section 3 of the Act of 1874. If the facts here showed that such an executory contract had in fact been made by Cooper we should not contend that an offence had not been committed. Possibly an agreement to sell liquor even if not followed by delivery would constitute an offence if made on unlicensed premises.

Bankes, K.C. (with him Whateley), for the respondent.—The only question raised in the case is whether an executory contract comes within the Act. The magistrates found that, in so far as the purchaser was concerned, the contract was completed when the order was given to Cooper. That is a finding of fact supported by the evidence, and therefore we start here with an executory contract. There is no express assent by the purchaser that the goods should be appropriated at the vendor's premises. Therefore Pletts v. Beattie does not apply. And in that case the loss of the goods in transit would have fallen on the purchaser, while here the loss would have fallen on the vendor. Walker v. Walker can also be distinguished, for there the licensee exercised his own judgment whether he should accept the order or not. Stephenson v. Rogers shows that an executory contract followed by delivery is not sufficient to bring the case within the statute unless something was said when the goods were ordered that brings the case within Pletts v. Beattie. The magistrates have not so found, and the conviction therefore should stand.

Roskill, in reply.—The court is not bound by a finding of fact, for they have a discretion under section 2 (2) of the Judicature Act, 1894. The facts here amount to this, that Cooper took the order subject to his master's approval. Therefore until that approval was given there was no contract—no sale made on the unlicensed premises—and the conviction cannot stand.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It is extremely important in licensing cases, when principles are laid down by the court in deciding them, that those principles should be applied in subsequent cases where the facts are substantially the same. Walker v. Walker has been relied on by Mr. Roskill as an authority in his favour on all points, but I do not think he is quite entitled to use it in the way he desires to. It is quite true that it is very difficult to find any substantial difference in the facts of the two cases, but on the other hand it is quite plain from the report that the argument with reference to an executory contract being sufficient was not present to the mind of the court when giving its decision, and was not the point on which that decision was based; the real contention there was that there was no appropriation of the goods, and that the property did not pass until actual delivery, the facts being that the order was taken to the licensed premises, accepted there by the licensee, a setting aside of the goods by him, and their subsequent delivery. It seems to me on the authorities that those facts did not show a sale off the premises, but that the contract, if any, was made on the licensed premises. That brief statement of the judgment shows that the judges in Walker's case were not applying their minds to the point, which indeed does not seem to have been raised before them, whether or not an executory contract by the agent of the licensed person would be sufficient to constitute an offence within the statute. I would point out that Channell, J., was a party to the judgment, and in all probability, if any question had been raised on this point he would have directed attention to the case of Stephenson v. Rogers. That being so, we shall probably have to decide some day whether an executory contract made by the traveller with the authority of the licensed person brings the latter within the Act. The inclination of my mind at present, after hearing the arguments on this point that have been urged on both sides to-day, is that it would do so—that is to say, I am inclined to the opinion indicated by Channell, J., in Stephenson v. Rogers, and probably intimated by Wright, J., in Pletts v. Campbell. But as I really do not think that the point arose in this case, I must not be supposed to express a definite opinion now, and I desire to reserve my decision until some future day when it must come before the court again on probably a set of facts that directly do raise it.

The conclusion I have come to here is that there was no evidence upon which the magistrates ought to have found that there was an executory contract entered into by Cooper on the occasion of his interview with Plant; there was at most evidence of the acceptance of an order to be transmitted to his principal, who might himself act upon it. I see nothing in what passed between Plant and Cooper to show any acceptance of a contract of sale. What were the facts? As I have before said, we must not draw fine distinctions in dealing with licensing matters. Travellers canvassing for orders are undoubtedly common incidents in the wine and spirit trade, as in other trades, and I think it would be a startling proposition to say that the mere forwarding of an order is sufficient evidence of the acceptance of a contract by the traveller. The course of business here prescribed that no order was to be accepted in the sense of a contract, nor goods delivered until the orders were handed in to the office and entered in the order book, and that any person infringing that rule would be instantly dismissed, points to the fact that it was not intended that the taking of an order to be afterwards transmitted should be the acceptance of a contract.

I think the magistrates, in stating this case, meant to say that Cooper was a person who was to canvass for orders, and they set out the restrictions or rules and then they found that Thomas Plant had not any notice of these restrictions or of any limit of Cooper's authority. Looking at these facts, and comparing them with the facts in Walker v. Walker I think there is no evidence on which the magistrates ought to have come to the conclusion that there was an executory contract for the sale of beer. There was no evidence, in fact, of Cooper's authority to accept contracts, so far as the written rules went, and so far as the previous practice went there was no evidence that the appellant had authorized him to accept. The inference I think the magistrates ought to have drawn was that Cooper was there to take orders and transmit them to headquarters, where they might be accepted or not by the appellant. I do not know that much is to be gained by referring to the authorities which have been cited beyond saying that in Pletts v. Campbell the court on the facts stated came to the conclusion that all the substantial part of the transaction took place at the customer's place of business or at any rate not on the licensed premises. In Pletts v. Beatty where a postcard had been sent, the court came to the conclusion that there had been no sale off the licensed premises. In Stephenson v. Rogers they came to the same conclusion, and the same was the result in Walker v. Walker. The setting aside of the goods at the place where the order was given is also a matter to be taken into consideration. Looking fairly at the facts I can see no evidence of anything more than an acceptance of an order, forwarding it to headquarters, and the dealing with the order by the principal, so as to show that the contract was not made—even the executory contract—until the order had been entered and the authority of Cooper to make it ratified.

For these reasons I think that the principle acted on in Walker's case applies to this case; that there is no sufficient evidence of an executory contract for sale by Cooper, so as to raise the point which was discussed by Channell, J., in the case I have referred to. I therefore think that this appeal should be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I agree. With regard to the question whether an executory contract made at the purchaser's house answers the words of the section constituting an offence, I would rather reserve anything like a judgment; but the impression left on my mind by the arguments is rather in favour of the view that it would be sufficient. I desire, however, emphatically to keep an open mind on the question, in case it should come forward again, because it is impossible to my mind, however experienced in judicial matters, to approach a question which it is not necessary to solve in the same spirit as if it had to be solved. On the question whether there was really any evidence of a complete sale at Rishton, my opinion has, I confess, somewhat fluctuated during the course of the argument, but I have ultimately come to the conclusion that the view expressed by the Lord Chief Justice is correct.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. Upon the point whether an executory contract, as it has been called, would be sufficient without more to constitute a violation of the section in question, I desire entirely to reserve it for careful consideration, if it ever directly arises, and I would rather therefore not say, as it seems quite useless, what at present is the inclination of my opinion.

Appeal allowed; conviction quashed.

Solicitors, Busk, Mellor, & Norris, for Procter & Sons, Burnley; Bower, Cotton, & Bower, for Ainsworth, Sanderson, & Howson, Blackburn.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) — Feb. 1, 2.

REX v. JUSTICES OF WEST RIDING. (a.)

Licensing law — Justices — Appeal — Employment of county solicitor—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 29—Licensing Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 28), s. 20.

The quarter sessions of West Riding, on the hearing of two appeals against the refusal of the licensing justices to renew a licence, dismissed one appeal and allowed the other appeal, but in both cases made a special order disallowing the profit costs of the solicitor employed by the justices, on the ground that they should have employed the county solicitor.

Held, that the quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to do so, and that the justices were not bound to employ the county solicitor.

Rules nisi for certiorari and mandamus granted at the instance of the justices for the licensing sessions of East Morley.

The following facts appeared from the affidavits:

At the quarter sessions for the West Riding, held on the 16th of April, 1903, one Squire Briggs appealed against the refusal of the licensing justices of East Morley to renew the licence of the "Crown Point Hotel," and at the same sessions an appeal was heard against the refusal of the same justices to renew the licence of the "White Hart." It had been the custom for many years in the West Riding of Yorkshire to have an official known as the county solicitor, and that officer was now appointed under section 3, sub-section 10, of the Local Government Act, 1888, by the county council of the West Riding. It is the duty of that officer, who receives a salary out of the county funds, to act for the justices in all judicial business, and as a matter of fact the county solicitor had always acted for the justices in appeals from their decisions. The licensing justices, however, in the present case, instead of employing the county solicitor, employed their clerk, who is a solicitor, to act for them in the two appeals in question. The court of quarter sessions having ascertained that fact, expressed their opinion that the licensing justices had acted wrongly in disregarding the former practice, which was beneficial and economical to the inhabitants of the riding, and made an order in both appeals (one of which had been dismissed and the other allowed) which provided that the personal professional charges of the solicitor in question should be disallowed.

The licensing justices obtained rules of certiorari and mandamus on the ground that the justices in quarter sessions had no power to deprive the solicitor in question of the costs to which the licensing justices were entitled in the first appeal by virtue of the Alehouse Act, 1828, s. 29, and in the second appeal by virtue of the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 20.

By section 29 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, it is provided that "In every case where notice of appeal against the judgment of any justice in or concerning the execution of this Act shall have been given, and such appeal shall have been dismissed or the judgment so appealed against shall have been affirmed, or such appeal shall have been abandoned, it shall be lawful for the court to whom such appeal shall have been made or intended to have been made, and such court is hereby required to adjudge and order that the party so having appealed or given notice of his intention to appeal shall pay to the justice to whom such notice shall have been given, or to whomsoever he shall appoint, such sum by way of costs as shall, in the opinion of the court, be sufficient to indemnify such justice from all costs and charge whatsoever to which such justice may have been put in consequence of his having had served upon him notice of the intention of such party to appeal." By section 20 of the Licensing Act, 1902, it is enacted that "In every case of appeal against the decision of any licensing justice, the court to which such appeal is made shall adjudge and order that the treasurer of the county or place in and for which such justice whose decision is appealed against shall have acted on the occasion when he gave such decision shall pay to such justice such sum as, in the opinion of the court, shall be sufficient to indemnify such justice from all costs and charges whatsoever to which such justice may have been so put, and which cannot be recovered from any other person, and the said treasurer is hereby authorized to pay the same, which shall be allowed to him in his accounts. The order of the appellate court may be made either at the sessions when the appeal is heard, or at the next ensuing sessions, and the costs may be taxed either in or out of sessions."

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Compston showed cause.—The justices properly disallowed these profit costs as being costs not being properly incurred: Reg. v. Winder, 48 W. R. 605, [1900] 2 Q. B. 666, and Huxley v. West London Railway Co., 37 W. R. 235, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 26. In the next place the justices have here exercised their discretion, and as it was within their jurisdiction it is not open to review in this court: Reg. v. Middlesex Justices, [1895] 1 Q. B. 616.

J. W. Williamson, for the licensee, took no part in the argument.

Macmorran, K.C., and Greenwood, in support of the rules.—Quarter sessions here went beyond their jurisdiction. They intended by their order to deprive the licensing justices of the indemnity to which they were entitled. But for the direction in the order the costs would have been taxed in the ordinary way.

They cited Reg. v. Worcestershire Justices, [1900] 2 Q. B. 576.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I have come to the conclusion these orders go too far and cannot be supported. It was admitted that the effect of section 20 of the Licensing Act, 1902, is to place the licensing justices in the same position with regard to being indemnified against costs when their decisions are reversed as they are under section 29 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, when their decisions are upheld. The two cases before the court are therefore in the same position, and it is only necessary to refer to section 29 of the Act of 1828. I think if Mr. Danckwerts had made good his contention that this was a case in which the justices had acted under that section and had fixed a sum which in their opinion would indemnify the licensing justices from the costs to which they had been put, we could not have interfered. The justices would then have exercised their discretion. That, however, is not the way in which the matter comes before us. The form of each order shows that it was not an ordinary order as to costs, but an order made, as is stated on the face of it, in view of particular matters having been brought before the court. It is quite clear on the affidavits what was meant by "in view of particular matters brought before the court"—namely, that neither order embodies a taxation made by the justices, or the fixing of such an amount as the quarter sessions thought sufficient to indemnify the licensing justices, but is a special order made because the court of quarter sessions thought that the licensing justices should have engaged the county solicitor to act for them on the appeals. It seems to me, therefore, that the case is not one of mere taxation, and raises the question as to whether the court of quarter sessions could refuse to make an order under section 29 of the Act of 1828, because the licensing justices had employed a solicitor other than the county solicitor. There is no rule or law which compels the licensing justices to employ a particular solicitor. I am of opinion that the orders drawn up under the circumstances of the case were not orders under section 29 of the Act of 1828, and section 20 of the Act of 1902, and therefore the objection raised to the rules being made absolute does not hold good. The orders must therefore be quashed, and since the court of quarter sessions have not considered the question of costs the matter must be sent back to them.

WILLS, J.—I am satisfied that the justices at quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to compel the licensing justices to employ a particular solicitor. It is quite clear the licensing justices are not deprived of their right to be indemnified from costs merely because they did not employ a special solicitor. The court of quarter sessions has assumed certain powers which it did not possess. What has been done, as appears upon the face of the orders, is not a matter of taxation, but an application of an erroneous principle.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

Rules made absolute.

Solicitors: Farmer, Rawson, & Co.; Walker & Rowe, for E. O. Wooler & Co., Leeds; Clements, Williams, & Co., for Trevor Edwards, Wakefield.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) — Jan. 26.

TOWER JUSTICES v. CHAMBERS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Licensing law—Beerhouse—Privileged beerhouse—Sale of spirits without a licence—Conviction—House closed—Application by owners of beerhouse for grant of licence—Application refused on a ground other than one of those specified in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 15.

The holder of a licence to sell by retail beer to be consumed on or off the premises was convicted for the first time of selling spirits without a licence. The house had been licensed for the sale of beer and wine prior to the 1*st of May*, 1869, and the licence had been regularly renewed from time to time, the last renewal having been made to the then tenant at the general annual meeting on the 13*th of February*, 1903. The tenant having been convicted on the 30*th of July following, the owners of the house applied at the next special sessions, under section* 15 of the Licensing Act, 1874, for a grant of a provisional licence in respect of the premises. The application was refused on a ground other than one of the four grounds specified in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869.

Held, that the case was governed by Ex parte Flinn, 48 W. R. 29, [1899] 2 Q. B. 607, and that the justices could only refuse the application upon one of the four grounds specified in the Act of 1869.

Reg. v. West Riding Justices, 36 W. R. 855, 21 Q. B. D. 258, discussed.

This was a special case stated by the court of quarter sessions for the County of London, that court having upon appeal set aside the decision of the Tower licensing justices, the present appellants, who had refused to grant to the respondent, R. H. Coburn, a certificate authorizing the grant to him of a licence to sell by retail beer and wine to be consumed on or off the premises known as the "Coach and Horses," Backchurch-lane, in the parish of St. George-in-the-East.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It appeared from the special case that the house was a beerhouse, licensed before 1869 and had been continuously licensed ever since down to July, 1903, when the then tenant, Joseph Arch, was convicted of selling spirits without a licence, and thereupon became disqualified under the statute to hold any licence, and the house was closed.

On the 18th of September, 1903, an application was made to the magistrate at Thames-street under section 15 of the Act of 1874 for authority for R. H. Coburn to carry on the business until the next special licensing sessions, but at the suggestion of the magistrate that application was withdrawn.

On the 28th of September, being the special licensing sessions of the justices for the Tower division, an application was made on behalf of the owners, Messrs. Chambers Brothers & Co., for the grant of a licence to Coburn, he being the resident occupier in the house. The justices refused to grant the licence upon grounds other than the four specified in the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, there being no evidence before them which would bring the case within any of those grounds.

The present respondents thereupon appealed to quarter sessions, which court decided that in the circumstances stated the jurisdiction of the licensing justices was limited to refusing the licence on one or more of the four grounds specified in section 8 of the Act of 1869 already referred to, and therefore granted the licence.

Against that decision the licensing justices now appealed.

Macmorran, K.C. (Leycester with him), for the appellant justices. — The question here is whether the conviction of Arch did away with the old licence in such a way that the house cannot be any longer said to be "privileged," i.e., to have been licensed from 1869 down to the present time, and therefore the discretion of the justices to grant or refuse a licence is no longer limited to the four grounds mentioned in section 8 of the Act of 1869. There is authority for saying that upon the conviction of Arch the old licence ended. In Reg. v. West Riding Justices, 36 W. R. 855, 21 Q. B. D. 258; Traynor v. Jones, 42 W. R. 201, [1894] 1 Q. B. 83; and Freer v. Murray, 41 W. R. 450, [1894] App. Cas. 576, it was laid down that the discretion of the licensing justices in granting or refusing a renewal or transfer of a licence to a beerhouse under the Act of 1869 was only limited to the four specified grounds in cases where there was a licence actually existing at the time the application was made: see particularly judgment of Lord Herschell in the House of Lords in Freer v. Murray. The only case that is in conflict with these decisions is Ex parte Flinn & Sons, 48 W. R. 29, [1899] 2 Q. B. 607, and that decision is inconsistent with the West Riding case, which appears never to have been questioned. In Flinn's case no one appeared for the respondents, and the West Riding case was not cited.

Foote, K.C. (with him Bruce Williamson), for the respondents.—The case of Ex parte Flinn and that of the West Riding Justices, when examined, are really not in conflict. The latter would be decisive against the respondents here were they not protected under section 15 of the Act of 1874, for that decision has no reference to cases under that section which gives special rights to the owners of the premises where there has been a conviction for one of four separate offences, one of which is the selling of spirits without a licence, as has happened here. In the West Riding case the conviction was for allowing the house to be used as a brothel, which is not one of the four offences mentioned in the section, and there are obvious reasons why such an offence attached an odium to the premises as well as to the licence-holder, and why, therefore, the discretion of the justices should be let in. Whether Ex parte Flinn was rightly decided is another question and need not be considered in deciding merely whether it is at variance in fact with the West Riding case. The only irregularity that can be alleged against Coburn is that he did not get authority from the court of summary jurisdiction to carry on until the next licensing sessions, but the explanation of that apparent omission was because it took some weeks to get Arch out of the house, and when Coburn had been introduced the licensing sessions had nearly come round, and the magistrate suggesting that the step was not necessary to preserve the licence, the application before him was not proceeded with. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The section says that there may be a further application made to the licensing sessions, which looks as if there were two steps. If the first application to the magistrate had been refused could you still have said when you came to make your application for transfer that the justices were still limited to the four grounds?—Yes. Even though the house had not got a licence?—Yes; because the house had a licence, if my view is right, although it for a time had been forfeited.] The distinction between a forfeited licence and an expired licence is pointed out clearly in Freer v. Murray. [He was stopped.]

Macmorran, in reply.—I submit that when a licence has been forfeited there is such a break in its continuity as lets in the full discretion of the justices in dealing with it. That was really the principle applied to the West Riding case. I do not contest the right of the owners to apply under section 14 of the Act of 1869—that was assumed in the West Riding case—but I say that it was there held that the justices' discretion was unlimited. Section 15 of the Act of 1874 only gives the right to apply under section 14 of the Act of 1869, and therefore the present case and that decision are on all fours.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—As this case has not been fully argued on the part of Mr. Foote because I intimated that we were inclined to think that the West Riding case and Freer v. Murray were not authorities against the respondents, and that Ex parte Flinn & Sons gave the sessions a right to deal with the application, I do not propose to discuss the matter at any length. I only wish to make three observations which indicate why I think we are bound by Flinn's case. This case illustrates the difficulty which the courts have in construing the licensing laws and applying them; but, on the other hand, one must not forget that it is a very thorny subject, and it is an extremely difficult subject for the Legislature to deal with. Therefore while we have to discharge that duty we cannot, and ought not, to blame anybody for the way in which the Acts of Parliament stand. I think it is quite plain that from one point of view Mr. Macmorran's argument may be said to go a little too far, because I do not think he gives sufficient effect to the consequences of allowing a person to apply, after a conviction. It is quite plain that if the conviction has forfeited the licence there must be a break in the case, and therefore it would seem to me that the section contemplates under some circumstances a state of things in which the principle of the West Riding case could not apply, because there must be a suspension in cases in which the licence has been absolutely forfeited. Mr. Macmorran says it gives the right to apply but leaves unfettered the discretion of the court — the magistrate or sessions to whom application is made—as to the grounds on which they may refuse the grant or continue the grant of the licence. On the other hand, of course, it is said that the effect of allowing the man to apply in respect of an old beerhouse is to give him the privileges which a person applying under section 19 of the older Act would have, of the tribunal being limited to the four grounds of section 8. That being the question to be raised, I think we could not deal with Mr. Macmorran's argument without overruling at any rate the principle, and I think myself the authority, of Flinn's case. It may be, for the reasons which I have mentioned, that the West Riding case does proceed on different lines, but I must say I think that Flynn's case is so much an authority that we could not really deal with this case contrary to that principle without practically overruling it, and of course we cannot do that, and in a case where there is an appeal I prefer to say I think we are bound by the principle of the decision in Flinn's case, and therefore we must affirm this decision of the quarter sessions.

I may add that in my opinion this is a case which obviously ought to go further and be more fully discussed, and therefore, if there is to be an appeal, that is the ground upon which I put it, that we do not overrule the decision of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction.

WILLS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think with respect to Flinn's case that it is so exactly in point in all its circumstances that it really must be followed. The only distinction between Flinn's case and this that I can see is that in the former case it was an application in the first instance to a court of summary jurisdiction, and this is an application to the special sessions. I cannot think myself that the Act of Parliament meant to make any distinction whatever between the rights of the parties on those two occasions, and therefore it seems to me that Flinn's case is really exactly in point and must be followed. I confess I think myself that Flinn's case is really difficult to reconcile with the West Riding case. I have heard what Mr. Foote has said about it, but still, after all is said and done, it seems to me that in the one case the court held, under circumstances which are very closely analogous to these, that the expression "be in force" in the 19th section of the Act of 1869 was not satisfied, and that in Flinn's case they held it was. It seems to me extremely difficult to reconcile those two decisions. All I can say is, after having, besides listening to the arguments, spent a couple of hours myself since yesterday in going into these sections, it seems to me a matter of extreme difficulty and perplexity, and I am glad to take refuge in the fact that I am bound by Flinn's case.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. I think it right to say that I see no reason, while saying that we are bound by Flinn's case, to intimate that I feel any reason to dissent. Although there may be no difference between that case and this—I do not think there is in substance for the reasons my lord has given—it seems to me that this is doing what the Acts of Parliament expressly authorized, when the Acts are read together—namely, that up to the time of the special sessions, in a case of this kind, the licence may be treated as alive, and there is a power to transfer, to allow the owner to carry on in the meantime. It was in an application of that sort by the owner in Flynn's case that the matter arose. I think there is no essential difference. The question which there arose was a question which to my mind was rather more difficult—if I may say so—than the present case here. The time for applying in a case of this kind appears to me to be at a special sessions at which this application was made and refused, the decision being reversed by the court of quarter sessions; and in Flinn's case it seems to me a somewhat more difficult question arose, because it was an application to a magistrate in the meantime by the owner to carry on the business. It seems to me that, whether such an application is granted or refused, there is a licence to be dealt with, and, on the principle in Flinn's case, to be dealt with as the court of quarter sessions have held in the decision we have now affirmed.

Appeal dismissed with costs, and with leave to appeal.

Solicitor for the appellants E. W. Beal.

Solicitors for the respondents Maitland, Peckham, & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) — Jan. 12.

ESCOTT v. NEWPORT CORPORATION. (a.)

Local government—Street—Power of local authority to erect pillar for overhead tramway wire—Pillar sunk in soil of pavement—Trespass to private property—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 19—Newport Corporation Act, 1900, s. 51.

Where a local authority requires to open up the soil of a street, the surface only of which has been dedicated to the public, they do not commit a trespass on private property so long as the act to be done is within the area of their statutory powers.

Held, therefore, that no trespass was committed by the digging of a hole in the footway in which to place a pole to carry the electric wire for a tramway scheme authorized by a private Act which incorporated the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, the act complained of not amounting to a taking of land but only to the exercise of a right in the nature of an easement.

This was the defendants' appeal from a judgment of Judge Owen sitting at the Monmouth County Court, in favour of the plaintiff. The action was for damages for an alleged trespass by the defendants upon the plaintiff's property by the erection of an iron pillar for carrying an overhead electric cable used for tramcars and for a mandatory injunction to remove the pillar.

The plaintiff was lessee for the residue of a term of years of a plot of ground abutting on Chepstow-road, upon which he built a house. There was a space of about ten feet in width between the house and the road originally intended for a forecourt, but instead of using it as a forecourt, the plaintiff, with the consent of the ground landlord, paved it and put down a line of kerbing immediately adjoining the road. The public passed over this forecourt. The pillar had been fixed in the pavement in front of the plaintiff's shop, wholly within the boundary of the plot of land demised to him. It was thirty-one feet in height, ten inches in diameter at the base, and about six feet of its height was sunk in the ground.

The placing of this pillar was the trespass complained of.

The defence pleaded was that the pillar had been erected by the defendants under and pursuant to authority given them by the Newport Corporation Act, 1900, which incorporated the Lands Clauses Acts, and provided that the several words and expressions to which in the Public Health Act meanings were assigned should in that Act have the same respective meanings.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 51 (i.) of the Newport Corporation Act, 1900, provides that "for the purpose of working any of the corporation tramways by mechanical power . . . the corporation may, subject to the provisions of this Act, construct, lay down, place, erect, maintain, renew, and repair, on, in, over, or under any street or road in which any corporation tramways are for the time being laid," certain works and appliances including "poles, posts," and the defendants were further empowered to make such alterations in any existing tramways of the corporation . . . as might be necessary or expedient for adapting the some to be worked by mechanical power."

It was admitted that the roadway of Chepstow-road and the footpaths on each side were together a street within section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the defendants contended that by section 149 of the Act the Chepstow-road, including the pavement in front of the plaintiff's house and the place where the pillar had been fixed, had become vested in them, and that they were empowered by section 51 of their Act of 1900 to erect the pillar without the consent of the plaintiff and without making him compensation.

The learned county court judge held, upon the authority of Coverdale v. Charlton, 27 W. R. 257, 4 Q. B. D. 104, and Tunbridge Wells Corporation v. Baird, [1896] A. C. 434, 45 W. R. Dig. 92, that the defendants were only the owners of so much of the soil as was necessary for the ordinary user of the street and not of anything more, and as in his opinion section 51 of their Act of 1900 did not empower the defendants to place the pillar in the plaintiff's subsoil without paying him compensation, that the defendants had committed a trespass on his property.

The defendants appealed.

Macmorran, K.C., and J. Carver, for the defendants.

A. T. Lawrence, K.C., and John Sankey, for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L C.J.—The point raised in this case is one of very considerable importance, because it might well apply to many cases, and therefore, as we are only dealing with this one particular case, I want to limit my remarks to the facts here and not be taken to say anything not actually brought before us. [After stating the facts his lordship continued:] The question is, whether under those circumstances the erection of the post, which penetrated the ground to a considerable depth, constitutes a trespass. It must be taken that the county court judge found that the plaintiff had dedicated to the public a right of way over the pavement, subject to such interruption as might be caused by furniture being from time to time placed thereon. Therefore the place, so far as the surface was concerned, was vested in the defendants. The plaintiff contended that the pole went down into the ground to a greater depth than was vested in the local authority or was necessary for the proper user of the place as a right of way for the public, and that there had been an occupation of his land by the defendants and a taking of his property that amounted to a trespass. If that were the true view, then I think the plaintiff would be right, and that he would be entitled to a declaration, and in certain circumstances to an injunction, for the plaintiff is not bound to sue for compensation and could require the local authority if they required his land to give him notice to treat under the Lands Clauses Act. Therefore this court has to consider whether or not what the local authority have done, and which they contended they were justified in doing by the powers conferred on them by section 51 of the private Act of 1900 amounted, as the plaintiff contends, to a taking of land. It seems to me that section 51 contemplated something being done on private property which involved something less than the occupation of the land by the defendants. I cannot conceive it possible to contend successfully that because the pole requires a support on the plaintiff's land there must necessarily be a taking of the land by the authority which placed it there under a statutory right. If the support of the pole constitutes an injurious affection on the plaintiff's land, he has his remedy under the Lands Clauses Act. I therefore come to the conclusion that there has been no taking of land here by the local authority, and that what they did was within the statutory powers which have been given to them for the purpose of working their tramway system.

For the reasons I have given I think the appeal must be allowed.

[His lordship added that his brother Wills, J., who was absent, concurred in the opinion he had expressed.]

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was contended by the plaintiff that although the defendants might do those things which were authorized by section 51 of their Act of 1900, yet there was reserved from that which they were authorized to do any interference, except by permission or licence, with soil not vested in them. In my opinion that proposition is true to this extent: that while under the section no right in the property passed, the defendants nevertheless had a right within the area under their control to enter under their statutory powers and to do the work authorized in, over, or under any street or road. That proposition seems to be the basis of the judgment in Fareham Local Board v. Smith, 7 Times L. R. 443. In that case the local board had entered into a contract with an electric light company to light the town of Fareham. No licence from the Board of Trade or provisional order had been obtained by the company under the Electric Lighting Acts of 1882 and 1888, but they erected their poles and overhead wires under a licence from the local board. The defendant objected to the erection of a pole opposite his drawing-room window, and claimed to be entitled as owner in fee to the subsoil of the adjoining half of the highway, and claimed a right to treat the plaintiffs as trespassers. In that case an injunction was granted to restrain the defendant interfering with the plaintiffs. I think that case does not conflict with the cases—Coverdale v. Charlton, 27 W. R. 257, 4 Q. B. D. 104, and Tunbridge Wells Corporation v. Baird, [1896] A. C. 434, 45 W. R. Dig. 92, relied on by the plaintiff before the learned county court judge. In my view all that has been done here by the local authority is not a taking of the soil, but an exercise by them of a statutory right in the nature of an easement within an area which prevented an act of trespass being committed by reason of the fact that it was within the zone contemplated by the statute which gave them that right.

If, therefore, any damage has been caused to the plaintiff through injurious affection of his land he has a good claim for compensation under the Lands Clauses Acts. An action for trespass, however, seems to me one that a plaintiff cannot maintain. If we were so to hold, it would appear to follow that a public authority would have to serve notices under the Lands Clauses Acts on the frontagers every time it might be necessary for them in the execution of their statutory duties—laying a sewer and the like—to penetrate below the surface of the soil of a street. There is nothing which I think could justify us in coming to such a conclusion. I think, therefore, that the decision of the county court judge was wrong and that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed; leave to appeal granted.

Solicitors for the defendants, Cole & Jackson, for A. A. Newman, Newport.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Ley, Lake, & Ley, for Morgan & Co., Newport.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. D. (In Bkcy.). (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) } Nov. 20, 21, 23, 24; Feb. 22.

In re BEAUCHAMP.
Ex parte BEAUCHAMP. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Creditor's address for service—Power of the Bankruptcy Court to go behind the judgment—Irregularity—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g); s. 7, sub-section 3; s. 143—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 to 1890, Appendix, Form No. 6—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 2.

The Court of Bankruptcy possesses the power, on the hearing of a bankruptcy petition founded on a judgment debt, to go behind the judgment to inquire into the consideration for the debt. But the judgment is conclusive unless the consideration can be questioned. If a creditor who issues a bankruptcy notice occasionally leaves the address which he has given in the notice, this will not of itself render the notice bad if the address is such either that he can be found, or the debtor is able to pay or compound for the debt, there during the seven days limited by the notice. Nor does it matter if this address is only a temporary address, such as an hotel, if the creditor has no permanent home, or that he left that address on the last of the seven days limited by the notice. But if he abandons such an address this will render the notice inefficient.

In re Stogdon, Ex parte Leigh, [1895] 2 Q. B. 534, 44 W. R. Dig. 13, discussed.

If at the date of the trial of an action for tort a female defendant is unmarried a judgment can be obtained against her creating a personal debt.

This was an appeal by the debtor, Lady Violet Beauchamp, from a receiving order in bankruptcy made against her by Mr. Registrar Giffard, dated the 31st of October, 1903.

The facts were as follows: The appellant was formerly the wife of Sir Richard Beauchamp, Bart., but on the 7th of May, 1901, a decree nisi was made for the dissolution of the marriage, on the husband's petition, on account of his wife's adultery with a Mr. Hugh Watt. Previously to this Lady Violet Beauchamp had written a letter, which it was alleged contained a libel on Mrs. Watt, the wife of co-respondent, and on the 25th of July, 1901, Mrs. Watt commenced an action in the King's Bench Division against her for libel. In the writ in the libel action and in the pleadings the defendant, Lady Violet Beauchamp, was described as a "married woman," the decree nisi not having then been made absolute.

On the 25th of November, 1901, the decree nisi was made absolute.

On the 30th of October, 1902, the libel action was tried, after the decree nisi had been made absolute, when the jury awarded the plaintiff £5,000 damages, judgment being given for that amount. The judgment, as entered, was headed with the title of the action, in which the defendant was described as a "married woman." Application having been made to the Court of Appeal by the defendant in the libel action for a new trial on the ground (inter alia) that the damages were excessive, that court on the 17th of June, 1903, ordered the case to be retried unless the plaintiff would consent to reduce the damages to £1,500.

The plaintiff consented to this, and the judgment was therefore amended on the 19th of July by the master, £1,500 being substituted in lieu of £5,000, although the original date of the judgment—the 30th of October, 1902—remained unaltered.

The judgment as drawn up was in the form of a judgment against a man or an unmarried woman, notwithstanding the defendant was described in the title as a "married woman," and not in the form of a judgment against a married woman in respect of her separate estate as settled by the Court of Appeal in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120.

The defendant neglected to pay the £1,500, so on the 28th of July the plaintiff served a bankruptcy notice on her, requiring her to pay, or compound for the judgment debt, with interest from the 30th of October, 1902, within seven days. In the notice the plaintiff described herself as of "The Hans-crescent Hotel, Hans-crescent, London," where she was in the habit of staying, although she did not permanently retain rooms there.

By the notice the plaintiff claimed principal, interest, and costs due on a final judgment in the King's Bench Division, amended by order of the Court of Appeal. In August, 1903, on the last of the seven days limited by the bankruptcy notice, the plaintiff left the hotel and went to France, leaving no address behind her, except to her solicitors. The defendant did not pay the debt nor comply with the requirements of the bankruptcy notice. Accordingly, on the 24th of August, 1903, the plaintiff presented a bankruptcy petition against her, founded on the act of bankruptcy committed by non-compliance with bankruptcy notice, and also on the judgment debt.

On the hearing of this petition the registrar made the receiving order in question.

The defendant debtor appealed.

H. Reed, K.C., and F. Mellor, for the appellant debtor.—The creditor of a married woman has two remedies. If she has any separate estate, the creditor may sue her alone as to that separate estate, under section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), or he can bring an ordinary common law action against both husband and wife as co-defendants. The defendant cannot be made bankrupt upon this judgment against her alone in respect of her separate estate: Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120. The plaintiff has elected to sue under the Married Women's Property Act, and the only damages recoverable from the defendant are against her separate estate, and the judgment must be in the form settled in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120; Softlaw v. Welch, 47 W. R. 626, [1899] 2 Q. B. 419, 424. These cases seem to show that the Act makes the married woman's separate estate the debtor. A married woman cannot be made bankrupt on a judgment in the form in Scott v. Morley: see In re Lynes, 41 W. R. 488, [1893] 2 Q. B. 113; In re Frances Handford & Co., 47 W. R. 391, [1899] 1 Q. B. 566, 570. The judgment here is in a wrong form, as it purports to be against a married woman, though it is in the ordinary form against an unmarried woman. The Court of Bankruptcy can go behind the judgment to see if there was a real debt. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In bankruptcy administration.] Whatever the form of judgment against a married woman, it is only against her separate estate under the Act, and her being discovert after the commencement of the action is immaterial. There is an appeal pending to the House of Lords, and if the receiving order is upheld an adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor will follow. Secondly, the creditor claims interest on the £1,500 from the day on which judgment was given in the action. But the £1,500 was given by the Court of Appeal: Fisher v. Dudding, (1841) 3 Man. & Gr. 238. Thirdly, the debtor, if she had wished to pay the debt on the last of the seven days, could not have done so, not knowing where the creditor was: In re Stogdon, Ex parte Leigh, [1895] 2 Q. B. 534, 44 W. R Dig. 13. The debtor is entitled to know where to find the creditor.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also cited Seroka v. Kattenburg, 34 W. R. 542, 17 Q. B. D. 177. 34 W. R. Dig. 85; Earle v. Kingscote, 49 W. R. 3, [1900] 2 Ch. 585, 589; Warnford v. Heyl, 23 W. R. 849. L. R 20 Eq. 321. 324. [By VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Fairhurst v. Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association, 9 Exch. 422].

Muir Mackenzie and T. Mathew, for the respondent creditor on the third objection.—On the last point a mere irregularity has been committed. No injustice has been done, and therefore the proceedings are in order: section 143 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52); Form No. 6 in Appendix to Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 to 1890. The debtor made no attempt to pay. In In re Stogdon the address given was no address at all. Here the creditor was not bound to remain at the address given, during the whole of the seven days.

They cited In re Murrieta, Ex parte South American and Mexican Co., (1896) 3 Man. Bkcy. Reps. 35; and In re Low, Ex parte Gibson, 43 W. R. 405, [1895] 1 Q B. 734.

Reed, in reply.—The notice was issued before the hotel was the creditor's address. The objection is not purely technical. This address is not a matter of mere description, and if not, it is a matter of substance—for instance, a man may have a shooting box in Scotland, which he occasionally visits, but that would not be a proper address. The address must be one where either the creditor is personally present, or the time of his return or present whereabouts can be found. You cannot call an hotel where you stay occasionally your place of residence for service of a bankruptcy notice.

He referred to In re Howes Ex parte Hughes, 40 W. R. 647, [1892] 2 Q. B. 628, 632.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is important that this rule of practice should be settled definitely. We reserve judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: This is an appeal from a receiving order made against a divorced wife, who at the time of the making of the order was a single woman. The objections raised are three. First, that there is no judgment debt effectual as against the Court of Bankruptcy, which does not regard estoppel binding the debtor, but has a right to inquire into the real debt. Secondly, it is objected that there is no act of bankruptcy, because the act of bankruptcy relied on, which is failure to comply with a bankruptcy notice, is invalidated by the fact, as alleged, that the notice contained no such address of the judgment creditor as was intended by the Act should be given. Thirdly, it was objected that the bankruptcy notice was bad, because the amount of the judgment as therein stated was wrong by reason of including interest prior to the date when the Court of Appeal amended the judgment by reducing the damages from £5,000 to £1 500.

As to the first point, undoubtedly the Court of Bankruptcy has the power on the hearing of a bankruptcy petition to go behind the judgment and to inquire into the consideration for the judgment debt, not only at the instance of the trustee, but also at the instance of the judgment debtor himself. This power is founded on section 7, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which gives the Court of Bankruptcy, on the hearing of a bankruptcy petition, a discretion for "any sufficient cause" to dismiss the petition. But, in my judgment, the fact that the judgment may be irregular or wrong in form is no sufficient reason for going behind the judgment and dismissing the petition. The action in the present case is an action for a tort committed by a woman during coverture; it is for a libel published by her while she was a married woman. Now, by the common law, independently of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a married woman was liable to be sued for a wrong committed by her, and the husband, strictly speaking, was not liable to be sued at all for such tort. His only liability was to be sued jointly with her, because of the universal rule that the wife during coverture cannot be either a sole plaintiff or a sole defendant; and it was decided in Capel v. Powell, 13 W. R. 159, 17 C. B. N. S. 743, 13 W. R. C. L. Dig. 54, that a husband who has obtained a divorce is not liable to be joined in an action of tort for a tort committed by his wife during coverture. It is manifest, therefore, that, in the present case, in which the defendant at the date of the trial and judgment had been divorced, she alone remained liable for the tort, and the amendments, if any, which were required in the writ or pleadings went merely to the form and not to the substance of the cause of action. The case is very different from the case of a breach of contract entered into by a wife during coverture. In such a case coverture is a plea in bar and not in abatement, and the cause of action given by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the remedy thereon are new, being created by Act of Parliament; whence it follows that, if the husband dies or obtains a divorce, this will not affect the statutory cause of action or the remedy thereof, but the remedy will remain a remedy against the wife's separate property, and the judgment in such an action will not create a personal debt from her, and therefore will not support a bankruptcy notice under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, sub-section 1 (g). It is true that in the present case we have not to deal with the setting aside of a bankruptcy notice, because the judgment in form creates a personal debt; but if in substance the action had been one in which no judgment could have been obtained creating a personal debt by the wife, I am disposed to think there would have been sufficient cause to dismiss the petition. But in the present case no such question arises. It is plain that the objection to the judgment, if any, is one of form only, and that the power of the Court of Bankruptcy to go behind a judgment is a power to inquire into the consideration for and not into the form of the judgment. The judgment, to my mind, is conclusive unless the consideration can be questioned. The first objection therefore fails. The third objection—that is to say, the "interest" objection—is also concluded by the judgment. The Court of Bankruptcy cannot, I think, question the discretion of the court in such a matter.

The only remaining objection is the objection founded on the insufficiency of the address given by the judgment creditor in the bankruptcy notice. The objection is based upon the judgment of the Court of Appeal in In re Stogdon, [1895] 2 Q. B., 534, 44 W. R. Dig. 13. Now in that case the judgment creditor, who was out of England at the time the notice was served, and so continued during the seven days that it was running, inserted in the bankruptcy notice as his address "White's Club, St. James's, S.W."; and the Court of Appeal decided that the bankruptcy notice was bad, holding that the notice must describe the creditor as of an address where the sum claimed can be paid to him or secured or compounded for, not merely where he could be heard of, and that the address of "White's Club" was not under the circumstances such an address; and the question which we have now to decide is whether the address given by Mrs Watt is such an address as is required by the Act, having regard to the decision in In re Stogdon.

Now what are the facts? Mrs. Watt appears to have been in the habit for some time of staying in the Hans-crescent Hotel whenever she came to London, but she did not continuously keep a room there. Sometimes she left an address to which her letters could be sent, sometimes she did not. At the date of the issue of the bankruptcy notice she was not in fact at the Hans-crescent Hotel; she seems to have come there on the evening of the 28th of July, so that the seven days mentioned in the notice would not run out till the end of the 4th of August. She left the hotel on the morning of the 4th of August in a motor-car, and went to Newhaven and thence to Dieppe; she did not return to England till the end of September, and she went on the 30th of September to the Hans-crescent Hotel. She left on the 4th of August no address to which her letters could be sent, and in fact they were not sent after her. In order to see whether this address fulfils the conditions laid down in In re Stogdon, one must ascertain what is the principle of that decision; and it is the more necessary to do so because it will govern the practice of the Bankruptcy Court hereafter.

It is plain that it is not sufficient for the creditor merely to give an address where he can be heard of, but it must be an address where he can be paid, or where by agreement the debt can be secured or compounded. Now what does this mean? Suppose a creditor gives as his address his home where he permanently lives. Is he bound to remain at home all day, or never to go out without leaving word where he proposes to go, but, for the matter of that, might not succeed in going? This is impossible. What, then, are the necessary conditions of the address? I think that the address must be of a place where the creditor is to be found during the seven days, and this is so whether that address is of the residence or of the place of business of the creditor; and I think that, if the address given in the bankruptcy notice is such an address at the date of the service of the notice, occasional absence of the creditor from such place, even for a whole day, will not render the bankruptcy notice inefficient, unless the absence is such as to deprive the creditor of a reasonable opportunity of paying or securing according to the terms of the notice. And I do not think that it would make any difference that the address was the temporary home of the creditor who happened to have no permanent home, or that the absence relied on as depriving the bankruptcy notice of its efficiency happened to occur on the last day of the seven. On the other hand I think that, if the creditor, after the service of the notice, abandoned his place of address, so that it ceased to be a place where at reasonable times the creditor could be found (or some authorized agent on his behalf) to receive payment of the judgment debt, or to deal with the question of security, the bankruptcy notice would cease to be efficient. It was urged in the present case that when Mrs. Watt started on her journey to the Continent she abandoned her temporary address, and ceased to have any address where she, or any agent authorized to act on her behalf in the matter, could be found. My brethren think that, having regard to her practice of residing at the Hans-crescent Hotel, and to the fact that her letters would be likely to be delivered there after her departure, this contention on behalf of the debtor fails in fact; and I do not think I ought to differ from them on a question of fact; so this appeal will be dismissed with costs.

I wish to add that the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Stogden seems to me, so far as the observations contained in the judgments are concerned, to be difficult of practical application. Perhaps it might be considered whether the rules and forms might not be somewhat altered.

ROMER and STIRLING, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

[Counsel for the debtor asked for a stay of execution pending an appeal which had been presented to the House of Lords against the judgment in the libel action.

THE COURT gave leave to Lady Violet to appeal to the House of Lords from their present order, and stayed the proceedings under that order in the meantime, on her undertaking to present her petition of appeal within fourteen days.]

Solicitors for the appellant, M. Abrahams, Sons, & Co.

Solicitors for the creditor, Charles Russell & Co.

From K. B. Div. (In Bkcy.) (Vaughan Williams, Stirling and and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 12.

In re THOMAS WILLIAM HANCOCK.
Ex parte HILLEARYS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Bankrupt presenting his own petition—Creditors—Right to annul adjudication—Abuse of process of the court—Rescission of receiving order—Adjudication not for benefit of creditors—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 7, 8 (1), 35.

A debtor, having had various committal orders made against him on judgment summonses, presented his own petition in bankruptcy, upon which a receiving order was made. The only creditors were a firm of solicitors, to whom he was indebted for a little over £200. They applied under section 35 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that the adjudication made on the debtor's petition should be annulled, as being an abuse of the process of the court.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the presentation of such a petition by the debtor under the circumstances of the case was not an abuse of the process of the court, and did not entitle the court to annul the adjudication.

In re Roberts, 48 W. R. 132, [1900] 1 Q. B. 122, approved.

Ex parte Painter, In re Painter, 43 W. R. 144, [1895] 1 Q. B. 85; and In re Betts, Ex parte Official Receiver, 49 W. R. 447, [1901] 2 K. B. 39, distinguished.

This was an appeal by Messrs. Hilleary, solicitors and creditors, from an order of Mr. Registrar Hope of the 20th of January, 1904, dismissing their application to annul the bankruptcy proceedings. The application was made under section 35 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52). The debtor was a salesman in a cabinet factory, and the applicants acted as his solicitors, in the years 1895 and 1896, when certain costs were incurred by him in litigation and other matters amounting to £209 7s. 8d. The accounts were sent to the debtor on the 4th of January, 1897, but as he refused to take any notice of repeated applications for the amount, a judgment in default of appearance was obtained against him for the amount, with £4 14s. costs. No steps were taken for enforcing the judgment until 1902, when a judgment summons was issued, and Phillimore, J., before whom the matter came, after having fully examined the debtor as to his position and income, directed payment of the judgment debt by monthly instalments of £4. The debtor took no notice of this order, and on the 1st of November an order for his committal was made in his absence on a second judgment summons, by Phillimore, J., for non-payment of three instalments, viz., £12, then due under such order. The debtor, however, did not comply with the notice of committal, but on the 11th of November gave notice through his solicitor that application had been made to Darling, J., who had directed the judgment summons to be reinstated; when, however, the application came on, the debtor was not present or represented, and the only order made was to add £3 3s. for the applicants' costs to the judgment debt. The debtor paid the amount for which he stood committed, and subsequently the costs of the application. As he still refrained from paying the monthly instalments, by a third judgment summons on the 31st of January, 1904, after having been fully examined by Wright, J., as to his means, he was directed to pay £16 then due by the end of February, the monthly instalments to continue from the 1st of April following, but the order of Phillimore, J., was not varied in any other respect. The £16 was paid, but the debtor still did not pay the monthly instalments of £4, and on a fourth judgment summons before Wright, J., on the 8th of August, 1903, in the debtor's absence, he was committed for £15, suspended for a week. On the 14th of August, 1903, the debtor presented his own petition, and the receiving order was made, and adjudication on the same day. The public examination of the bankrupt took place on the 21st of October, 1903, his only creditors being the solicitors, the Messrs. Hilleary, who acted for him in (amongst other transactions) the winding up of a partnership. The liabilities were returned at £212 19s. 9d. and no assets were disclosed. Upon an application by the creditors that the order of adjudication be annulled, it was strongly urged on their behalf that, first, the debtor was not insolvent at the date of the presentation of his petition upon which such order was made; secondly, that the applicants were the only creditors of the debtor, and that the petition was presented for the purpose of defeating them; and, thirdly, that, inasmuch as both Phillimore and Wright, JJ., had examined the debtor and satisfied themselves of his ability to pay, the adjudication and the bankruptcy proceedings were an abuse of the process of the court, as they in effect overrode the two orders of the learned judges. Evidence was given at the public examination of the bankrupt of his means and mode of living, such as his being in receipt of £300 a year, derived from salary and commissions in his employment as salesman in a city firm, his residing in a substantially large house in Brentwood, and his employing counsel on several occasions on the judgment summonses. When the application came before the registrar, he held that the case came within In re Painter, 43 W. R. 144, [1895] 1 Q. B. 85, and not within In re Betts, 49 W. R. 447, [1901] 2 K. B. 39, and he dismissed the application with costs.

Section 35 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), under which the application by the creditors was made, is as follows: (1) "Where, in the opinion of the court, a debtor ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt, or where it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the debts of the bankrupt are paid in full, the court may, on the application of any person interested, by order, annul the adjudication." (2) "Where an adjudication is annulled under this section all sales and dispositions of property and payments duly made, and all acts theretofore done, by the official receiver, trustee, or other person acting under their authority, or by the court, shall be valid, but the property of the debtor who was adjudged bankrupt shall vest in such person as the judge may appoint, or in default of any such appointment revert to the debtor for all his estate or interest therein on such terms and subject to such conditions, if any, as the court may declare by order." (3) "Notice of the order annulling an adjudication shall be forthwith gazetted and published in a local paper."

From this decision of the registrar the creditors appealed.

H. Reed, K.C., and S. Lynch, for the appellants.—This is an abuse of the process of the court: Ex parte Painter, In re Painter, 43 W. R. 144, [1895] 1 Q. B. 85; In re Betts, Ex parte Official Receiver, 49 W. R. 447, [1901] 2 K. B. 39. This last case presents circumstances like this. Where there is a committal order against the debtor, he ought not to be permitted to get a receiving order. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to section 7, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which deals with the presentment of a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor as follows: "If the court is not satisfied with the proof of the petitioning creditor's debt, or of the act of bankruptcy, or of the service of the petition, or is satisfied by the debtor that he is able to pay his debts, or that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the court may dismiss the petition."] Section 8 relates to the debtor, and under that section it is not the duty of the court to inquire concerning facts which under section 7 it ought to inquire into. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to In re Roberts, 48 W. R. 132, [1900] 1 Q. B 122.] [By Muir Mackenzie.—In re Shine, Ex parte Shine, 40 W. R. 386, [1892] 1 Q. B. 522.]

Muir Mackenzie, for the respondent.—The learned registrar's decision perfectly right. In In re Painter the proceedings were under the Debtors Act, and the object of the debtor in that case was very different from the case here: In re Roberts, 48 W. R. 132, [1900] 1 Q. B. 122; Shoolbred v. Roberts, [1899] 2 Q. B. 560, 48 W. R. Dig. 19, [1900] 2 Q. B. 497, 49 W. R. Dig. 8. On the application of the debtor for a discharge, the court can, under section 8, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), impose conditions, subject to after-acquired earnings or property. This is an à fortiori case on the decision in In re Painter, all other cases are indistinguishable. In re Betts was a very different case; there the court found the debtor committing a series of frauds on his creditors. When in section 5 the Act says the court "shall," it does not cripple the court, as in this case the debt is over £200, and can be reached by the Debtors Act, 1869. The registrar was right, and his discretion was properly exercised.

S. Lynch replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of opinion that the learned registrar was perfectly right. There is no ground for saying that this receiving order made against the debtor on his own petition is an abuse of the process of the court. It was decided in In re Roberts, 48 W. R. 132, [1900] 1 Q. B. 122, that under section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, certain goods which the bankrupt had acquired under a contract, between the commencement of his bankruptcy and his discharge, belonged to the trustee in bankruptcy, the evidence showing that they were not wanted for the bankrupt's support, even if they could be regarded as personal earnings. Therefore, having regard to that decision, what is before us here is by no means to the same effect as in that case, and it is quite plain that with regard to the payment by the debtor out of his personal earnings there has been nothing brought about which would prejudice the creditors in any degree. The very money which they seek to obtain will come to them by reason of this adjudication, and therefore under these circumstances the presenting of this petition is, in my opinion, in no sense an abuse of the jurisdiction of the court. It is quite true to say that this debtor would not be liable to pressure from time to time by a committal order being made against him. I am not prepared to say that the Legislature intended that a debtor who was subjected to such pressure might not relieve himself from that pressure by obtaining an adjudication in bankruptcy. The creditor would receive payment of his debt by the statutory means, which it was the intention of the Legislature to apply to such a case as this. The presenting of this petition is in no sense an abuse of the process of the court, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

STIRLING and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellants, R. J. Gooch.

Solicitor for the respondent, Thos. Charles.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 5, 6, 10.

BAILY v. BRITISH EQUITABLE ASSURANCE CO. (a.)

Company—Life assurance—Deed of settlement—Participating policy-holders—Terms in prospectus—Bye-laws by company—Profits divisible among policy-holders—Power reserved to company to alter bye-laws—Part of profits to form a reserve fund—Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 62) —Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 50, 51, 196, and 209.

A life and fire insurance company, constituted under a deed of settlement, and afterwards registered under the Companies Acts, 1862, cannot—after issuing prospectuses to the public pointing out its advantages over other mutual societies, chief among which was the distribution of the entire profits in the mutual department without any deduction for a reserve fund, and on the strength of which prospectus a person took out a policy in the mutual department—afterwards, even though purporting to act in pursuance of section 1 of the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, by substituting a memorandum and articles of association for the deed of settlement, deprive the participating policy-holders of the profits which they previously enjoyed, by setting aside a certain amount, until a fixed sum should be reached, to form a reserve fund.

A company was constituted by a deed of settlement of 1854 to carry on, amongst other matters, that of life and fire assurance. It was afterwards registered under section 209 of the Companies Act, 1862, as an unlimited company. By their deed of settlement it was provided that the profits of the company should be ascertained as directed by the bye-laws, and it was further provided that any provisions of the deed and even bye-laws might be altered by a bye-law or bye-laws. In the mutual life insurance department, by virtue of a bye-law, the policy-holders were entitled to a division of any profits made in that department of the company's business. The plaintiff took out a policy in that department on his own life on the faith of certain statements contained in the company's prospectuses, that no profits should be set aside to form a reserve fund. Afterwards it was proposed, with the object of substituting a memorandum and articles for their deed of settlement, to register the company under the provisions of the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890. The proposed articles set aside out of the profits a certain percentage until a fixed sum should be reached to form a reserve fund. The plaintiff's policy was taken subject to the indorsed conditions, which referred to the deed of settlement and the bye-laws and to any documents deposited with the company in relation to the assurance.

Held, that the company could not, either by altering its bye-laws or by altering its articles, justify a breach of contract; that there was a contract for value between them and the plaintiff relating to the future profits of a particular branch of the company's business, and that the company could not therefore, by special resolution or otherwise, alter the contractual right of the plaintiff.

This was an appeal by the defendant company from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The action was brought by a participating policy-holder in the defendant company, on behalf of himself and all other the participating policy-holders, claiming a declaration that the company was not entitled to apply any profits arising from the mutual and participating branch of the business either in the formation of a reserve fund, or to shareholders, or otherwise than by distributing the same amongst the holders of participating policies, and for an injunction to restrain the company from so applying the profits.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant company was constituted under a deed of settlement dated the 12th of July, 1854, and had for its object the purpose of carrying on the business of a life and fire assurance and of an annuity, endowment, reversionary interest and loan association. The company was afterwards duly registered under the provisions of section 209 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), as an unlimited company. The deed of settlement (by clause 9) empowered the company to make bye-laws, and the profits of the company were to be ascertained and divided in the manner directed by the bye-laws; and (by clause 56) it was provided that any bye-law might be altered, repealed, or suspended by a bye-law, but not otherwise.

The bye-laws of 1854 made by the company contain, inter alia, the following provisions: (2) "That in the beginning of January and July in each year a calculation shall be made of interest upon the amount paid up in respect of each share in the company at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum up to the next preceding 31st of December and 30th of June respectively, and such interest shall at some time in the months of January and July to be fixed by the directors for that purpose, be payable to the holders of the shares out of the profits of the company only at the company's chief office for the time being, but every shareholder shall be entitled to receive interest only from the time of the actual payment of the amount so paid up, notwithstanding the payment by any shareholder of interest for the time any call was in arrear"; (3) "That in the month of January, 1858, and in every subsequent third year, a general valuation and calculation shall be made of the whole assets and liabilities of the company, and, after carrying forward such portions (if any) of the expenses of establishing the company as the directors shall consider equitable, the net profits of the company's business shall be ascertained by the actuary under the direction of the board of directors"; (4) "that in the month of January in the respective years last aforesaid a calculation shall be made by the actuary of the profits that have arisen in the departments of business in which the assured are to be entitled to participate in profits, and in such calculation a fair proportion of the interest hereinbefore directed to be paid and of the other expenses of the company shall be charged upon such last-mentioned departments, and the profits so ascertained to have arisen from the last-mentioned departments of business shall be set apart and divided amongst the policy-holders in such departments by the actuary under the superintendence of the directors, and the remainder of the profits of the company shall be divided among the shareholders according to the amount of shares held by each, and be paid to them along with the next half-yearly dividend."

Certain bye-laws of 1893 substituted a quinquennial ascertainment and division of profits between the different policy-holders, instead of the triennial ascertainment and division as prescribed by the bye-laws of 1858.

From 1862 until after the date of the plaintiff's policies, the defendant company from time to time issued prospectuses to the public inviting them to become policy-holders on certain terms which were contained in the prospectuses. Among other statements appearing in the prospectuses was the following:

"Mutual Insurance Department. — In ordinary mutual societies the public sustains the following disadvantages, which are here avoided: (1) Each assurer in such societies is personally liable for the entire engagements of the society; (2) the policy holder in such societies loses a large portion of his profits to form a reserve fund, which is in fact so much property taken from his family and put into the pockets of foreign parties; (3) the frequent alterations of the constitution of such societies involve considerable risk to the policy-holder. In the British Equitable Assurance Co. these defects are avoided: (1) Complete security is given to every policy-holder absolutely without responsibility; (2) the current expenses of working the company are assessed rateably on the premiums received in the mutual life assurance department and the general premiums, and the entire profits made by the company in the mutual department, after deducting the expenses, are divided among the policy-holders without any deduction for a reserve fund."

In January, 1886, the plaintiff, relying on the faith of these statements, which were printed on the back of the form of proposal which he signed, applied for two participating policies on his own life for £400 and £350 respectively, and paid regularly the premiums necessary for keeping these policies alive. The company, in granting him the policies, covenanted after the expiration of one calendar month after proof of his death to pay to his executors or administrators the respective sums of £400 and £350, and all such other sums (if any) as the company by their directors might have ordered to be added to such amount by way of bonus or otherwise, according to their practice for the time being. The policies were ordinary common form policies.

About May, 1903, the company proposed, under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 62), to substitute a memorandum and articles of association for the deed of settlement, under which the company was originally constituted, and in so doing to alter the existing system of profit-sharing by the plaintiff and other participating policy-holders, and to deprive them to some extent of the rights enjoyed by them. It was provided under the proposed articles to form a reserve fund by setting aside 5 per cent. of the profits of the company's business, including the profits arising from the departments of business in which the assured were entitled to participate in profits, until such fund amounted to £37,500; that a fixed annual dividend of 2s. 6d. per share should be paid to the shareholders out of the profits of the company, and that there should be carried to the credit of the shareholders' profit account a bonus equal to 5 per cent. of the divisible profits of the life assurance branch of the company's business; and that subject to the aforesaid provisions, unless and until otherwise determined by the company in general meeting, the divisible profits of the whole of the company's business should be carried to the credit of the life assurance branch and to such fund thereof as the directors should determine.

The plaintiff alleged that by this proposed scheme the participating policy-holders would be deprived of 10 per cent. until the proposed reserve fund amounted to £37,500, and after that of 5 per cent. of the profits, to which they would have been entitled by the former scheme; and also that it would enable the directors to divert the whole or any part of the profits to some other fund, and that it was entirely opposed to the prospectus which had induced him to take these policies. The defendant company's contention was, that the polices themselves formed the contract with the plaintiff, and that these policies contemplated that the practice of the company might be altered from time to time, and on these grounds there was no breach of contract. The plaintiff brought the action to determine the legality of the proposed alterations as regarded the participating policy-holders.

Kekewich, J., after giving it as his opinion that the company were acting in perfect good faith, held that the prospectus which had induced the plaintiff to become a policy-holder must be imported into the contract with him contained in the policies, and that there existed a valid contract with the assured that he should have his proportion by way of bonus of the profits made out of the particular department in which he was assured. There was a contract with the participating policy-holders that there should be no reserve fund, but that all the profits of the mutual department, less certain necessary deductions for working expenses, should be divided among the policy-holders.

From this judgment the defendant company appealed.

Warrington, K.C., and F. Whinney, for the appellants.—The question turns solely on the contract between the company and the policy-holders. The bargain between the parties turned on the terms of the deed of settlement. On general principles of law, if an agreement is embodied in a formal document, that document is taken to express that they are at one on that contract. There is no reason for introducing a collateral contract, because, if so, the terms of the written document must be varied. [STIRLING, L.J., referred to Erskine v. Adeane, 21 W. R. 802, 8 Ch. App. 756, on p. 765 of the judgment.] A company such as in this case can only contract in a particular way, and it is not competent for them to vary their policy with individual policy-holders by some informal transaction; the question refers to a future transaction. The deed of settlement authorizes the directors to make policies, it has no effect in creating a contract, which is to be found in the policies themselves, and nowhere else. Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, 48 W. R. 452, [1900] 1 Ch. 656. Here the company is registered under the Act of 1862, and as its provisions apply, an alteration as to a regulation could be made by a special resolution under section 50 of that Act, independently of the power given by clause 56 of the deed of settlement. Punt v. Symons & Co. (Limited), ante, p. 41, [1903] 2 Ch. 506; Pepe v. City and Suburban Permanent Building Society, 41 W. R. 548, [1893] 2 Ch. 311. As long as the company are acting according to their practice, a shareholder cannot complain. The contract here is to be found in the policy, and the policy is capable of alteration by the bye-laws, and the company are entitled to make any alterations in it they like, which are carefully provided for by the terms of those policies.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Gatey, for the respondent plaintiff.—The very table, Table A, under which the plaintiff insured provided that the entire profits are to be provided for triennially, and that contract can be enforced. The plaintiff was informed that if he insured in that policy and paid the premium he was to have the entire payment of the profits; the division of these profits was specially provided for by bye-law 4. The cases cited do not contravene any proposition the plaintiff puts forward. As long as a statutory right governs these rules of the company, there is no statutory right to alter them; the defendants cannot contract themselves out of a statutory right. The whole burden of the judgment of the learned judge in the court below was that a statutory right was expressed.

They referred to Kearns v. Leaf, Aldebert v. Kearns, 1 H. & M. 681, which shows that a policy-holder can interfere with what the company has been doing.

Warrington, K.C., in reply.—The true effect of section 196 in the Act of 1862 is to import the Act into the regulations of the company; there would have been no power in the deed of settlement. Section 50 of the Act of 1862, which enables a special regulation to be made, applies to this company, as its registration under the Act of 1862 was a compulsory registration, see section 209: In re European Assurance Society, Ramsay's case, 25 W. R. 279, 3 Ch. D. 388. The application is under a participating scheme: In re English and Irish Church and University Assurance Society, 11 W. R. 681, 1 H. & M. 85.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The prospectus is not referred to either in the contract or the words indorsed on the contract. If you alter the condition in the contract you would be altering the written contract.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C.—Yes, if altering means adding to.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—No doubt, if you have a written contract, evidence is admissible to identify the subject-matter of the contract: Norden Steamship Co. v. Dempsey, 1 C. P. D. 654, p. 662.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 10.—COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the judgment of the court: This is an appeal from the judgment of Kekewich, J., who has in effect held that the profits attributable to the participating policy branch of the company's business, after certain undisputed deductions, ought to continue to be paid to the holders of participating policies, and ought not to be applied to the creation of a reserve fund or for any other purpose. The defendant company was originally constituted under a deed of settlement in 1854. By clause 9 the profits were to be ascertained and divided in manner directed by a bye-law or bye-laws. And by clause 56 any provisions of the deed of settlement and any bye-law might be altered, repealed, or suspended by a bye-law Bye-laws were duly passed by the company in 1854. [His lordship read the bye-laws 2, 3, and 4 of 1854, which are above stated, and continued:] These bye-laws, so far as material for the present purpose, were in force in 1886, when the plaintiff effected two policies in the mutual or participating branch of the defendant company. It is admitted that the plaintiff relied upon the statements contained in a prospectus issued by the company, in which the special advantages of the mutual or participating policies are set forth in emphatic language—e.g., whereas in ordinary mutual societies the policy-holder loses a large portion of his profits to form a reserve fund, the entire profits in the defendants' mutual department are divided among the policy-holders, without any deduction for a reserve fund. The proposal, which was not before Kekewich, J., but which has been admitted in evidence before us, shows that it was for a sum "payable at death under Table A." This language is intelligible by reference to the prospectus, p. 16, which prints Table A with the following words at its head: "Annual premiums to assure a sum of money at death with profit in addition," and the following words at its foot, "The entire profits divided triennially." The premium payable in respect of a participating policy is of course higher than in respect of a non-participating policy. One of the questions in the proposal, applicable only to policies in the mutual department, was as follows: "XI. Are any profits which may be declared to be appropriated by way of addition to the policy, or reduction from the future premiums, or making the policy payable during lifetime?" To which the plaintiff answered: "By way of addition." This proposal was accepted by the company. The actual policy as issued contained a covenant by the company to pay the full sum assured, "and all such other sums (if any) as the said company by their directors may have ordered to be added to such amount by way of bonus or otherwise, according to their practice for the time being." The endorsed conditions mention the deed of settlement and the bye-laws and the documents addressed to the company, which would include the proposal; but the words I have read are the only words in the policy itself expressly mentioning profits. It has been agreed that the only question upon which our judgment is desired is this—whether, having regard to the contractual relations between the company and the participating policy-holders, the company are at liberty to alter the provisions of bye-law 4 of 1854 in such manner as to alter the rights of those policy-holders to profits. This being so, it is not necessary to consider whether, apart from such agreement or admission, there would be any real difficulty in so far connecting the plaintiff's policy with the bye-laws and with the prospectus as to identify it with the participating policy described in the prospectus. It must be assumed, therefore, that bye-law No. 4 was originally applicable to this policy. Now, under this bye-law, it is for the directors, with the assistance of the actuary, to ascertain what (if any) are the profits of the participating branch, but the amount so ascertained "shall be set apart and divided amongst the policy-holders" in that department. The directors have no power under the bye-law to apply any portion of those ascertained profits to the formation of a reserve fund or to the relief of the shareholders.

It is, however, contended that as the company was registered under section 209 of the Companies Act, 1862, it thereby acquired power by special resolution to alter all or any of the provisions of the deed of settlement, not being in the nature of a memorandum of association, and all or any of the bye-laws, and that the plaintiff is seeking to restrain the company from altering bye-law No. 4 in exercise of this statutory power. And it is said that, apart from the statute, the deed of settlement itself contained a power to alter the bye-law, of which power the plaintiff had notice. We cannot assent to this argument. As between the members of a company and the company, no doubt this proposition is to some extent true. The rights of a shareholder in respect of his shares, except so far as they may be protected by the memorandum of association, are by statute made liable to be altered by special resolution: see Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, 48 W. R. 452, [1900] 1 Ch. 656. But the case of a contract between an outsider and the company is entirely different, and even a shareholder must be regarded as an outsider in so far as he contracts with the company otherwise than in respect of his shares. It would be dangerous to hold that in a contract of loan or a contract of service or a contract of insurance validly entered into by a company there is any greater power of variation of the rights and liabilities of the parties than would exist if, instead of the company, the contracting party had been an individual. A company cannot, by altering its articles, justify a breach of contract.

But it is further contended that by the terms of the policy the company are only bound to pay such profits as the directors "according to their practice for the time being" may order to be added, and that the directors may regulate their practice by reference to a special resolution creating a reserve fund. This argument really involves the proposition that it is competent to the directors to change a participating policy into a non-participating policy. The word "practice" cannot have such a wide meaning. It cannot justify an alteration of rights or the diverson of any part of the profits from the participating policy-holders. In the present case there was a contract for value between the plaintiff and the company relating to the future profits of a particular branch of the company's business, and the company ought not to be allowed, by special resolution or otherwise, to break that contract. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Henry Gover & Sons.

From K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J.) Jan. 22.

In re Gough and Aspatria, Silloth, and District Joint Water Board. (a.)

Compensation—Waterworks—Lands compulsorily taken—Natural and special adaptability of land for purposes of undertaking—Right of arbitrator to take this into account—Aspatria, Silloth, and District Water Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. lvii.), ss. 23, 24, 29, 30.

In estimating the value of land and easements to be acquired by a water board for the purpose of constructing thereon a reservoir, the natural and peculiar adaptability for that purpose is a fit and proper matter for consideration by an arbitrator as an element in the value thereof in assessment of compensation.

Semble, that the claimant in such a case need not give evidence that there were other customers who would be willing to purchase his land for such a purpose.

The decision of the Court of Appeal (Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ.) in Riddell v. Newcastle and Gateshead Water Co., reported in Browne and Allen's Law of Compensation (2*nd ed.*), p. 672, considered and approved.

Appeal from a decision of Wright, J., upon an award stated by an umpire by way of special case.

In pursuance of the powers given them by the Aspatria, Silloth, and District Water Act, 1901, the appellant water board gave notice to the claimant to treat for certain lands and water in the notice referred to, of which she was the owner in fee, for the purpose of making a reservoir thereon. The parties failed to agree as to the amount of compensation and arbitrators and an umpire were appointed.

The umpire stated in his special case that owing to the natural configuration of the land taken by the board and intended by them to be used for building a reservoir, the land was peculiarly adaptable for the construction of a reservoir, and he stated for the opinion of the High Court the following among other questions:

"Whether, in estimating the value of the land and easements to be acquired by the water board for the Overwater and Chapel-house Reservoirs respectively, the natural and peculiar adaptability for the construction of a reservoir of the lands in question was or was not a fit and proper matter for consideration as an element in the value thereof in assessment in compensation."

(a.) Reported by Erskine Reid, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

If the court should be of opinion that in estimating the value of the land and easements the nature and peculiar adaptability for the construction of a reservoir of the lands in question was not admissible, then he reduced the amount of his award by the sum of £1,636.

Wright, J., held that the adaptability of the land for the particular purpose of the undertaking was proper matter for consideration as an element of value, and that it was not necessary to show that there were customers for the land other than the water board.

The water board appealed.

Balfour Browne, K.C., and Roskill, K.C., for the water board.

Sir Ralph Littler, K.C., and W. G. Clay, for the respondent.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The point which has been argued is one of very great importance, but it seems to me that it has been settled so far as this court is concerned, and if the law is to be laid down differently it must be in the House of Lords and not by us. The umpire has found that the natural configuration of the land is peculiarly adaptable for the construction of a reservoir, and he has awarded a sum of £1,636 beyond what I will call the ordinary normal market value of the land in respect of this special adaptability. For the water board it has been contended that that is not a proper element of compensation, first, on the ground that it is giving a value to the land because of the purpose to which it is to be put, and secondly, because the umpire has not gone on to say that some other purchaser might come forward who would pay this additional value. I think both points are decided against the water board in Riddell v. Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Co., reported only in Browne and Allen's Law of Compensation (2nd ed.), p. 672, and also probably by In re Ossalinsky (Countess) and Manchester Corporation, which is reported in the same volume at p. 659. I should like to state how the point arose in the first of these cases, in which I appeared as counsel for the claimant.

In that case the amount of compensation to be paid to Mr. Riddell by the company had been referred to an arbitrator. Mr. Riddell was the tenant for life of the land the company required for their undertaking. The arbitrator determined the amount of the purchase-money to be paid by the company to the owner for the land, easements, and premises, and the compensation for the damage that he might sustain by the execution of the works, in the following manner: "As part of the compensation for the damage which Mr. Riddell would sustain by the execution of the works already mentioned Mr. Riddell claimed before me a large sum for water which the company could divert and impound by the said works, and in the before-mentioned sum of £17,000 I have not included any sum for such claim, it being contended by the company that I was precluded from so doing by reason of the seventh sub-section of the ninth section of the Waterworks Companies Act, 1877, but if the court shall be of opinion that this section is not a bar to the said claim I award the amount of £5,000, which sum I award in addition to the before-mentioned sum of £17,000." That section of the Waterworks Companies Act, 1877, provides that for the protection of Mr. Riddell the company should be bound to discharge every day not less than 200,000 gallons of water into a stream below the site of the reservoir, and sub-section 7 provided that such water should be taken as part compensation for all water which the company could collect, divert, and impound by the works authorized by the Acts.

In the present case it is not necessary to go into that point, as my brother Wright has held that the claimant here could not sell the water, and therefore that no claim for compensation is maintainable in respect of that. That point was not argued in the Queen's Bench in the Riddell case, and when the case got to the Court of Appeal the claimant was in difficulty with regard to his claim for compensation, for the arbitrator had awarded £17,000 as compensation in respect of the lands, tenant's rights, easements, and premises required to be purchased, and it was clear that he included in that sum all rights in respect of water which might be accumulated on the land. The arbitrator thus stated that the claim had been made in respect of the water which the company could collect or divert and impound by the works. That referred, without doubt, to damage which might happen to other lands of Mr. Riddell by the company intercepting the water which would have flowed to them. If that was the proper construction of the award, it could not be impeached. The counsel for the appellant had attempted to place a different construction on it, but their construction could not be maintained. It was impossible to suppose that an arbitrator, especially one who had so much experience in such matters as the late Mr. John Clutton, could have made the double mistake, first of omitting to consider any additional value which might attach to the land in consequence of its being a suitable site for a reservoir, and then in concealing his mistake by the language of his award. I asked that the case might be sent back, but the Court of Appeal refused. Brett and Cotton, L.JJ., gave judgment exactly to the same effect—namely, that it was a mistake to omit to consider any additional value to the land in consequence of its suitability as a site; but they did not say one word finding that there were other customers beside the purchasers, and I think that the Court of Appeal meant to decide that the elements of value in the land itself are matters of compensation as being part of the property to the owner or vendor. It may be of interest to those who have followed this branch of law that in consequence of that case I consulted Thesiger, L.J., who was a master of this subject, and he told me that the judgment of the Court of Appeal had only followed what had been the recognized practice of experienced surveyors for many years. I may also add that so deep was the impression made upon me by the case that I also consulted other gentlemen, who said that the rule laid down by the Court of Appeal was not a new rule to them. That is the reason why I have always regretted that Riddell v. Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Co. was not reported, because I have a strong opinion that it really recognized that rule. The Countess of Ossalinksy's case is also an instance of precisely similar effect. As I ventured to point out in the course of the argument, it does not involve any question of law at all; if no customer came forward, that shows that the element of value is not worth much. I am therefore of opinion that Wright, J., in no way added to what the arbitrator found; on the contrary, he decided the question in accordance with the principle laid down in the cases I have referred to, that "if there is a site which has peculiar natural advantages for the supply of water to a particular valley or a particular area of any other kind, or to all valleys or areas within a certain distance, if those valleys or areas are what might be called natural customers for water by reason of their populousness or of their situation—if the site has peculiar natural advantages for supplying them in that sense, apart from value created or enhanced by any Act of Parliament or scheme for appropriating the water to a particular local authority—I think it ought to be taken that there is a natural value in the site for the purposes of water supply, and that it may be taken into consideration." I think that Wright, J., has there clearly expressed the law on the subject, and I also think that it is correctly stated in Balfour and Allen's Law of Compensation that this is no new principle.

The appeal, for the reasons I have stated, fails and must be dismissed.

Collins, M.R.—I am of the same opinion. It is really a question of fact. The appellants contend that taking the facts as stated by the umpire, it follows as a matter of law that that element of value consisting in the peculiar adaptability of the site in question for the particular purpose of a reservoir ought not to be included. The umpire has included that as an element of value, and it seems to me that in doing so he has accepted the primâ facie presumption that that element of value existed and ought to be taken into consideration in settling the compensation to be paid for the land. That primâ facie compensation is based upon a long series of authorities and it also appears to be good sense. Underlying all that is the assumption that there is a reasonable possibility of a market for the land The whole question of value is in relation to a possible market. If anyone wants to assert that as a matter of law a particular element of value which bonâ fide should be taken into account ought to be excluded he must on the facts show that there is no reasonable possibility of the land ever coming into the market. If he can show that, then I agree a point of law arises; but if the particular land has a particular adaptability for a special purpose it is not enough to say that that element cannot be taken into consideration because the umpire has not specially found that there was no possible market for the land apart from the particular scheme under which it was taken; a further step must be taken, it must appear that there is no possibility of a market.

Romer, L.J.—I agree, and I have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the water board, T. R. Hargreaves, for Frank Richardson, Aspatria.

Solicitors for the claimant, Metcalfe, Birkett, & Rowlatt, for Mounsey, Bowman, & Graham.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } April 26, 27.
Buckley, J. }

Keith v. Twentieth Century Club (Limited). (a.)

Deed—Construction—Use of garden—Grant to lessees, sub-lessees, and tenants, being occupiers of houses, and their friends—User by members of residential club.

A. granted by deed to B., his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and his and their lessees and sub-lessees or tenants, being occupiers of certain houses, and their families and friends, the right to enter and use an adjacent ornamental garden. A limited company, which was the owner of some and the lessee of another of these houses, established in them a proprietary residential club for ladies. Under the rules of the club bedrooms might be allotted to the members at a weekly rent, payable in advance, but subject to many restrictions as to user.

